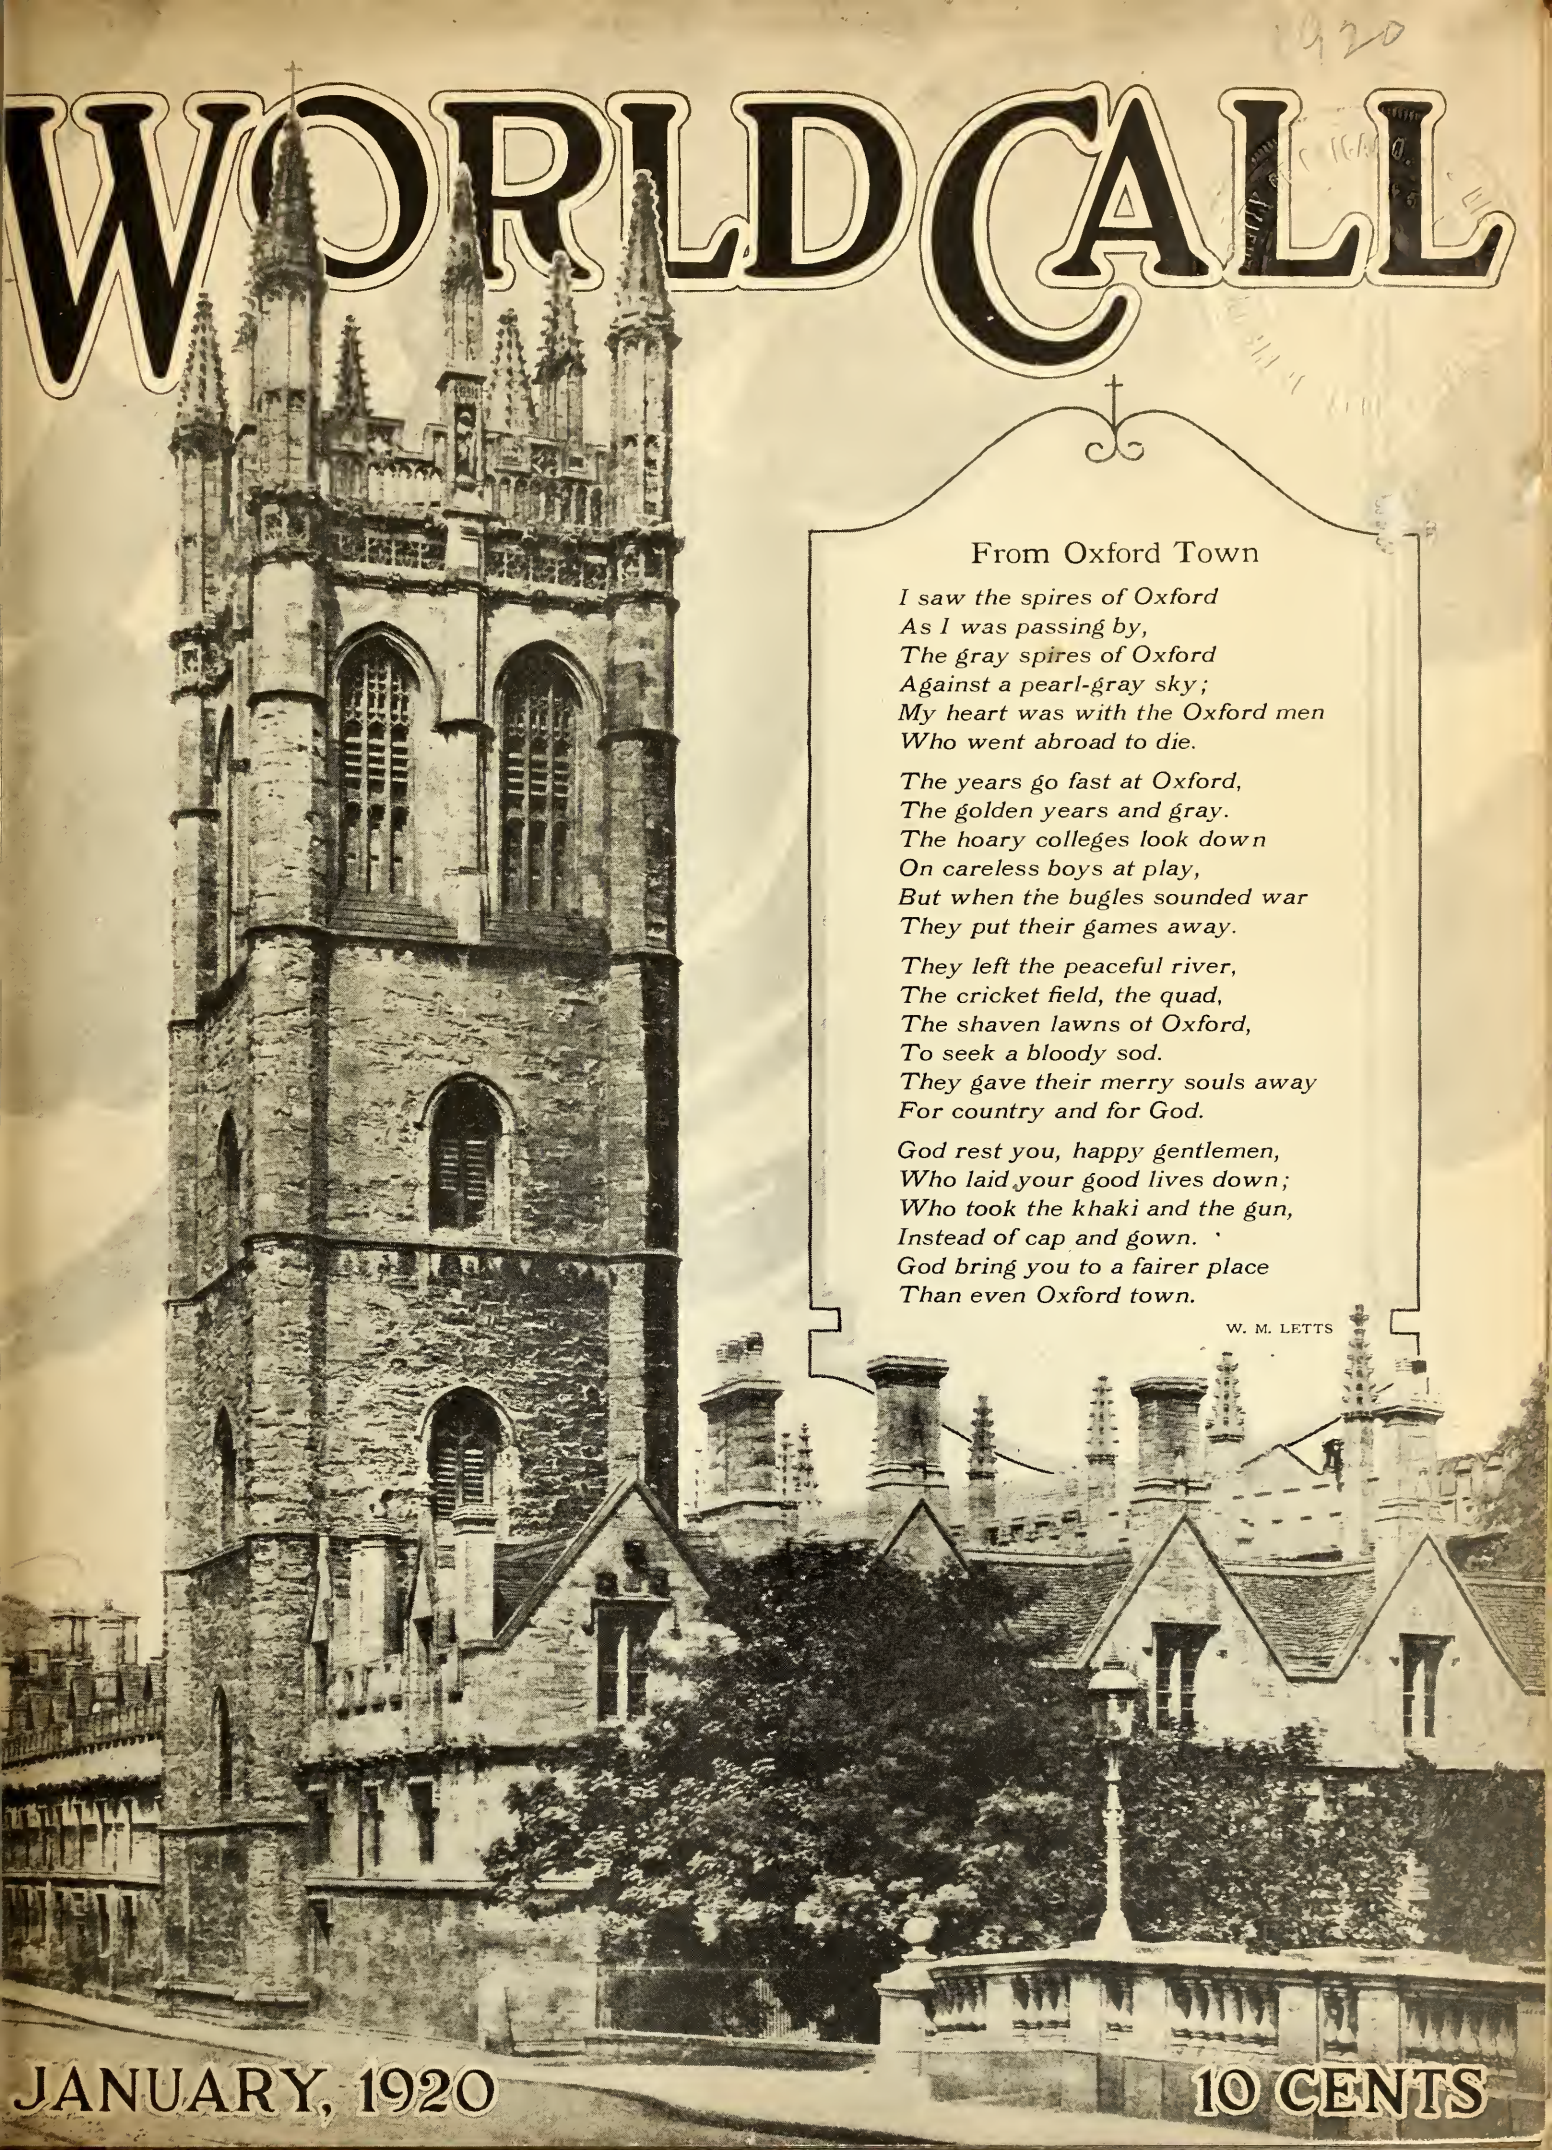
WORLD CALL



From Oxford Town

I saw the spires of Oxford
As I was passing by,
The gray spires of Oxford
Against a pearl-gray sky;
My heart was with the Oxford men
Who went abroad to die.

The years go fast at Oxford,
The golden years and gray.
The hoary colleges look down
On careless boys at play,
But when the bugles sounded war
They put their games away.

The cricket field, the quad,
The shaven lawns of Oxford,
To seek a bloody sod.
They gave their merry souls away
For country and for God.

God rest you, happy gentlemen,
Who laid your good lives down;
Who took the khaki and the gun,
Instead of cap and gown.
God bring you to a fairer place
Than even Oxford town.

HAPPY New Year! As we begin the second year of WORLD CALL, we want to express our appreciation for the patience and longsuffering of our loyal friends during this first year. We realize the causes you have had for complaint about delays and mistakes. We hope you will continue to let us know whenever you think we have made a mistake. If we have not made the mistake, we want a chance to explain; if we have, we want a chance to correct it. In your New Year's resolutions may we suggest the following:

1. I will read WORLD CALL every month of 1920.

2. I will keep in mind that on account of the advance in cost of paper and other supplies it is now costing nearly $1.50 to produce WORLD CALL; and when I receive notice of my expiration, I will renew the month in advance in order to save extra expense and any delay in receiving the next copy on time.

3. I will send my renewal direct to WORLD CALL, 222 Downey avenue, Indianapolis, and not wait to send it through the local committee. I will just report to the committee that I have sent my renewal to the office.

4. If I change my address during the year, I will plainly write my former address and my new address and send them at once to WORLD CALL office, 222 Downey avenue, Indianapolis.

5. I will try to secure subscriptions for WORLD CALL by talking about it to friends and helping them to realize the interesting reading there is in the magazine; in fact, I will tell them it is the most interesting news I read for it tells of the growth of Christianity throughout the world.

Our January Cover

THROUGH the courtesy of the Art Department of the New York Public Library we are enabled to show on the cover of this number of WORLD CALL a picture of the Bell Tower of Magdalen College, Oxford University, England, from "The Old Colleges of Oxford," by Aymer Vallance, a splendid volume published in 1912 by Scribners.

Magdalen College was founded in 1458 on plans projected in 1448. The tower was begun in 1492 and completed in 1505. Its height is 125 feet to the top of its battlements and 145 feet to the top of its pinnacles. In outside measurements it is 33 by 36 feet. Inside it is 18 by 21 feet. It is pronounced "A monument perfect in proportion and exquisite in detail."

Binders for World Call

MANY of our readers have been asking for binders for the preservation of the successive numbers of WORLD CALL. We are now glad to announce that we can supply binders at $1.50 each, postpaid. The binders are both convenient and durable and each one will hold the twelve issues of a year. The numbers can be inserted by anyone without difficulty. If desired, at the end of the year, they can be taken out and permanently bound by a book-binder and the original binder used again for preserving the file through the year, or the year's issues can be left in the handy binder and a new one purchased for preserving current numbers.

To encourage our readers to preserve their files of WORLD CALL and to facilitate their use, we are furnishing without charge a complete index of the 1919 volume with a title page. A postal card request will bring it.

Answering the Call

ON this and thirty-three succeeding pages appear photographs of students who are now in colleges of the Disciples of Christ and who are definitely committed to and preparing for service as ministers or missionaries.

A fine spirit of cooperation and devotion to the common cause was shown by both the schools and the students in having the photographs made promptly and according to specifications. Considerable expense and no little inconvenience were involved, and all understood that no names would appear in the magazine. Each school may well be proud of its section of the line, but all cheerfully consented to merge their particular interests in the cause as a whole.

The representation of the colleges of the brotherhood that are engaged in preparing young people for Christian service is about as complete as human cooperation ever gets to be, almost unanimous, in fact. We regret that the same cannot be said of each school's line, for in some instances only half of the eligible students are shown in the photographs. But there are enough, 616 out of a possible thousand, if we have counted correctly, to emphasize the idea that we had in mind: the embodiment of God's will for the world's redemption in joyous and vigorous young men and young women of our day.

Of course we would not for a moment intimate that there is no service of God outside of the ministry and the mission field. The training of these is only a small part of the work of our church colleges. Complete figures for this year are not at hand. We know, however, that the number attending our colleges is much larger than last year, aside from the S. A. T. C. Then the twenty-six schools that are cooperating in the Board of Education had 8,398 students, of whom 980 were preparing for the ministry or for missions. Counting all the schools of the brotherhood this year there must be an attendance of not less than nine thousand; and including students in eastern universities and other outside institutions, there are probably over twelve hundred of our young people getting ready for definite Christian service.

This is a great host of thrice-picked students. But, as is explained later, and will appear more fully in February WORLD CALL, it is only a fraction of the number that a vigorous body of a million and a half American Christians ought to be giving to God's service. But the rest are coming as certainly as two million American soldiers followed Pershing's headquarters regiment to France! And their schoolmates who take up other callings will give those who go to the front just as loyal support as Americans at home gave their soldiers abroad. It took the whole nation to do America's part toward winning the war. It will take the whole Church to win the world.

Turn the pages and see these hundreds of America's choicest youth march in review. Extend the line to include the hundreds who have completed their school days and taken up their tasks, all over America and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. Extend it at the other end with not hundreds but thousands who are coming after these, as the actual calls of all the fields and the clear voice of the Lord of the Harvest reach the souls of high school boys and girls. These are they who are to make good forever, and in all the world, the glorious ideals for which four and a half millions of young men in Canada and the United States took up arms. These are to plant and propagate these ideals, and to cultivate good will among men until war between any two peoples on earth shall become as impossible as it is now between Canada and the United States; or even between any two of these states or any two of those provinces.

Hats off to these cadets of the Kingdom of God, soon to be the commissioned officers of His increasing reign!

Hats off to the homes that have given them to God and to humanity!

Hats off to the schools that are training them for their holy tasks!

Hats off to the devoted teachers whose labor of love has never been worthily recognized with either wage or plaudit!

Hats off to the men and women of vision who have given of their money—God's money in their hands—that these schools might live and serve!

"I feel the earth move sunward,
I join the great march onward,
And take by faith while living
My freehold of thanksgiving."

The Teacher Come from God

TEACHING is essentially a divine service. It is not so much an informing of the mind as a forming of the character. Parents instinctively recognize this as their chief duty. The most common title of the Son of God on earth was Teacher. Anyone who comes in between the parent and the Christ to teach must partake somewhat of the character of each—must come from God—or fail in his mission.

The most glorious annals of mankind, mostly unwritten on earth, but fully recorded in heaven, tell of fathers and mothers who were the parents of their children's souls and not merely of their bodies, of public school teachers who were employed to give instruction in arithmetic and grammar, but also instilled honor and grace into the minds of their pupils, of Sunday school teachers in whom again the Word became flesh, of preachers who "lured to brighter worlds and led the way," of college and university professors who conducted their students up to the very gates of heaven.

Since this generation's chief task is the training of the next generation, these notable examples must be made the common rule. This will not come to pass by chance. Only by conscious and concerted effort have we doubled the yield of corn and made the common run of cattle better than the best of fifty years ago. So in this infinitely more important business the whole process of Christian education must be standardized and systematized from infancy to maturity.

Does the task seem too large to be undertaken? Witness how, under systematic education the entire German people grew into a fighting organism, a war machine. To make a people wholly Christian would be far easier, since man was created in the image of God; it would be infinitely less expensive, since only the normal processes of life are involved and these would be made more productive rather than less. Militarism took years of time from millions of men; perfected Christianity would save years for millions by eliminating idleness and dissipation. Militarism required vast quantities of arms and munitions; Christianity only improves the skill with which the tools of productive peace are used.

The task is as necessary as it is feasible. Nothing but thoroughgoing Christianity can save the world from falling again into a welter of blood—and the time is now.

For the whole vast undertaking the Christian college occupies the same place of vital and strategic importance that the agricultural college does in the improvement of farming and the military school in preparation for war. Here the processes are to be perfected and the leaders trained. For instance: Since the public schools are forbidden to teach religion, and since one hour a week is utterly inadequate, however efficient the Sunday school, some sort of week-day Bible school is immediately necessary. The way has been pioneered at Gary, Indiana. Methods and men and women to make the experiment a movement, and to make the movement universal, must be supplied by our Christian colleges.

Our investment of life and of money in these colleges must at once be scaled up to the Christian redemption of the whole of life and the whole of the world.

His blood-red banner streams afar: Who follows in His train?

Let There Be Light

By H. O. PRITCHARD

THE progenitors of the Restoration Movement were intellectual giants. They were likewise men who had a passion on the subject of education and placed a high estimate on colleges. Of that quartet whose names are more closely associated with the beginnings of the Current Reformation than any others, three were educators and the fourth was a distinguished scholar. Their appeal was always to a sanctified intellect. They were continually accused of having more head than heart. They considered ignorance to be the enemy of truth and light. They stood for a rational interpretation of Scripture as opposed to the vagaries, superstitions and emotionalism of their time. They were intellectual pioneers, blazing out new pathways of light in the midst of sectarian darkness and ecclesiastical ignorance.

Thomas Campbell—the father of the Reformation—was distinguished for his scholarly attainments. He was educated at Glasgow University and Divinity Hall. Although he won distintion as a preacher, he was preeminently an educator. In Ireland he was head of Rich Hill Academy, and upon coming to America he became a schoolmaster in western Pennsylvania. He was one of the first to see the vital and inseparable relation between the Restoration Movement and education. Alexander Campbell followed in the footsteps of his illustrious father. He was the intellectual equal of any man of his time. He, too, was educated at the University of Glasgow. He was a great scholar in every sense of the term. Furthermore, he was a wise man and knew that the cause to which he gave his life could never succeed without colleges—hence Bethany College. In establishing that institution of higher learning, he said, "The cardinal thought in this scheme is our beautiful ideal of education, viz.: that the formation of moral character, the culture of the heart, is the supreme end of education, or rather is education itself. With me education and the formation of moral character are identical expressions." Every intelligent Disciple knows the vital importance which Mr. Campbell attached to Christian education and how he gave the best of his wonderful powers to the building of Bethany College.

Walter Scott, too, was an educator. The popular imagination has pictured him only as a magnetic evangelist. He was that, but he was more. He was a scholar and college president as well. Educated at the University of Edinburgh he was a man of exceptional attainments. There may be some who do not know that he was president of our first college. Bacon College was founded at Georgetown, Kentucky, in 1836—four years prior to Bethany—and of all the men then associated with the Restoration, Walter Scott was chosen to head the enterprise. He was associated with a number of institutions of learning during his lifetime. Barton W. Stone—the fourth member of that immortal quartet—was an honor graduate of Guilford College. As a student he distinguished himself for studiousness. He slept only six or seven hours out of twenty-four, denied himself strong food, living chiefly on milk and vegetables, that he might become a scholar. The last article which ever came from his pen—a letter of advice to a young man entering the ministry, and which was published in the paper which he edited—displays scholarship which for the day in which he lived was truly remarkable. Yes, the fathers of the Restoration Movement were intellectual giants.

And what shall we say of the contemporaries of those men? What of James Shannon, educator and university president, who as a student at Belfast Royal Academy won prizes for scholarship in Latin, Greek, mathematics, moral and natural philosophy? What of John T. Johnson, who founded our first college, who could have gone to the United States senate had he not chosen to be a humble messenger of Christ, and who was fitted by nature and culture to stand before kings? What of Dr. Robert Richardson, thinker, scientist, critic and exegete, whose life of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece of pure English? What of Philip S. Fall, who founded a college for girls at Frankfort, Kentucky, and who was one of the first trustees of Bethany College? What of W. K. Pendleton, refined, intellectual, scholarly, a graduate of the University of Virginia, and later college president?

And what shall we say of that long list of immortals who followed in their train? What of Robert Milligan, J. K. Rogers, Isaac Errett, B. A. Hinsdale, S. K. Hoshour, O. A. Burgess, H. W. Everest, J. M. Allen, George T. Carpenter, Charles Louis Loos, Addison Clark, Allen R. Benton, Charles

Who best can drink his cup of woe, And triumph over pain,

Carlton, J. W. McGarvey, E. V. Zollars and a host of others? What of those still living—Randolph Clark, B. J. Radford, D. R. Dugan, E. B. Wakefield and William Prince Aylsworth? These are the illustrious whom we delight to honor. These are they who have made the Disciples of Christ what they are. And they were all educators—every man in the category was at one time a college president.

We quote them; we praise them; we revere them; but we forget what they were. They were educators. Without their labors in the field of education we would not be what we are. They were the true prophets among us. By their labors we have as our heritage our colleges of today. We cannot be true to these men and to the genius of the Restoration Movement unless we support our colleges in a magnificent way. They literally burned themselves out to make these colleges what they are; and yet we have allowed them to go in penury and want, in poverty and neglect. Dr. W. T. Moore in his "History of the Disciples of Christ" says, "It ought to be stated that the truth of history compels the further statement that the Disciples as a whole do not seem to realize the importance of their colleges. The most fundamental thing in their plea is mainly education."

The history of our people in the field of education is interesting—even fascinating. During the early years of our movement the leaders exhibited a very passion on this important matter. Colleges were founded in every state where we had made progress. Many of these have since died for lack of support, but we have left to our heritage Bethany, Transylvania, Hiram, Butler, Eureka, Culver-Stockton, Christian, Kentucky Female Orphan School, Missouri Christian, and Milligan—all founded before 1860 (Milligan, 1867). Then there came a time of neglect and indifference. We turned back into the wilderness and during the next forty years we started only two colleges which are alive today—Texas Christian University, 1873, and Drake University, 1881. Our other colleges and the work at state universities have been founded since that time. Indeed, it may be said that not until the beginning of the present century was there a revival of interest in this fundamental issue. Practically all the endowment which our colleges now have has been received since 1900. We came up to our hundredth anniversary at Pittsburgh with a total for all our colleges in buildings of $3,936,304, and for endowment, $2,067,749. Since 1909 we have more than doubled these amounts. In the past ten years we have done more for the endowment and equipment of our colleges than we did in the previous century. These latter figures do not include the pledges of the Men and Millions Movement. If these be included the showing for the past decade is magnificent. Certainly it all bespeaks the dawning of a new and triumphant day.

But let it be remembered and never forgotten that the present endowment, equipment and support are pitifully inadequate. When single institutions are receiving single gifts from single individuals for larger amounts than we—a great people—have given in all our history to all our colleges and university chairs; when other religious bodies are pouring their millions into their colleges—the Southern Baptists raising twenty-five million, the Southern Methodists twenty-six million, the Northern Methodists fifty-five million, the Congregationalists and Presbyterians even larger amounts—when there is such a revival of interest in education as our nation has never seen and the colleges and universities are taxed to their utmost capacity with eager, wistful students, when the shattered, tattered nations of the earth are crying out in the night of their despair for light and leading; when the harvest fields of the world are ripe and the Master of all good workmen stands in the market places and cries aloud for reapers; is it not time that the Disciples of Christ were entering into their birthright? Is it not time that we were proving true to the fathers and fulfilling their labors by providing amply for the institutions for which they so heroically lived and in many instances heroically died? Is it not time that we were putting first things first, and seeing with the clear-eyed vision of those intrepid prophets who perceived that without education the Restoration Movement could never succeed; that no religious people will ever be truly great that does not possess great institutions of learning where great leaders are produced?

The words of Alexander Campbell, appearing in the preface of the "Millennial Harbinger of 1840," read like a prophecy for this hour: "We have been dreaming for ages, and are only just now awakening to the importance of education, not merely to its importance, but to the rationale, the philosophy of the thing called education. . . . To this subject, as essentially connected with the speed and progress of the current reformation, a more full and marked attention shall be paid." Shall we fulfill those words? Shall we enter into our heritage? Shall we complete the work which they so nobly began? Shall we take as our watchword the motto of the Campbells, Scott, and Stone—"Let there be light"?

The Healing of China

By DR. G. L. HAGMAN

THE part our Christian Church has had in the healing of China began thirty-three years ago, when Dr. Macklin started his medical work in Nanking. Our Mission now has hospitals in Nanking (Union), Luchowfu and Nantungchow. The last, being the most recently established hospital, is under the joint control of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

Would you like to spend a day seeing the work of our Mission Hospital at Nantungchow? If you do you will have to walk fast because there is a full day's work ahead. It is a bright June morning, good for traveling, and so we know there will be many patients coming from long distances. But it is only twenty-five minutes to eight. We will have to go into the garden and gather some flowers to take to the patients before the little prayer service with the Christian helpers. Please take the scissors and gather some of those snapdragons —get a big armful of the red ones, the children like them best. They call them dragon heads and love to cause them to open their mouths by pressing on the sides of their jaws. I will get some of the red roses. Mrs. Hagman will bring some more when she comes as soon as she has finished with the household duties. It is only a three or four minute walk to the hospital—you can see the large gray brick building over there. Yes, it looks just like a building in America. It was planned by a missionary and built with money from Mr. C. C. Chapman, but all of the work was done by Chinese workmen.

A Full Day in the Hospital

There is no time to look around the place now as we must go right in to the little prayer service. The nurses are all there, also our Chinese assistant, Dr. Yang, and the little service is helpful to us all. After that we must hurriedly look the patients all over before we start operating. See how glad they are to have the flowers we have brought them.

We operate regularly three times a week and these are always full days. The instruments are already sterilized and everything has been made ready for the operations. The Chinese boy-nurses made these preparations before the prayer service. It was a long and tedious process to train them up to this responsibility but now they can do it with a little supervision. Miss Du Pee, our new nurse from California, is now in Nanking, spending a year at language study. How gladly shall we give into her hands the supervision of the nurses when she comes to the hospital next year. The operating room is much the same as those seen in hospitals in America except that white paint is used instead of tile and marble. But all of the careful precautions for cleanliness and sterilization observed in American operating rooms are practiced here.

The first patient to be operated on today is a woman with a large abdominal tumor. She thinks she has had it only two years, but has felt badly for three years. She was hardly able to walk when entering the hospital because of the great size of her tumor. Because of her poor physical condition norocain is used as a local anesthetic instead of ether. Her father and mother and husband are seeing everything that is going on from the observer's corner, as we always allow the presence of some relative. This tumor contained over three buckets of thick, gelatinous fluid. At the close of the operation, when the tumor is being delivered from the abdomen, she asks her father if we are starting to cut. She had felt no pain up to this point though she was conscious during the whole operation. The tumor and fluid contained in it weigh over fifty pounds. On the completion of her operation, after seeing the large tumor, she is returned to her bed in good condition. Her relatives return to the ward with her and discuss with the other patients there what to them was an awe-inspiring spectacle. This patient before coming to the hospital had been treated without relief by many native practitioners who, of course, know nothing of modern surgery.

While the final preparations are being made for the second operation, Mrs. Hagman begins the administration of the ether. This patient, as shown by the accompanying snapshot, has elephantiasis of the leg, and his last question before he is rendered unconscious is "Will it hurt?" You will see his leg is swollen to about six times the normal size. He has been afflicted for many years and is hardly able to walk. He has come a distance of over two hundred miles—traveling by small boat most of the way. He has used up most of his substance, by the way, and is not even able to pay the customary two dollars for operation and twenty cents daily for food, clothing, medicines, dressings and attention. We are going to perform on him a new operation recently devised by a Greek surgeon. The disease is caused by a microscopic parasite inhabiting the blood stream which obstructs the lymphatic circulation. He will be operated on twice after which he will probably be cured, his limb returning to normal size. His friend, who witnesses the operation, marvels that the patient sleeps quietly on while his limb is cut wide open from top to bottom. The operation is completed and the patient returns to his bed in the ward.

The third case for operation today is a woman with a tumor of her eye. The whole eyeball has been destroyed by the fungoid growth and her only hope is for its complete removal. This is quite a simple operation, but she has suffered much at the hands of Chinese physicians and is afraid the operation may be very painful. She says she has been in constant pain for two years. She has been in the hospital several times imploring us to cure her with medicine. Too many times has she heard lies from the native practitioners to believe us when we say her operation will be painless. Finally she has mustered up enough courage to come into the hospital, and tomorrow she will probably be filled with gratitude, for the operation was without pain. She, too, is accompanied by many relatives, but only three are allowed to remain in the operating room.

Woman Relieved of 50-Pound Tumor

The next case is a young man with a deep abscess in the thigh. This, too, requires ether anesthesia. A quick incision is made and a pint of pus gushes forth. Drainage tubes are inserted and he is bandaged up as he awakens from the anesthetic. His friends stand amazed to see the pus and in such quantity, as they only half believed, before the operation, when we asserted that without doubt the pus was present. This young man will go home cured within a week. He lives in a village many miles away. His friends will gather from far and near to hear him tell of his wonderful visit to the foreign hospital, of new and strange things he has seen and heard. They will want to see the gospels and tracts telling about the religion of Jesus which he heard about from the doctors and nurses.

Now it is past time for lunch and we must hurry to get back to see the outpatients who are waiting to be treated. Some of them have traveled by wheelbarrow since early dawn and they are anxious to get back home before late night. Just as we are passing through the back gate we hear the calling of the front gate keeper. As he approaches he says there is a young woman to be seen who has attempted suicide by eating match heads. This is an urgent case, so we return to the hospital to see her. There we find a pouting young woman surrounded by a dozen or more relatives and neighbors all talking. It appears that the mother-in-law, with whom she lives, has become so tyrannical that life has become unbearable to this young woman who has borne three daughters, but no son. The young woman, in desperation, swallowed the heads of ten boxes of matches. The irate mother, on finding the match sticks without heads surmised the daughter-in-law's intent—hence the visit to the hospital. After a hasty examination the appropriate remedy produced prompt relief and the poor young woman had to return to her former condition.

As we again proceed homeward, our journey is interrupted by the mason who has come to repair the kitchen stove and wants to know my idea of the new design before he can go on working; the carpenter who has just finished a repair job wants to be settled with; a nurse reports that a tubercular patient is having a large hemorrhage and will I please see him immediately. Then the washerman brings a wornout washboard stating that it tears the clothes and that he can't work any further without he has a new one.

Afternoon Clinic for Out-Patients

After these things are settled more or less satisfactorily, we arrive home for lunch, quite late. After lunch we return immediately to the clinic and find that seventy-four patients have already registered. Dr. Yang, the Chinese assistant, and I each see half of them. Over two-thirds of the patients are to be seen for the first time. The first case has a bad tooth. It takes a number of sentences to convince him that we can pull it without pain. A Chinese doctor has already tried to get that tooth out with a nail and a pair of tweezers. The patient hasn't slept for three nights. With the aid of a little anesthetic injected and a good pair of forceps the tooth is out in less time than it takes to tell about it. His gratitude is unbounded. He enthusiastically proclaims that he did not feel it pulled.

Man with Elephantiasis

Next is a little boy of nine years with tubercular disease of the hip joint. His father must go home and talk it over with the mother and grandmother and perhaps inquire the pleasure of the idols before he can be brought into the hospital.

Then there is a boy with a little brother and sister—all three have scabies—a bad case of itch. With a number on their slips for the dispenser, they are sent off in a jiffy with a jar of ointment each, which will effect a cure within a few days and they will be delivered from the itching torment.

Now comes a man with a very much enlarged abdomen. He has Bright's disease. He doesn't want to stay in the hospital but has heard that we can give relief by draining off the fluid. He is seated on a bench at the side of the room—a trocar is inserted and the ascitic fluid gushes out for fifteen or twenty minutes, filling three large buckets. The seeing of this spectacle causes a profound effect on some of the other patients following him.

The next is a young woman who has been here several times. She is a teacher in one of the government schools—a very bright young woman. She has pulmonary tuberculosis. The Chinese doctors told her that she must avoid fresh air at all times. Her condition continued to decline until, very much discouraged, she came to us. She accepted our advice to give up her school for the time, to open windows in her sleeping room and follow other instructions. She improved rapidly and is now well along the road to recovery. Mrs. Hagman will accompany her into the little private examination room and get her ready for a chest examination, while we see the next case. This is a little girl who has trachoma. You see her eyelashes are turned in so that every time she blinks the hairs rub on the surface of the eyeball and scratch it. Before she can be cured an operation will have to be performed to turn the eyelashes out and remove the irritation. This condition is very common following trachoma, a severe infectious disease of the eyelids. We operate on many of these cases. The gratitude shown by patients with this disease, after their relief, is sometimes pathetic.

Mrs. Hagman calls out that the tubercular patient has a sheet draped about her and is ready to be examined. I find that the diseased process has continued to improve so that she will probably be able to take her school again after the summer. Mrs. Hagman has visited her home a number of times to see that our instructions are being observed. They have established a very friendly relationship.

Through days of preparation Thy grace has made us strong,

You ask whose voice that is which we constantly hear on the other side of the partition in the big waiting room? It is the Bible woman. She is explaining the Jesus religion to the woman who has never before heard the name of One who loves them and is anxious to give them a new life.

This old man, you see, has a large ulcer on his leg. He says it has not healed in fourteen years. He can be cured by a stay in the hospital, when we will graft some new skin onto it. But he is a farmer and says he will wait to be cured until next winter when he will have less work to do. He couldn't be taken into the hospital anyway today, because all of the beds for men are occupied and there is a list of names ahead of him waiting to be admitted.

The next is a morphine habitue who has smoked opium for fifteen years and used the morphine needle for two years. He comes to be cured of the dreadful habit that is rapidly bringing him to ruin. He, too, must be turned away to wait until there is an unoccupied bed in the hospital. Since the police commissioner of this district has been enforcing the imposition of heavy fines upon the users of opium or morphine not a few of these unfortunate victims come to us to be cured. Many were successfully treated last year.

Now we see a woman with large ulcerated swellings on both sides of her neck. It is due to tuberculosis. She has heard of the reputation of the Christian Hospital from a distance of almost three hundred miles and has traveled that far in a houseboat. She knows she will have to be operated on and is quite enthusiastic about it because she has also heard about the wonderful "dream medicine" (ether) that will prevent her from feeling pain during her operation. A neighbor treated here before has told her all about it and her confidence is implicit. She has come prepared to stay and will enter the hospital now.

Next are two soldiers with venereal diseases. The woman seated on the bench, whose little girl is now being treated by Dr. Yang, has lost her entire nose from the same cause. These cases are all too numerous. The loathsomeness of this disease continually reminds us how terrible all sin is in the sight of our Heavenly Father.

There are three cases of leprosy in for treatment today. They come for an injection of medicine once a week. We will not undertake to treat them unless they agree to come for at least a year. Short courses of treatment are of no value. Several cases that have been treated over eight months show definite improvement.

This old woman has cataract in both eyes. She cannot see enough to walk. Her son has led her here. I have told her that she may see again after an operation. She can hardly believe it but is willing to try. But first she must consult with her children at home and the idols.

We daily see many varieties of eye diseases. Unfortunately they do not all respond to treatment as readily as does the cataract. Many cases that come are beyond any help whatsoever. They must be turned away to continue in their darkness. But we do have a message of salvation that can bring light into their darkened souls.

This woman has a cancer of the breast. One can almost make the diagnosis from the odor. After examination in the private room I have told her that we have no method to cure her. She has come too late. But, she argues, one of her neighbors had the same disease and just returned home cured last week after being operated on here. Her neighbor came before the disease had gone too far.

I see you are growing weary of seeing all these poor sick folks. They aren't very attractive to look at. But they are real folks and each one has a soul. We have learned to love them, too. We see in each one the latent possibility of a regeneration, the becoming a child of God. How we do long to make Jesus Christ real to each one of them. You have seen that most of these clinic patients are carrying little books and papers in their hands. A gospel and several Christian tracts are sold for a copper. If purchased they are more likely to be read than if received free. We continually pray that the Word sent out in this way may bear some fruit.

Seeing the Patients in the Wards

Let us now look about the building a bit and make ward rounds while Dr. Yang continues seeing the out-patients. You will notice that one of the two big wards on the first floor has been fitted up temporarily by partitions to accommodate the out-patients. This arrangement is being rapidly outgrown however, so that a separate building will soon be needed for this department.

And now, O King Eternal, We lift our battle song.

At the farther end of the corridor, passing the laboratory, office and private patient's room, is another large ward. At present there are no beds and other equipment and this ward is being used as a Sunday school room in the afternoon. We hope that money may be available to equip it for use as a men's ward by next year. It will not be necessary to turn away so many patients when this ward is in use as it will accommodate sixteen more beds.

We will now go up the stairway to the second floor. Passing the operating room, where we were this morning, we come to the women's and children's ward. In the first bed is an old lady with bound feet. She fell and fractured both bones of her leg. She has been in the hospital for two weeks. She seems quite interested in the gospel and said she believed in Jesus. When I asked her the other day why she did not accept Him as her personal Savior she replied that she was afraid her relatives would laugh her to scorn for partaking of the foreign religion. She lives in the city. We expect to keep track of her. Perhaps some day her faith may become strong enough to withstand the test of her home folks. In the next bed is the woman operated on for the fifty-pound tumor this morning. Her condition is good. Although still somewhat uncomfortable from the operation, one sees that the look of fearfulness on her face has been replaced by one of contentment. She is very grateful to be relieved of her burden. In true Oriental style she apologizes for having been so troublesome to us at the operation this morning.

Woman with Tumor on Eye

In the bed beside her is a woman who had her breast amputated two days ago for cancer. She has come from across the great Yangtze river, where a different dialect is spoken. Although our spoken language is not very intelligible to her she does understand the language of kindness. The look of apprehension which was so manifest a few days ago has been replaced by one of complete confidence.

Lying in the next bed is the woman operated on for the eye tumor. Her son, who witnessed the operation this morning, as an expression of their gratitude, prostrates himself on the floor before we can stop him. He has brought her some long cucumbers and ancient eggs for a delicacy.

The adjacent bed will be occupied by the woman with the tubercular swellings in her neck. She is now in the bath having an initial scrubbing. The bed, you will see, is an American-made iron one, painted black. White is the mourning color in China and so is to be avoided. Sheets are white, but the coverings are of blue cloth. The garments worn in the hospital are furnished by the institution. They are made locally and are of Chinese pattern. We propose to conform as much as possible to the native customs, endeavoring to change these only insofar as they are at variance with the laws of hygiene or the teachings of Christ.

The woman in the next bed has hookworm. She has already had the treatments for expelling the worms and will be dismissed tomorrow. She will take with her a tonic to restore her blood. Soon her feeling of dizziness and laziness will be replaced by normal energy. Every patient who enters the hospital is examined for this infection. Many cases are diagnosed and treated who enter on account of other diseases.

Here is a boy of twelve years who came with a "sore leg." At operation, three weeks ago, we removed over two-thirds of one of his leg bones, which was decayed. By the aid of the Carrell-Dakin treatment, which was devised during the war, his wound healed very rapidly. After the bone regenerates he will have a good leg. He is the only child, and being a son, is especially precious to his parents. They live across the river. It is a very inconvenient trip but the father comes to visit his boy very frequently.

In the next bed is a boy of ten years. He has tuberculosis of the spine. He has been in the hospital just over a year,

Lead on, O King Eternal, Till sin's fierce war shall cease, lying flat on his back all the while. The hump in his back has straightened out a great deal, so that now only a little knuckle is to be seen. He has grown very fat and rosy. He is a very patient little fellow and is contented to remain on his back without moving. And yet he is busy all the day long. He helps the nurse prepare dressings, and sews. When he came he did not recognize a character. The nurse and Bible woman have taught him, day by day, so that now he can read the New Testament and miss but very few characters. His mother is a very poor widow. She pays fifty cents a month for all that he gets. One of the prized possessions of this little fellow is a picture book sent to Miss Abbott by a little Sunday school girl in Chicago. She made it herself. And how he does enjoy it! The Bible woman conducts a daily gospel service in the ward and teaches the women and children some truths about Jesus.

The Men's Ward

Now let us go over to the men's ward, which is on the other side, entirely separate from the women. In passing we see patients in two of the private rooms. These are well-to-do people, who are able to pay more. In one room is a woman with a breast abscess, in the other a victim of that common daughter-in-law's disease—hysteria. This young woman tried to commit suicide by swallowing her golden jewelry.

But we must hurry on to see the men's department. In the first private room is the tubercular patient who had the hemorrhage this noon. He is better now, but I fear he will not make an ultimate recovery.

In the next room are two brothers who are breaking the opium habit. They have been in the hospital a week, and all is smooth sailing with them now.

Now we must hurry through the large room with the sixteen beds. It opens onto the south veranda and is very pleasant. The floors are of Oregon pine, covered with Ningpoo varnish and nicely polished. The windows are numerous and the ventilation good.

In the first bed is a young Buddhist priest, with tubercular glands of the neck. He has been operated on and will be ready to go home soon. Lying beside him is a young soldier with beri-beri. Both of his legs are paralyzed and his heart is affected. His cure is a tedious process. The chief factors required are change of diet and atmosphere. The next is also a soldier. He was operated on three weeks ago for gall stones. He will be dismissed next week. This unfortunate boy was very badly burned two days ago. The burns are so extensive that his recovery is doubtful. He was burned in the act of trying to rescue some goods from his burning home.

This is the elephantiasis case operated on this morning. He has recovered from the anesthetic and seems quite contented. He will be surprised tomorrow when his dressings are removed to see how much the size of his leg has been reduced.

Here is another victim of the morphine habit. This is his second day in and he is somewhat uncomfortable. He implores me to give him some medicine to make him sleep tonight. What he requests is part of the regular treatment.

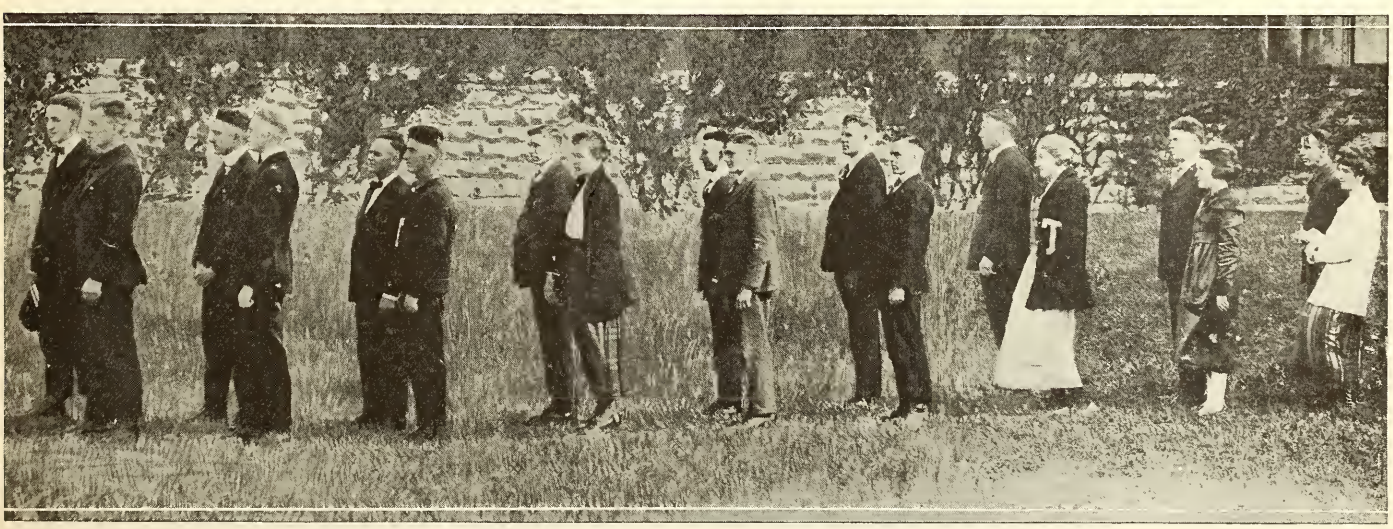
This young man in the blue gown is taking orders for each case. He is the nurse in charge of the ward just now. He is a Christian boy. The nurses and Dr. Yang take turns at preaching in the ward. I speak to the patients in a personal way as opportunity arises.

This is a case of dysentery; young man who is just recovering. Yesterday he asked if he could be baptized. He will first have to enter a Bible class and learn more of the Scripture and demonstrate his earnestness before he will be considered as a candidate for baptism.

In the next two beds are two neighbors who have come in together to be cured of hookworm disease. This old man was operated on two days ago for hernia. The rupture was as large as a child's head. He is reading a Gospel of John now.

The poor young man in this bed was a worker in the cotton mill. His hand was so badly crushed when he came that it required amputation. Here is the fellow operated on today for the abscess of his thigh. He is very grateful for the relief already obtained.

Last week we amputated this man's leg because of a large tumor. This affection, by the intense pain it caused, has made life almost unbearable to the poor fellow. And yet he was unwilling to part with the afflicted member. It was only after he had come up to the ward and had talked with other operated patients that he was persuaded to have cut off and cast from him the offending member. So often do we meet with the circumstance of patients who could be cured by an operation but who are afraid or unwilling, that it is ever an apt illustration in presenting the Gospel. Often we use it to show how the patient's cure depends upon his willingness to submit to treatment. And we try to make him realize that Jesus is even more willing to forgive confessed sin and to cure the soul of its disease than we are to treat the diseases of the body.



And holiness shall whisper The sweet Amen of peace;

Called Out by Diphtheria

I must now take the daily accounts with the druggist and registrar and give out supplies from the store room. Now that is finished, we have just an hour before supper time. Mrs. Garrett has invited us to have the evening meal at their home. In the meantime we may do a little work in the garden. While we are dressing for supper the house boy appears and says there is a call for me to go to one of the wealthy homes on the other side of the city. He says a young woman there has a very acute disease of the throat and the family requests my immediate presence. The sedan chair is already waiting at the door. Mrs. Hagman will explain to the Garretts why I cannot come for supper.

We have recently seen a case of diphtheria in the city. This may be another so I must stop at the hospital on the way and get some antitoxin. I usually prefer to walk but Chinese custom decrees that a physician visiting a patient should ride in a sedan chair. The house is about four miles away. At the front door the chair is quickly set upon the ground, and while I am still seated in the chair, one man runs into the house to present my card. The father of the sick girl (as I learn later) comes to the front door and very politely invites me in. I pass through a courtyard and am seated, with a certain necessary formality, in the guest room. I note by the character of the furnishings and size of the house that this is a wealthy home. Boiling hot tea is immediately set beside me on a small tea table. On entering the front door I saw just inside of it a small sedan chair similar to the one in which I had come, made of paper and reeds, with two paper men to carry it. Knowing the superstitious custom, I realized that the patient was expected to die very soon, at which time the paper chair would be burned so that it might be used to carry her soul in state, into the spirit world. Upon all sides incense was burning. In one side room there were a number of Buddhist priests ready to perform their rites. In another room five or six tailors were busily plying their needles to make the mourning clothes for all the family. This all makes plain to me that many Chinese doctors had been called in, one after another, to see the patient, without avail. And now, as a last resort and with small hope, the foreign doctor, too, is called in, if perchance he might be able to do something.

After some polite conversation and tea sipping, I ask about the patient and am told about her. She is a young woman, who for five days has had a very severe sore throat and high fever, and is unable to eat and can hardly breathe. After inquiring carefully into the history I ask to see her. I pass pass through two court yards and several rooms. Everywhere there is burning incense. In one room I saw an image of a woman laid out as if for burial. This is an effort on the part of the family to fool the evil spirits, supposedly afflicting our patient. If they see this image, which represents their victim as already dead, will they not feel that they have already accomplished their evil purpose and leave her in peace?

I see the patient. She is held up in bed in a sitting posture by two women. There are ten or twelve servants and relatives in the room, all anxious and excited. The patient is examined and found to have a very malignant case of diphtheria. The throat is treated and then we withdraw again to the guest room to discuss the situation. They are told of the antitoxin. But this case is so far gone and the infection so severe that even with the use of antitoxin there is little hope of recovery. I have only one tube left. The dose should be ten times this strength. The men are told how antitoxin is made and how it combats the disease. Though I tell them the case is practically without hope yet the husband is very anxious that the remedy be tried. And so it is injected. Then disinfectants are given and their use demonstrated, the necessity of quarantine urged and I start homeward.

The house calls are never very satisfactory. It is only the well-to-do who can afford to call us to their homes. They are able to command the services of many physicians and so we are called only in the last extremity.

On the way home I stop at the telegraph office to wire for more antitoxin from Shanghai. There will certainly be more cases of diphtheria in the near future. We hope they may apply for treatment before it is too late.

It is 9:30 p. m. when I arrive home. After a hasty supper we retire, tired, but glad that we have heard the Master's call to "go about doing good."

Just three days before the armistice was signed, Dr. Boutwell was shot while attending wounded soldiers in France. He died six days later. Dr. Boutwell was appointed to China and we expected him to be with us as a colleague at Nantungchow. Our China Mission is calling for three doctors to fill an immediate need. One each to be located at Nanking, Luchowfu and Nantungchow. But even more urgently do we need Nurses. Three should come this year and two to follow. Who will come over and help us?

For not with swords' loud clashing, Nor roll of stirring drums;

Education and Missions

EDUCATION and Missions—they are inseparable. They belong together by divine decree. The founder of Christianity was its first great educator. The pioneer missionary to the Gentiles was an illustrious scholar. The outstanding names that adorn the pages of the history of the Church have all been scholars and many of them distinguished educators. In no age has the Church been able to travel far on enthusiasm and zeal alone. In every age it has been found necessary to have information and knowledge also. In these days of high educational standards, no religious body is going to get very far which neglects education and no missionary society is going to ultimately succeed which looks askance at colleges and universities. God is not going to reverse the rules of divine economy.

Education and missions—they are equal in importance. The key words of Christ's parting orders are go—teach. Thise words form the two sides of the holy equation. The problem of the world's redemption will never be solved without either. It is not enough to go. We must teach—teach all the things which hath been commanded. The missionaries find it immediately necessary to establish schools—Sunday schools, primary schools, secondary schools, colleges and universities. They can make no adequate and lasting impress upon the heathen world without them. But before the missionary can teach he himself must be trained. Before the preacher can preach most effectively he must be trained. The preacher is more important than the pulpit. The missionary is more necessary than the mission station. Hence the Christian college which trains lay leaders, ministers and missionaries is absolutely fundamental to every local church and the whole missionary enterprise. To try to build great missionary organizations without great colleges is to seek to invert the pyramid. It never has been done. It never can be done. To try to build great churches without great colleges is to walk in a fool's paradise. Unless the Christian colleges survive, the Christian Church will perish.

Education and missions—they deserve equal support. Three things are urgently needed in our own brotherhood just now. First, our colleges need to be surcharged with missionary enthusiasm. They need to understand that the primary purpose of their existence is to train leaders for the bringing in of the Kingdom of God. All other reasons for existence are secondary. Our colleges must give themselves to this task with greater abandonment. They must consecrate all their resources to this high aim. Second, our missionary societies must have an educational vision. They need an educational background and an educational outlook. The missionary cause has all too often sought to travel by means of merely the sentimental and emotional appeal. Those communions and missionary societies which have made most impress on the unconverted world are those which have had the educational perspective. There is need of an infusion of an educational enthusiasm in our whole missionary enterprise. Third, our great brotherhood needs both a missionary conscience and an educational consciousness. The churches of Christ need to be made keenly aware that education and missions are essentially one. That to neglect the one means the defeat of the other; that to neglect both means disobedience to Christ's last and greatest command; that inadequate support of either means ultimate defeat for both. Other great bodies are seeing this and are literally pouring millions into their colleges and missionary societies. How can our colleges keep pace unless given equal support? To make them strong means to undergird every missionary and benevolent society and fortify every local church.

To cultivate and exhibit a missionary spirit is, from all our premises, the superlative, if not the paramount duty of every man and woman in the present kingdom of the Lord Jesus, Himself the christed missionary of Jehovah Elohim.

When we think of the untold millions of our species, participants with us of a common humanity, who are starving for the want of the bread of the life everlasting, how can we withhold from them that which we appreciate as our superlative glory, honor, and happiness! The best, the greatest, and the strongest proof of our appreciation of the gospel of our salvation, is our ardent desire and effort to send it with all speed and with all liberality to those who are perishing for lack of this paramount necessity—the glorious gospel of our eternal salvation!—Alexander Campbell.

Wanderland—Wonderland

O Chiyo San

By STELLA LEWIS YOUNG

O CHIYO SAN had a pretty home, a father, mother, brother and sister, plenty of dainty clothes and as much as she wanted to eat. But O Chiyo San wasn't at all happy and one reason why she was not happy was O Chiyo San herself.

For she certainly was naughty. Even before she started to school she would run away from home and get into all kinds of mischief out on the street and have to be locked up in a room for punishment.

When she finally did go to school it was the same old story. She wouldn't listen to a single thing the teachers said—they were Japanese teachers, you know—and was so terribly naughty they just had to say she couldn't come any more.

The Kind Policeman

Living right near O Chiyo San was a very kind policeman. He had been watching the little girl for a long time and so when he learned that she was going to be sent away from school he was very, very sorry. He thought about it a great deal and one day he walked up to the door of the Foreign School (you wouldn't have called it a "foreign" school at all, for the folks who had charge of it were Americans and looked just like the teachers you see every day) and gave a loud knock. The Foreign lady came to the door and asked him what he wanted.

The Foreign School

"We have heard," said the Policeman, "about your school, and what good success you have had with your pupils. There is a little girl in one of our schools near here who is very bad. Her mother can do nothing with her and now her teachers say they cannot have her in the school. Do you not think you can take her? You are a Christian. We would like for you to take her."

So O Chiyo San came to us. She was the youngest child in the school and it wasn't any time till the teachers and older pupils began to make quite a pet of her.

The Sick Child

One day O Chiyo San became ill, oh, very ill, and everyone in the school was sad about it. Her mother came to see her and sat beside the little bed, while doctors and nurses did everything they knew to make O Chiyo San better. At last, one day, she opened her shining black eyes and smiled at her mother and then they knew she was better.

Lead on, O King Eternal, We follow, not with fears;

Japanese Sunday School

"O Chiyo San," said her mother, "you know I do not know much about this school and I really did not know what you would need. So I forgot to bring many things. But one thing I did not forget was this little picture of Jizo, the children's god. You may need it, so I will leave it with you."

The True God

O Chiyo San smiled and said, "Mother, I remember the stories you used to tell me when I was so naughty, before I came here. How if I was not good, the gods would be angry, and how if I died I must walk through the river bed and from morning until night carry stones and pile them up, day after day, day after day.

"But, mother, since I have been here I have learned many things. There is just one true God. We cannot see Him, but He is here in this room with us now and He loves us. He kept me all the time I was sick. Jesus, His Son, is the friend of little children. I want you to tell my little brother and sister and all my playmates what I have told you about the one living and true God."

The New Sunday School

So the mother took the picture of Jizo home with her, but never again was it seen upon the mantel shelf. And will you believe it? Because of what O Chiyo San said to her mother a Sunday school was started in that neighborhood and all the girls and boys were asked to go. And many of them are going to this day.

One of the songs they love to sing is:

"Jesus loves me, this I know
For the Bible tells me so.
Little ones to Him belong,
They are weak but He is strong."

Reliable Light on Mexico

THE Association Press (International Y. M. C. A., 347 Madison Avenue, New York) has issued a book, "Intervention in Mexico," by S. G. Inman, price $1.50, that ought to be read and studied in every home in the United States.

No man living is better qualified than Mr. Inman to speak on this vital and vexing subject. Thorough training in college and university, with Christian culture and consecration, enables him to deal with facts, conditions and principles, without prejudice, passion or self-interest.

For a number of years he lived in Mexico as a missionary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, learned to speak the Spanish language with readiness and came to know the soul of the Mexican, whether Spanish, peon or Indian. He was eminently successful in dealing with the people of his community and state and through his efficient and sympathetic leadership became intimately acquainted with Carranza, then governor of Coahuila.

When the Protestant missionary boards began to awake to the necessity of more aggressive and concerted effort in all Latin America, Mr. Inman was called to promote a congress in Panama to study the problems of Latin America as the Edinburgh Conference had considered those of other mission lands. Since this epoch-making congress in 1916 Mr. Inman has been secretary of the Committee for Cooperation in Latin America. He has spent much time on "the neglected continent," acquired large funds of first-hand information and come into close relations with the missionaries of practically all Protestant churches in all Latin American republics. You cannot know Mexico without knowing its sister republics.

The book deals with conditions up to the summer of 1919 and so is fresh as well as authoritative.

To most Americans both Mexico and President Carranza are puzzles. We have tried to ignore them but cannot: they are too near and there is too much insistence from some quarters that the United States must forcibly take possession and straighten out our neighbor's affairs. Mr. Inman gives us a clear and reliable statement of the essential facts and the only practical, just and Christian solution of the problem that has been offered; a statement and a solution which are endorsed by practically all the missionary and educational workers of Mexico.

"This is a question not of stopping a fight, but of solving a problem. It is not a revolution to be crushed, but an evolu- to be guided."

For the United States to make war on Mexico would be the same as if the Good Samaritan had fallen upon the man by the Jericho road who had been wounded and robbed, and given him another beating; a course which we cannot imagine as possible even if the injured man had been delirious and abusive to his benefactor. In the judgment of all fair historians the record of our Mexican War of 1846 is an everlasting blot upon our national honor. The war which an insidious, widespread and determined propaganda is now trying to drag or drive us into would be an unspeakably greater crime.

In contrast with the folly, as well as the crime, of an armed intervention Mr. Inman gives this graphic suggestion of the way out of our dilemma:

"The United States Government spent enough on guarding the border and the Pershing expedition into Mexico, during the year of the Columbus raid, to build in every town in Mexico of more than 4,000 people, a college, a community center, a hospital, and a church, and to equip them magnificently, and there would be left over a sufficient amount to endow the public school system of each of these towns with some $700,000. There would still be left a tidy little sum of $15,000,000 for other parts of the program of education and the production of good literature.

"Our Mexican neighbors, if we will fully recognize their own national life and their peculiar culture, will be only too glad to accept the help of a friendly neighbor, and America is big enough to undertake this help in a really big way."

Christianity comes best at a moment like this. It is the only religion in the world that has as a distinctive note the message of hope in the darkest hour. New molds, emphatically Christian, must be found for this wornout civilization and I do not know of a harvest field of men, where there has been sowing, where it is not possible today, to have a reaping on a scale the like of which Christianity has never known.—John R. Mott.

Thy cross is lifted o'er us; We journey in its light:

Francis Marion Rains*

By ARCHIBALD McLEAN

And they buried him in the city of David among the kings, because he had done good in Israel, both toward God, and toward his house (II Chron. 24:16).

JEHOIADA, the hero of this passage, was not a king but a priest. In a time of national apostasy he was a political and a religious reformer. He overthrew the idolatrous and murderous queen that had usurped the throne, and placed the rightful sovereign upon it. In this same chapter we read of a degenerate king who died. They buried him in the city of David, but they did not bury him in the sepulchres of the kings. Because of his high crimes he was deemed unworthy of the burial given the good priest.

The text fitly describes the ministry of the good man whom God has taken to himself. Francis Marion Rains did good in our Israel, both toward God and toward His house. On his graduation forty-one years ago he began his public life. He taught for two years in the academy in Corinth, Kentucky, and preached for the church in the town. Then he was called to the church in Winfield, Kansas. After two years in Winfield he was called to serve the church in Leavenworth in the same state. Because of his ability and his efficiency in the pastorate he was called, after one year in Leavenworth, to serve the Kansas Christian Missionary Society. He made his home in Topeka and from Topeka he went out all over the state planting churches in destitute fields, and fostering churches that had been planted but were still weak. He served the Kansas Society for three years, and then was called by the newly organized Board of Church Extension as its secretary. By his eloquent and powerful advocacy he got the claims of that great cause before the churches to such an extent that the work of his successor, George W. Muckley, was somewhat easier than otherwise it would have been.

Mr. Rains labored with the Board of Church Extension for three years, and then became associated with the Standard Publishing Company. Part of the time he served the company as field agent, and part of the time in the office as business manager. He was called from the Standard Publishing Company to the Foreign Society. He began his work for the Society on the first day of September, 1893, and continued in its employment until the twenty-fourth day of October, 1919, when his ransomed spirit went home to God.

In the twenty-six years that he served the Society he did many things, but the work in which he specialized was that of increasing its receipts. This was a work for which he was eminently qualified because of his resourcefulness, his unquenchable enthusiasm, and his boundless optimism. Men speak of the "demonic energy" of Lloyd George. With equal propriety we can speak of the "demonic energy" of Francis Marion Rains. He was a source of perpetual wonder to his associates. In the time he was with the Society the receipts increased from seventy thousand dollars a year to seven hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars last year. To be sure, all this increase was not due to him; other men did what they could; but until his health began to fail he was the principal factor. Besides increasing the receipts for the general fund he raised money for hospitals, for schools and colleges, for chapels, for orphanages and for homes. These buildings, scattered all over the world, are some of his monuments. He introduced the Annuity Plan and the Living Link idea among our people, and was the first man to lay stress on bequests.

As secretary of the Society Mr. Rains spoke much before churches and conventions. He visited all parts of the continent where we have churches; he visited the Orient twice, and Europe and Australia each once. He spoke everywhere and always with marvelous power. His voice was as clear as a bell and rang out like a trumpet. The largest audiences heard every word with perfect ease. God gave him wit and humor as well as pathos and passion, and the people drank in his messages as the thirsty land drinks in water. What is more, they remembered and acted upon what he said. The churches in Australia said that they never heard such missionary appeals as fell from his lips.

Mr. Rains knew the value of the printed page and made large use of literature in his propaganda. He assisted in editing The Intelligencer, and The Voice, and The March Offering Manual, and The Children's Day Manual, and other publications. On his foreign tours he reported what he saw and heard. He wrote much, and he wrote well. Like Luther's, his words were half battles: they were living things with hands and feet. He knew by instinct what the people wanted, and he gave them that. He insisted that every circular letter, every leaflet, every booklet, and every magazine that left the mission rooms should not only be instructive as regards substance, but attractive in appearance as well; good paper, good ink, good press work and good illustrations.

While in the service of the Society Mr. Rains, as a side line, dedicated more than a thousand church buildings and raised large sums of money to pay church debts. He was in constant demand for work of this nature. Had there been three Sundays in the week instead of one, he could have dedicated a church in every one throughout the year. Usually, all the money needed was secured in the morning. In that event the afternoon and the evening services were of a missionary character. These dedicatory services afforded him unrivaled opportunities for enlisting tens of thousands of men and women in support of the missionary cause. When the work of the day was done he took a train for home, when that was possible, and was at his desk the next morning as fresh as if he had been off on a holiday. The money he received for his services went into the treasury of the Society. The greater part of his salary was raised in this way.

Mr. Rains was what the Scriptures call a "true yoke-fellow." Though his was a positive and aggressive nature, and though he had strong convictions, he could do teamwork. He and his associates did not always see eye to eye on questions of policy and method. But once a question was decided, even though the decision was contrary to his best judgment, that was an end of the matter. There was no resentment or coldness because his view did not prevail. There was not a trace of envy or jealousy in his nature. He was loyal to his fellow workers and always spoke well of them. He was quick to recognize and to applaud good work by whomsoever done. He cared little for credit for himself; he had the approval of his own conscience and that was enough. If the work went forward and prospered he was satisfied.

While the work of the Society had the first claim upon him, Mr. Rains was interested in every department of the work of the Kingdom. He was an advocate of every political and every social and every moral reform. He was an advocate of nation-wide and world-wide prohibition, of universal suffrage and of every other cause that had as its objectives the welfare of humanity and the glory of Christ. In increasing the receipts of the Foreign Society he made it easier for every other society to increase its receipts. The methods he invented were borrowed by others, and with good results. Years ago President McGarvey asked him to become a trustee of the College of the Bible. His hands were full, and he was unwilling to assume any additional obligations; but his former teacher and friend pressed the matter upon him, saying that he needed his counsel and assistance. He accepted the trust and served the institution faithfully and helpfully.

Mr. Rains was "given to hospitality." And what a genial and gracious host he was! He was never happier than when he had friends under his roof and at his table. Most of the missionaries of the Society and missionaries of other societies were entertained by him and Mrs. Rains. He wanted to know the missionaries more intimately, to learn of their problems and needs, and what the Society could do to meet their needs and increase their influence. To missionaries on furlough and to missionary candidates, a visit in his home was like rivers of water in a dry place, like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. And because of his hospitality there are men and women in the fields who were refreshed and heartened by him in his home who will mourn with us when they hear of his departure to be with the Lord.

Onward, Christian soldiers! Marching as to war,

No one saw Mr. Rains at his best who did not see him in his home. It was there that all the gentleness and tenderness and chivalry of his nature found expression. He loved his wife and children with a surpassing love. When he crossed his own threshold the cares and perplexities and annoyances of the mission rooms were left behind. Canon Kingsley used to say that there was more laughter in his home than in any other home in England. It is safe to say that there were few homes in America in which there was more contagious laughter and more riotous mirth than in the home of our friend. There a guest found what Milton called "jest, and youthful jollity." Mr. Rains was a boy to the last, and it was in his home that the boy side of his nature was seen to best advantage. But there was another side; his life was not all mirth and gaiety. There was a serious element, and that was in evidence also. On the breakfast table there was the New Testament. Before partaking of food the Word of God was read and prayer was offered. When the Daily Altar was published he procured a copy and was delighted with it. He used it as long as he was able to go to the table. More than that, he spoke to his friends and visitors of this book and urged them to use it in their family worship. Not only so, but he went before his children in the way of holiness and said to them, "This is the way, walk you in it."

Mr. Rains was not a scholar in the technical sense of that word; but he was an educated man. He attended the common schools of his native state, the academy in Columbia conducted by W. K. Azbill, and the College of the Bible. But he always regretted that he did not have a university training, and said that if he could begin life over again he would not enter upon his public career without a thorough course in some first-class university. Abraham Lincoln and Isaac Errett were not university men, but they were the peers of most university men. Mr. Rains spoke accurately and most effectively. His native ability, his studious habits, his extensive travels with eyes and ears open, his intercourse with people of all classes compensated in large measure for the lack of training which he deplored, and made him the equal, if not the superior, of the average university man. It may not be generally known, but Mr. Rains read more than most professional men. He read on the trains, and at home, and whenever he had a few leisure moments. He had a good library and knew what it contained. Within three months of his death his friend, Judge Swing, told him that if he wished to know what was going on in the world he should read a New York paper in addition to the Cincinnati papers. He subscribed for the New York World and read it till he could read no more.

It should be said, and said with emphasis, that Mr. Rains was a genuinely religious man. He was educated by Robert Graham, Isaiah B. Grubbs and John W. McGarvey, and was by them instructed in the fundamentals of our holy religion, and from these fundamentals he never departed by so much as a hair's breadth. He held the sovereignty of God, the Deity and Saviorhood and Lordship of Christ, the agency of the Holy Spirit in conversion and sanctification, the inspiration and all-sufficiency of the Scripture, the observance of the ordinances as given to us, the church as God's instrument to bring in the Kingdom. His reading and his experiences broadened his horizon and modified some of his early opinions and views, but they did not affect the fundamentals. He kept his mind open to truth from all sources; he was a forward-looking man; in the best sense he was a modern man; but he was as loyal to the faith once for all delivered to the saints as any of his illustrious teachers in the College of the Bible. As the end approached he could make Paul's words his own, "I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith."

Mr. Rains loved the Lord, and the Lord's house, and the Lord's people, and the Lord's day. He loved the church, he honored the church, he supported the church. As long as he was able he attended the morning service, the evening service and the midweek service. He was ever the stanch and loyal friend of the minister in charge. Mr. Rains was a man of faith and prayer. He read the Bible and guided his life and conduct by its teaching. One of the last things that he asked for was his Bible. Because of the "mortal mist" that covered his eyes he could not read a word of it, but it was a satisfaction to handle the Book of God, the Book whose teaching had made him wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus, the Book he had read and preached for so many years; the Book whose precepts were more precious to him than gold, yea, than much fine gold, that were sweeter than honey, and the honeycomb. He fondled and caressed the Holy Book as lovingly as he did his little grandchild a few days before.

Honor and love, and the good repute that follows faithful service as its fruit, were his portion. He was loved and he loved in return. He was proud of the religious people of which he was a member. He rejoiced in the principles for which they stood, and believed in their ultimate triumph. A week before his translation, when speaking was difficult, he kept murmuring the phrase, "I love the brethren," and after a pause he added, "with an unceasing love." That was his thought as the splendors of eternity fell upon him thick and fast, and he caught glimpses of the King in His beauty. He loved the missionaries and wore himself out in his efforts to provide them the equipment they needed for the most successful prosecution of their work. All through his life he loved our ministers and maintained that they constituted the finest body of preachers in the world. He had been in hundreds of their homes, and he spoke what he believed to be God's truth concerning them.

Four years ago, because of the great service which he had rendered, and because of the condition of his health, the Society in convention assembled elected him secretary emeritus for life. It was understood that he was free to come and go as he pleased, to do much or little or nothing at all as it suited his taste and convenience. He was grateful for this honor, but he was unwilling to be idle. He wished to live and serve for at least ten years longer. He thought that all that had been done thus far was preparatory, that we are living in the rich dawn of an ampler day, and that we are to see larger things, and it was his ambition to have a share in bringing these larger things to pass. While he was weak he was not an old man either in spirit or in appearance. His father died within three years, and he saw no reason why he might not live as long as his father. He had no organic diseases; he had done the work of three ordinary men, and he died from sheer exhaustion. Measured by the calendar Mr. Rains was comparatively a young man; measured by his achievements he lived longer than the oldest of the Patriarchs. He was eager to live on and to assist in the work of the Society; at the same time he realized that he was in God's hands, and that God knew what is best. At noon on Friday God called him and, like Valiant-for-truth in Bunyan's immortal allegory, he passed over, and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side.

"And they buried him in the city of David among the kings, because he had done good in Israel, both toward God, and toward His house." When Livingstone's body was brought to England the nation wished to pay him the highest honor of which it was capable. The supreme honor was a burial in Westminster Abbey. The sentiment of the people expressed itself in the lines,

> "Open the Abbey doors, and bear him in.
> To sleep with king and statesman, chief and sage.
> The missionary come of weaver kin.
> But great by work that brooks no lower wage."

And so the sacred dust of Livingstone rests in Westminster Abbey, the pantheon of the British Empire, among kings and statesmen, among the greatest men the empire has produced. the men that fertilized the world with their inventions and discoveries and services.

If among the Disciples of Christ there were a Westminster Abbey, or a pantheon, or a hall of fame, undoubtedly Francis Marion Rains would be assigned a place of highest honor in it, a place among the kings. We have no royal sepulchres. How then can we show our regard for this heroic servant of the King, this mighty missionary leader? We shall deposit his wasted form in beautiful Spring Grove cemetery, beside those whom he loved long since and lost a while: and we shall enshrine him in our hearts and keep him there till the walls thereof shall molder and crumble to dust away, because he did good in Israel, both toward God and toward His house.

The truly earnest Christian must of necessity take a paramount interest in the extension and enlargement of the kingdom of the Lord Messiah. This is, indeed, humanity, in the superlative degree. If any nation or country in amity with us is in a state of physical starvation, in want of the bread of this present life, does not our humanity superlatively awaken into an efficient relief and contribution in its behalf? And how much more important is the supply of the true bread of the life everlasting than of that which perishes in the using of it.—Alexander Campbell.

Christ, the royal Master, Leads against the foe;

Fulfilling His Promise

By FRANK V. STIPP

EVERY true missionary has been thrilled by the promise of Jesus, "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." During the first century, His disciples did go and they were confident indeed that God was directing them. "Peter by a specific vision was shaken out of his narrow provincialism" and led to extend the circle of the gospel beyond the confines of the Jewish family. Paul and his companions as they journeyed by land and sea continually looking for new places for Christian endeavor, were confident of the guidance of the Holy Spirit. But the past century and the present, as well as the first, are centuries of evangelism, and His promise must apply again.

Let us notice first that God is not in the work of foreign missions to the exclusion of man.

The marvelous manifestation of missionary enthusiasm which was the mother of modern missions had its origin in the deepened spiritual life of the people and in their fuller appreciation of the person and mission of the Christ. The British and American missionary movements alike were born in the spirit of prayer. The Wesleyan revival in England had much to do in preparing the churches of that country for the great awakening of interest in world evangelization. In America the prayers that came in response to the impressive call of Jonathan Edwards in 1747 aroused the churches from their lethargy to face the great task. This call which was sounded forth from New England found its echo in old England in the person of William Carey, who after years of prayerful meditation on the world's needs, was led by the Spirit into the foreign field. The story of the first definite steps toward foreign missions in America is too familiar to require retelling. But Mills and his little hay stack band reveal a most vivid picture of the faith of man and the leading of God and we cannot but recognize the hand on their shoulders guiding them as they revealed to the Church the necessity and the possibility of world-wide evangelization.

The history of the past century also shows upon its pages the finger marks of God. It is not my purpose to tell how the walls of opposition which surrounded the various heathen countries of the world fell before the faithful ones of God. But one after another these great countries were successively and successfully entered. True enough, not without martyrdom in most cases and never without a great expenditure of patience and energy. The fact that within five years about the middle of the century, new facilities were found to aid in the opening and occupation of seven different countries, together comprising one-half the world's population, is most striking testimony. Sometimes forces outside the Church were used in the opening up of new lands to the messengers of Christ. Today we find practically the whole non-Christian world earnestly inviting and anxiously awaiting the number of missionaries sufficient to give them the gospel and all its blessings.

God has also been at work in an internal way preparing the hearts of the people for the message that is to come. Sometimes this may be through the marvelous workings of nature and sometimes through their ancient religions. The missionary to a country where one of these great ethnic faiths is in vogue has a powerful instrument at hand if he has a sympathetic understanding of that faith and can show wherein Christian principles are similar but better. I am convinced that this same policy is best in the conflict between Protestantism and Catholicism as we know it in the Philippine Islands.

This review of the past makes clear the nearness of God to the proposition of foreign missions, both at home and on the field.

Now let us examine some of the institutions of the mission field and some of the achievements of the world to see if these do not bear the marks of the Master's approval. Let us see if these are not a part of the contribution of God to the cause of missions, if they are not a part of His promise to be always with those who go out to do His will.

The great art of printing is one of these contributions, hastening the evangelization of the world: but perhaps some of us are unwilling to grant that printing is a gift of God. If it had anticipated the Reformation by a few centuries then perhaps the world and the minds of the people would have been filled by a literature lacking the note of the true religion of Christ. If it had come much later, it could not have served so admirably as the vessel to disseminate the enthusiasm and vigor of the great religious revival of the time.

To imagine the missionary propaganda being conducted without printing would be like imagining an army fighting its battles without powder. First of all there would be no printed Bibles. How often do missionaries of all lands find the soil in a certain district all mellow and receptive because a Bible has preceded them! We would have no tracts and periodicals with which to give the people in the far away districts the bread of life or free their minds of harmful prejudices or superstitions. We, ourselves, would have few of the books and periodicals with which to keep our minds alert.

Someone has said that "the printing and circulation of the Bible in a hundred different tongues is the reverse of the miracle of Babylon and the repetition of the miracle of Pentecost." Can we not see the hand of God aiding in the preparation of these translations? True enough, the great translations have been produced only by years of patient and tedious toil. Yet God was there making bright the hours of language study and enlightening the mind of the translator during periods of labor. We can see Him standing over and directing this work even as He did the selection of the canon in the days of old. Truly the idea of the Bible society was born in the mind of God in answer to the imperative need of His people and He has fostered it from the beginning.

The contribution of the improved means of travel is too familiar to need more than a mention. Just as the old Roman roads made lighter the work of the first missionaries, so the improved means of travel and communication serve us today. The foreign field is only a tenth as far from the homeland as when the first American missionaries set sail. In these days when we are covering our fields by train, automobile and motor boat, we should thank God that such things are available.

The great institutions that have sprung up show in a special way the marks of the Master's approval. The marvelous growth of some of these schools starting with nothing a few decades ago and now exerting a great influence and enjoying an enviable standing among the schools of the world indicate to us that an agency is at work greater than those of man. The men who have built up these schools are not such intellectual giants or experienced administrators as to warrant such triumphs alone. What is it then? Simply the fulfillment of Jesus' promise of companionship. Likewise we can see the medical and the purely evangelistic institutions going forward, extending their influence wider and wider, wherever men are working under the Master Workman.

The third plane, we should be able to distinguish the voice of Jesus speaking words of wisdom in our council meetings and in all the councils of the true forces of evangelization.

The distribution of the various missionary agencies throughout the world has back of it a plan and system that seems to be beyond the mind of man. This fact is especially remarkable when we remember the number of units participating. A century ago the workers were few in number and located at widely separated points. Reports of years ago show about six thousand principal mission stations with 22,000 out-stations, each occupying a place of strategic importance and wielding an influence in most cases over a wide expanse of territory, penetrating into the very heart of the non-Christian lands. In most places, notably central Africa, the stations are so located as to best withstand the onslaught of the enemies of the gospel.

We need but a glance at the lives of the early pioneers, such as Livingstone, Judson, Carey, Verbeck and others, to prove that they were located according to the will of God. Each was one in ten thousand for the work to which he was sent. Guided by the Holy Spirit, they were all able to find that place where they could the best serve in the largest way.

The native Christians as well, are becoming firmly established in their own lands. With a force of over two million communicants and a hundred thousand religious workers, they are preaching the gospel in an effective manner. We can see God helping the people through that difficult period of transition from heathenism and worldliness to Christianity. The sacrifice that is usually incurred and the great mental and religious adjustment that is always a part of the process often require a force of will above that of the coverts in Christian lands. Such an authority as John R. Mott confidently makes the statement that Christianity is so firmly fixed in the minds and hearts and lives of the native people that should it be blotted out in America and Europe, it would spring up anew in the mission field as a self-propagating force and again cover the earth.

This leads us on to another point where the wisdom of God is manifest and that is in the power of the native churches. In the Philippines the native church can boast of nothing extraordinary in this respect, but we can see the dawning of a brighter day. Throughout the world the day of self-support, self-propagation and self-government is coming nearer and nearer. Churches that can support their own pastors and work are no longer a rarity. I am convinced also that in the Philippines when the Protestant work becomes self-supporting it will be through the quickening of the souls of the people by the Spirit of God rather than by the urging of the missionary.

Christian union on the mission field is the final testimony that Jesus is speaking words of wisdom in our mission councils. The missionaries have realized from the first that the difficulties and urgency of the task demand the most efficient use of all the available resources. Besides this the elemental needs of the people call for what is fundamental and essential in Christian doctrine. Not many years ago, at a meeting of all the Protestant forces in China, it was unanimously declared, "We are one in regard to the great body of doctrine of the Christian faith."

This vital and spiritual unity often takes expression in the various lines of evangelistic activity. Union colleges are now considered by far the most economical and practical, and have been established in most mission fields. This unity on the mission field is coming to exert a beneficent influence on our churches at home. Perhaps our Master's prayer for Christian unity will come to the world as a gift from the churches on the foreign field, which the Holy Spirit has shielded in a large measure from the evils of division.

Now lastly, can we not see the face of the Master as he goes along the way with us, smiling a kind benediction upon all our sincere efforts? It is that smile which calls the young student volunteer out from his home and friends. Only this can give him power to bid farewell to an aged mother, perhaps for the last time. Later he must again catch sight of this smile as he faces the choice of separation from his children or taking them to a place where they will lack the things necessary for their proper development. It is this smile of benediction which causes the missionary to stick to his task. He often faces difficulties, loneliness, ill health, or sometimes disagreeable work, and yet the smile of the Master and His "Well done" are sufficient to make the true missionary victorious over all. He is sometimes tempted to give up his work, by large salaries offered by commercial firms. Sometimes it is the desire to be freed from the most exacting responsibility which would call him away. Sometimes the temptation comes more insidiously in the form of an influential pulpit or place of service at home. But if he keeps his eyes on the Master's face, he can stand up to his every duty and do it.

The missionary sometimes finds himself out on a lonely march, the stars overhead, and the indistinct path at his feet. His lone human companion is a man of another race and color, with little in common except the same God and the same faith. It is not a setting which would of itself make buoyant the spirits of the traveler. Yet the missionary tells himself again and again that he is the most fortunate being in the world. He has a strange desire to shout his joy to heaven. Whence comes this contentment and joy? Certainly not from worldly conditions or environment. It is simply the joy that the Christian experiences when he is on the mountain top with Jesus; it is the promise of Jesus being fulfilled in all its reality. It comes again as he stands before a hungering group of people and tells them for the first time of the rich promises of God. It comes as he stands in the midst of his people whom he has seen gradually emerging year after year from heathenism and worldliness to that perfect standard set for all men. It is this joy, this smile of the Master, His words of benediction, which make the life of the missionary tolerable.

What then shall we say? Can we see God in the work of foreign missions? We can scarcely see anything else. Yet man is there, an important factor, doing his bit and always realizing that his efforts are being multiplied by that same hand that multiplied the offering of the little lad on the shore of Galilee. The creature working with the Creator, the servant working with his Master, man working with his God. Let us then watch anew for the footprints of the Master beside our own, for the marks of His approval upon our work, for His voice as He sits with us in council and for that loving smile which calls us on to greater and better lives. Let us claim anew for ourselves that rich promise of Jesus, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Laoag, Philippine Islands.

Regarding the missionary spirit as of the essence of the spirit of the gospel, let us, then, cultivate, cherish, and display it in the labor of love, and in the perseverance of hope. Let us bear in mind, that God is with us in this great work, and that he has ordained that they that water others, shall themselves be watered out of the river of life; and that those who are blessings to others, shall be blessed of God themselves.—Alexander Campbell.

Brothers, we are treading Where the saints have trod;

Penalizing the Preacher

By F. E. SMITH

PENALIZING the preacher is so a reality that often it has had the effect of paralyzing him. We have piled the work on our servants in the gospel until many of them have been broken—not on the ancient wheel of torture—but as effectively by the heartbreak caused by lack of support and the body-break of trying to do three men's work. How many missionaries of the cross now fill untimely graves because of their early exhaustion. How many a preacher has been compelled to quit before—and not always before—the collapse came. Many of our most effective workers who are lost to the cause of Christ, should today be at their best service had we not thoughtlessly failed them and allowed them to break under the awful load.

The effect of it all is most unhappy in its tendency to keep the young man out of the ministry. The handicap placed on the preacher he feels is unfair and he is not willing to be so subjected. We thus penalize the ministry by keeping out the choicest of our youth just when they are sorely needed and greatly called of God.

Another way the preacher is penalized is by the inadequate support given him in his work. The early returns of the surveys of the Interchurch World Movement indicate that the per capita now paid for ministerial support is less than it was in 1850. The Church, her numbers and resources have increased greatly since then, but the increase in the preacher's support has not kept pace. There is scarcely left a profession, trade or task that does not average much higher in support than the ministry. The condition has been chronic so long that we take it for granted. We have lost our sense of self-respect in the support of our preachers. The striking miners average double the annual support of the preacher in America.

The man of God cannot strike. He can wear himself out, bear the burden of sin and conscience as none other, fall at his task and glory in the cause that so consumes him, but he cannot strike. Yet, a more deadly thing is going on. Quietly and almost unnoticed he is leaving the ministry. It is hard for us to believe that any true minister ever quits and yet there are times when the pressure is so great that one cannot wholly condemn them when sorely needed workers leave the ranks. They seldom come back, whatever be the cause of their leaving and many, too many times, they cease to count in Kingdom usefulness in any way. In one single day there came to our office the information of four men leaving their places in the gospel. In every case their names were known well beyond the borders of their state.

Again, it sometimes seems that we say to our preachers, "Well, if you are bound to preach we will make it as hard for you as we can." The amount of unpaid salaries due ministers that never will be paid would make a good start toward a competency for old age. We have often made the preacher play banker and extend credit to a whole church on his salary overdue, for weeks and even months. This is going out of fashion. Most self-respecting churches now pay their bills to their preachers and if credit has to be used they go to the proper place, the bank, which does this as a business. Regular payment of the salary promised is only the decent and expected thing, but does much to relieve anxiety at the manse. A church we recently visited has a pride in the custom, and preserves it as a matter of sentiment, to hand the minister his check in advance payment, just before he enters his pulpit. I presume that they reason that they get better preaching that way. At any rate they have a live preacher and a growing church.

Perhaps the most shameless is the last possible penalty that can be imposed for being a preacher, that of neglect in old age. This bitter burden is reserved for the time when he is defenseless and cannot even quit. He must drink the last unwelcome dregs of such a cup. The suffering, heartache and agony of mind caused him and his loved ones can never be put into words. He can suffer, but he cannot complain, and because he goes on in silence the churches too often take it for granted that all is well. For himself it does not matter so much, but to see those who are dearer to him than life compelled to suffer privation brings an anguish that has in it the essence of an exquisite torture.

And yet for all this, with the handicap and penalty imposed, he is the eyes of our soul. We can never reach higher in the spiritual than he leads us. It is often heartless, the way we treat him by our thoughtlessness, but the greater damage is not to him but to the church, to the souls of men. We will awake some day, and we should see the plain fact now, that all the time we have been doing injustice to our own and our children's souls. We save our money and equipment from our leaders, but in doing so blight our own souls and blind the future.

We are not divided, All one body we,

The Board of Ministerial Relief gives the widest publicity to the recommendations of the Cincinnati Convention regarding the ministry. Few are the churches that cannot heed the suggestion and all be richer for so doing. It is recommended that,—(1) All salaries under $1,500 per year be increased 25 per cent; (2) All salaries between $1,500 and $2,000 be increased 20 per cent; (3) All salaries between $2,000 and $3,000 be increased 15 per cent; (4) All salaries above $3,000 be increased 10 per cent. It will soon be that a church dare not be unjust in the matter of a living support any more than any other institution. What irony in the statement when by all the rights of her place she should lead, here as in all else.

The convention also recommended that all Bible schools use the Christmas service with an offering for Ministerial Relief. Further, and more than in a missionary sense, that every church pay 6 per cent on the minister's salary and that all ministers enroll in the Pension System. The 6 per cent goes to the support of the twofold task of this Board—the Relief roll and the Pension department. This has to do not only with the ministry, but back of that with the whole success of the church.

The Yellow God

By CHARLES LLOYD GARRISON

One of the most interesting articles I have ever read, unusual and splendid. I think we should publish it in WORLD CALL and should also consider its publication in tract form. A. E. CORY.

CONCEIVED of old in the womb of Time, the Yellow God was born, not fair and goodly, but a foul, misshapen, monstrous creature. If one would think of him in material and tangible form, perhaps this fanciful portrait of the Yellow God will serve:

Picture to your imagination a massive hunchback with thin legs and long, gorillalike arms, ending in fingers unusual for length and grasping qualities. Sitting in the sag between hideous shoulders, visualize a head with a big, dome-shaped forehead, prominent nose and cheek-bones, the face tapering down suddenly to a narrow, peaked chin. Deep-seated under hairless, bulging brows are eyes that fairly thrust at you with rapierlike precision—small, restless, preternaturally crafty, cruel eyes—eyes that pierce even to the discernment of the secret places of the human spirit wherein dwell man's loved and cherished ideals, his ardent hopes, his master passions. Skimp and drawn appears the sallow leather of the Yellow God's beardless face, and under the cheek-bones it is sunken. His mouth is wide. His lips are thin. And the Yellow God cannot smile. When he laughs, the Yellow God parts his thin taut lips and reveals rows of immense, yellow teeth, and the cackle he emits is harsh, dry, and devoid of mirth.

Richly and gaudily appareled is the Yellow God, yet cannot the genius of his designers and tailors camouflage his deformities. Bedecked is he with sparkling gems of fabulous price; still is he repulsive. Art can do much admittedly, but no art or device of man or demigod can transform the ugliness of the Yellow God into attractiveness of form. Green and gold and purple are woven into the texture of his kingly robe; but it is written in the volume of the Book that no investiture of the Yellow God, however recent or gorgeous, shall be altogether free from traces of corrosion. Therefore are all the costly things of his imperial wardrobe pitted with moth bites and slightly tarnished by rust.

Richer far than earthly kings and famed plutocrats of old; richer far than multimillionaires of today; richer even than all the rich men who have possessed from time to time the lion's share of this world's goods—the Yellow God fairly gloats and gluts on earthly treasure. All wealth in all forms he claims, and all the crude materials of wealth. His holdings embrace stocks and bonds and vast estates. His ships traverse the seven seas, and his railway lines criss-cross the continents. His coffers are fairly bursting. Heaps and piles of silver and gold he has hoarded, and diamonds and pearls and flashing sapphires.

Temples and palaces in many lands have been erected and dedicated to the service of the Yellow God, and the fame of him has gone forth to the ends of the earth. The audience chamber in the grand temple of the Yellow God is a vast apartment paved with gold. Ivory and ebony, carved by cunning craftsmen, compose the material of its furniture and fittings. Tapestries of priceless worth hang upon the gilded walls. The rare, costly yellow jewels in the massive chandeliers impart a strange, yellowish tint to the quality of the light. Yet is not this as it should be? Is not this the throne-room of the Yellow God?

Upon a dais at the far end of the spacious chamber, crowned and sceptered and sprayed with sickly, yellowish light, seated high upon a colossal throne of tarnished ivory and gold, behold him—the incarnation of human greed, the spirit of cupidity, the embodiment of covetousness—the Yellow God, who barters with men for their souls, giving them—or rather promising to give them—material possessions in exchange therefor.

Thrones have fallen, idols have tarnished and crumbled, and nameless rites and ceremonies whereby the devotees of other days sought to placate the spirit of the Untoward have perished from the minds of men, but the kingdom of the Yellow God has increased with the passing centuries. Wide is his rule, and popular; and as for the power wielded by the Yellow God, how shall we, with limited words, define its vast reaches? In comparison with his imperial power the influence and prerogatives of presidents, prime ministers, and kings of states, are limited and trivial. The great ones of the earth rise and fall, and their days pass as a tale that is told; but the Yellow God reigns on, unmindful of human woe, unmoved by the solemn flight of time. Of the lesser gods he is supergod; and he is yellow through and through!

The Yellow God embitters brother against brother, and causes the son to filch from the cash register in his father's store. In the service of the Yellow God, men lie, steal, defraud, and commit murder. At his behest all law, both human and divine, is trampled under foot. Through the subtle influence of the Yellow God, individuals, groups, classes and nations are led to defy inspired legislation and to infringe upon the most vital principles of justice and fair play. By him the workingman and the capitalist are alienated, so that each becomes to the other an Ishmaelite. Because of him come strikes boycots, lockouts, walkouts, riots, wars, and Bolshevism. He fills sanitariums with nervous wrecks, he peoples our insane asylums with the mentally unbalanced, he overflows our jails and penitentiaries with criminals. He undermines the strong foundation of youthful ambition. He spoils "the twilight and the evening star." He seduces genius and leads unnumbered multitudes astray.

And the Yellow God laughs!

Cunning, heartless, insatiable in his passion for human worship, the Yellow God proffers his tawdry wares in exchange for the finer stuffs of the spirit; and men bargain with him to their eternal hurt. The golden pomegranates that grow in the garden of the Yellow God are full of deadly poison. Instead of finding happiness and immunity, power and prestige, glory and honor, the dupes of the Yellow God are mocked at last by the emptiness of false promises and the obvious vanity and vexation of misdirected energies. Great men and small, and all sorts and conditions of men in between, fall down and worship before the throne of the Yellow God. Wise men and fools are amongst his followers. Kings, princes, priests, statesmen, men of letters, men of affairs, and men of common and inconspicuous mold—all kinds, all types—go up to the temple of the Yellow God to avow their fealty.

And the Yellow God laughs!

Men moil and toil for the Yellow God. For him they do and dare. For the Yellow God men brave the perils of the sea and the wilderness—the burning glare and deadly fevers of the tropics and the treacherous ice floes and eternal cold of the frigid zones! For the Yellow God the candle of life is burned at both ends. No task is too hazardous, no sin too black, to be undertaken at the behest of the Yellow God.

I'll go where you want me to go, Yellow God,
Over land or over sea!
I'll do what you want me to do, Yellow God!
I'll be what you want me to be!

In palace and hovel the Yellow God is worshiped. To the Yellow God altars are reared in high places, and the peans of his praise sound like the voice of many waters.

And the Yellow God laughs!

Crowns and thrones may perish, Kingdoms rise and wane,

The Master Teacher—whose words were as flashes of white light—warned men time and again to beware of the sin of cupidity. "Take heed, and beware of covetousness," he admonishes, "for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." (Luke 12:15.) "Labor not for the meat which perisheth," he pleads, "but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." (John 6:27.) He would have men put the major emphasis upon the paramount value, the supremely worthful. Therefore: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." (Matt. 6:33.) In the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:3-9; 18-23.) "the deceitfulness of riches" is mentioned as a prolific source of unfruitfulness, in that it "chokes the word," and defeats its growth and development in the heart, and its full fruition in personal redemption.

Mammon—a term designating the Syrian god of riches—was often upon his lips, and always he used it in connection with some solemn warning or withering rebuke. "No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns: yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" (Matt. 6:24-26.)

Jesus recognizes the fact that man is incurably acquisitive; that he must seek, because it is his nature to seek; but he lays great stress on the what and the wherefore of man's seeking. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." (Matt. 6:19-21.)

Joseph of Arimathea and Zacchaeus the publican were rich men. And Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, must have been a woman of means. And it is quite possible that there were other consistent disciples of our Lord whom he personally won from the ranks of the rich and the well-to-do. At the same time we cannot fail to note that, in the teaching of Jesus, wealth is regarded as an hindrance, if not indeed a serious handicap or peril. "Woe unto you that are rich; for ye have received your consolation!" (Luke 6:24.) "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!"—a statement which He himself elucidates by adding: "How hard is it for those who trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." (Mark 10:23-25.)

Full of human interest and pathos is the classic instance of the rich young ruler who came running to Jesus with the fine, manly inquiry: "Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" (Mark 10:17-22.) We can easily picture the scene. The Master halts, turns about and looks into the clean-cut features of this clear-eyed, high-born young man.

"Thou knowest the commandments, do not commit adultery, do not kill, do not steal, do not bear false witness, honor thy father and mother."

"All these have I observed from my youth," he replies—not boastfully, but as a modest statement of fact. "What lack I yet?"

It was an unusual case. "Jesus beholding him, loved him." He was evidently a fine specimen of manhood both physically and mentally. He must have walked with shoulders back and head erect, looking the whole world in the face, for he had nothing of which to be ashamed.

Jesus must have yearned to enlist him for life service in the Kingdom. Having looked into the soul of that young man and discerned all, Jesus speaks—not abruptly, we must suppose, but with calm, purposeful deliberation: "Go and sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, if thou wilt be perfect, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me."

It was a hard saying, and when he had heard it the light faded from the eyes of the young man, and his countenance fell. He was surprised and disappointed, and sorrowfully he goes his way, "for he had great possessions."

Had the young man inherited an estate which had been acquired by some species of profiteering whereby the poor had been robbed in order that the young man's father or grandfather might be enriched? Did the wealth, into the possession of which the young man had come, belong in reality to the poor? Or was it that the Master, who needed not to be told what is in the mind of man, in that the secrets of the human heart were as an open book to him—did Jesus detect in the heart of this man an inclination to covetousness, which could be checked for all time only by the one complete sacrifice? One or the other it must have been: which of the two we cannot know.

But the Church of Jesus Constant will remain;

Anyhow the soul of the rich young ruler was jeopardized by the power of the Yellow God.

There was just one chance of saving him from the snares and pitfalls of riches; one chance of winning him from the subtle power of the Yellow God, whose meat and drink it is to damn the souls of men. Jesus took that chance—and lost.

With no further inquiry, with no word of comment, the rich young ruler makes his sorrowful exit from the presence of our Lord. When the better impulses of his heart prompted him to seek the Kingdom and its life and fellowship, the hand of the Yellow God reached out and held him back so that he could not enter in.

The parable of the rich fool is notable also. Some one appealed to Him: "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me."

Jesus declines to arbitrate this difference, saying: "Man, who made me a judge or divider over you?" Then follows a warning against covetousness, then comes the parable.

"The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: and he reasoned within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have not where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my grain and my goods. And I will say to my soul: Soul, thou has much goods laid up for many years: take thine ease, eat, drink, be merry. But God said unto him, Thou foolish one, this night is thy soul required of thee; and the things which thou hast prepared, whose shall they be?" (Luke 12:16-20.)

This man is pronounced a fool because he defies God. God says: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of my mouth." This man proposes to subsist on an earthly diet.

A fool is he because he has lost the true sense of life's values. He deliberately invites his soul to feast and fatten, as a hog takes on weight by eating corn!

This man is a fool, because he is a moral slacker. He dares to say, "Soul, take thine ease!" Don't fight! What's the use? Give up! Compromise! Have peace at any price! The consistent follower of Jesus Christ must say: "Unconquered soul, fight on!"

"My soul, be on thy guard!
Ten thousand foes arise;
The hosts of sin are pressing hard
To draw thee from the skies."

This man is a fool because he is a sensualist; because he reduces the supremely worthful in life to the pursuit of selfish pleasures. He is carnally-minded. He is a materialistic hedonist, who cannot rise higher in thought and aspiration than the level of his bodily desires. Any world-theory, individual or national, resting upon such a false, unworthy, and sinful basis, carries within itself the fruitful germs of death.

But most of all, this man is a fool, because he is an egoist: he is attempting to live to himself alone. Notice the significant recurrence of the personal pronouns "I" and "mine."

Our Lord did not condemn the rich fool because he happened to possess broad acres; nor yet because he seeded the soil in season and garnered a large harvest; but rather because of the selfish and sinful use he deliberately sought to make of these things.

This comes out in his own striking comment on this parable. "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God."

If one is rich towards God, it matters little whether he has, or has not, succeeded in laying up treasures on earth. One may be rich in both earthly and heavenly treasures: in both heavenly and earthly treasures one may be poor; one may be rich in earthly treasures and poor in heavenly; or one may be poor in this world's goods, yet rich toward God.

When one comes to examine carefully the various kinds of franchise by which wealth in any of its outward forms is held among men, one must confess that possessions of all kinds are, in reality, only species of stewardship. Inheritance from others, purchase by gradual accumulations, invention or discovery—how can any of these accredited methods of acquiring an equity perpetuate that equity beyond the lifetime of the present holder? The sleazy greenbacks and the worn silver coins that pay a man's weekly wage have passed through a thousand hands. At different times in the history of the country scores of different men have possessed deeds to a given tract of land. Stocks and bonds in the strong box of the safety vault belong to a man only while he lives. And so with all other forms of earthly treasure. "Whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?" Somebody else's; not yours. And on and on goes the unending procession—a limited tenure, temporary holding, a transient equity. We are living souls, but these temporary holdings are other stuff.

Straight into the heart of this matter goes the parable of the unjust steward. (Luke 16:1-9.) "The lord commended the unjust steward because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Neither the rich man nor our Lord commended the steward because he was dishonest, but rather because he had sense enough to look beyond the limited tenure of his stewardship. Being unable to dig, and too proud to beg, he faced the day when he should still require food and shelter. So he gave—incidentally out of somebody else's abundance—in order that he might acquire lasting favor. "And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations."

"Will a man rob God?" exclaims Malachi, the last of Israel's illustrious preachers of righteousness who pioneered the way for the Great Prophet. Then follows a startling, scathing indictment of a whole nation. "Ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it!" (Malachi 3:8-10.) But the influence of Jehovah's impassioned and anointed prophet was not great enough to stem the tide of Israel's apostasy. Fascinated and enthralled were they by the lies and wiles of the Yellow God.

Stewardship was both a vital doctrine and a general practice among believers in the early days of the Christian Church. Then its nature, scope, and function were clearly understood by all those who came into the Kingdom. Christ's Apostles, who had themselves given up all to follow their Lord, placed proportionate emphasis upon a thing which had loomed so large in the mind of their Master. One result of this teaching appears to have been the voluntary formation of a communistic group by members of the church at Jerusalem. (Acts 2:24; 4:32-35.) Luke's condensed account of this experience does not give us any intimation as to how it worked out in practice. But whether the experiment was successful or not, from an economic standpoint, the very fact that it was tried at all proves that the Apostles, evangelists, and teachers of the Church, in the classic period of its doctrinal purity, emphatically proclaimed the gospel of stewardship.

From time to time, in the long centuries separating the Apostolic Age from our day, stewardship has received only local or transcient emphasis. In the building of the doctrinal temple, stewardship was the stone the builders rejected. And lo, it was a chief corner stone.

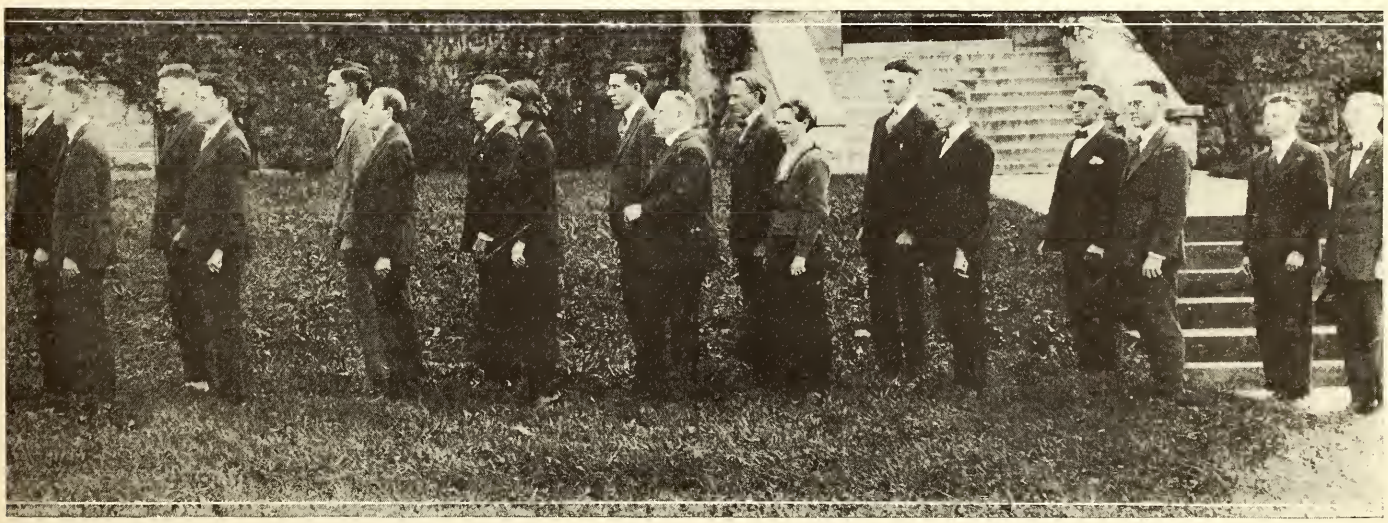
It is a pity that the pioneers of our own religious movement, who had a passion for New Testament precedents, categorical commands, and even implicit, but unstated, corollaries, should have strangely overlooked this vital matter. In the Book they thumbed so dexterously stewardship was there, sunclear and emphatic; but they seem not to have seen it.

Giving is more than an essential condition of spiritual growth and development; giving is a spiritual exercise. Giving is a means of grace, and a grace. Giving is worship.

One of the most heartening symptoms of our day is the growing interest in the gospel of stewardship. In many local groups of believers new recruits to the Kingdom are being instructed and trained in giving. The Every-Member Canvass is helping to bring the obligation and privilege of systematic, proportionate, and scriptural giving home to the hearts and minds of increasing numbers. Many gifts of our day undoubtedly represent the fine spirit of sacrifice, and along with the material substance, there goes the sweet incense of prayer; but who will say that we have begun to measure up to the stature of fulness in this holy thing? The Yellow God has so popularized the heresy of absolute ownership; so insidiously has he instilled it into the thought-life, institutions, and customs of our age (and all ages) that the error yields slowly.

But, as truth will, in the end, prevail; and as the strong Captain of our salvation will not cease to lead onward till all evil principalities are overthrown and transformed, we may be well assured that the scepter ultimately will be stricken from the hand of the Yellow God. Until that time men may talk social justice, but the practice of it on any wide scale will not appear. Neither will wars cease. Nor will we have here or elsewhere an end of profiteering.

The millennium doth not appear till the worship of the Yellow God shall have yielded to the full-orbed worship of the God of heaven and earth.



We have Christ's own promise, And that cannot fail.

Facing the New Year in the Bible School

New Conditions—New Demands

THE Bible schools of the brotherhood have faced some exacting years in times gone by, but none so strenuous in its demands as 1920 will be.

We are facing changing conditions, and with them changing demands. Recent development all point clearly and unmistakably to the fact that what this old world needs most of all is that society shall be permeated with the spirit of Jesus Christ. The world doesn't know it yet, but what it is clamoring for in these days of industrial unrest and strife is the application of the principles of social justice as advocated by the Son of God, the use of which will solve its problems and bring social peace. The demand of 1920 is for the Christian reconstruction of society.

Nineteen twenty will demand that the Bible school adopt a policy that squares with the changed conditions under which it is working.

Nineteen twenty will demand that the Bible school give itself a thorough overhauling, and that its outworn, traditional methods and inadequate ideals be scrapped.

Nineteen twenty will demand that the Bible school give larger place in its curriculum to the teachings of the prophets and the teachings of Jesus as they affect our social life.

Nineteen twenty will demand of the Bible school that it enter upon quantity production of Jesus-minded boys and girls with a passion for justice and fair play.

Nineteen twenty will demand the highest type of leadership in the Bible school that has yet been produced. Men and women in numbers will need to go into training for positions of rare opportunity for service.

As we face 1920 it is apparent that we shall have to adopt some new working principles if the demands of the next decade are to be met.

If the Bible school has caught the spirit of this new day 1920 will find it no longer placing reliance upon schemes that have nothing whatever in common with the aims and purposes of Christian education, in order to hold its people together or attract new people, but will abandon all irrelevant schemes and place itself on a thoroughly educational basis.

If the Bible school has caught the spirit of this new day 1920 will find it working shoulder to shoulder with all the Sunday schools of its locality to get the combined childhood and youth into the combined church schools of the community. Take any community—it matters not where it happens to be—and the chances are you will find less than 50 per cent of the school children of that community receiving religious instruction of any kind. Can we hope for a great national religious life under such conditions?

If the Bible school has caught the spirit of this new day 1920 will find it more than ever consecrated to the purpose of helping its pupils,—

1. To know God as He has revealed Himself to us in His Word, in nature, in the heart of man, and in Christ.
2. To exercise toward God the Father, and His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior, Trust, Obedience, and Worship.
3. To know and do our duty to others.
4. To know and do our duty to ourselves.

If the Bible school has caught the spirit of this new day 1920 will find it investigating the possibilities of extending the work of Christian education into the week, and even making the first modest attempts to maintain a fuller educational program. Take any community you will and the chances are that the childhood and youth of that community are getting only a fraction of the religious instruction that is fairly due them. Lesson materials are now available and instructions are to be had for carrying on a week-day extension of the Bible school.

If the Bible school has caught the spirit of this new day 1920 will find it launching a real program of social service that aims at relieving distress in the community, righting social wrongs and injustices, cleansing the cities of civic corruption and vice and the Americanization of the foreign-born in our midst. Much of the social distress of the times is due to misguided immigrants and their second-generation offspring who do not understand our American ideals and have never had the chance to learn.

Here is a program that challenges our heroic qualities as the war never did. Here is something like a "moral equivalent of war," which a late philosopher declared we need. Shall we get ready next year for the most signal advance in the history of the Bible school?

Possibilities and Responsibilities

With our backs to the past, its failures and successes, we face a new year with greater opportunities for service.

If our Bible schools are to really function as the "Teaching Service of the Church" or "The Church School," we must enlarge our vision of their possibilities and responsibilities; and the responsibilities must be considered individually, not collectively.

We must face the new year with optimism, but with the realization that a changing world presents the greatest challenge to service that the Bible schools have ever faced.

It is a sad fact that a very small percentage of the membership of any Bible school have a sense of their responsibility in that work. One of the grave problems facing the local church and the Bible school is that of impressing its individual members with a proper sense of their personal responsibilities. Unless this can be done we need not hope for unusual success.

Bible school work is not a "one-man's job." The slogan should be, "A Job for Everybody and Everybody on the Job." Every member, teacher and officer has a definite responsibility not only in the way of financial assistance, but in a contribution of personal service; a responsibility that cannot be discharged by mere attendance or by a passive interest in the work of the school or church; a responsibility limited only by the extent of each individual's ability—and everyone has some ability for doing something for the Kingdom.

The trouble has always been that too few folks were willing to pay the price of personal service; a small percentage have carried the load, while others have criticized but done nothing. Of course, some superintendents, pastors and workers may and do make mistakes; but this is the Lord's business, and the least every member can do is "get in under" and help push; be a "booster," not a "knocker"; ask for something to do, and do it—well.

Because some superintendents, teachers and members have traveled the lines of least resistance in their efforts to build up the interest and influence of our Bible schools, they have been handicapped in their effectiveness. The degree of success we enjoy in the work during the new year will be measured only by the amount of "plus" we add to our efforts of the past.

Growth, Bible, Evangelism, Soul

No more imperative challenge can come to us as we face the new year than that of the Bible school. It lies at the very heart of the Christian enterprise as foundation precedes building or seed the harvest. How necessary, therefore, that we be lured on by large vision in this most fertile and fruitful of all fields of religious activity. There are four ideals as regards the Bible school commanding our interest at this season —ideals at once transcendent and far-reaching in character and results.

The first is growth. It is true that bigness does not always mean greatness. Rome was big, but Bethlehem was great; Germany was big, but Belgium was great; John L. Sullivan was big, but Theodore Roosevelt was great. Greatness then is a thing of quality, of character, of ideals and of service. Hence a Bible school of one hundred scholars, thoroughly organized and consecrated to a high task, may be greater far than one of several hundred who come simply to be counted.

But, be this as it may, a Bible school should aspire to be as large as possible if it may thereby render greater service to the community and the world. Life is not static, but dynamic and progressive. Indeed, the law of life—its very soul and genius—is growth, always growth. The stone has no life—neither does it grow; but the acorn is a-throb with life —hence the growing sprout and spreading tree.

Too many Bible schools are like a toy train running round and round on a circular track—there is much of the noise and rattle of machinery, but it gets nowhere. Every school should inaugurate a well-planned program and then bend its entire energy to attain a worthy goal.

Secondly, teaching the Word of God. The Bible school, if it means anything, is a school for teaching and learning the Bible, and the school which substitutes something else for the Book of books—however interesting or cultural—ceases thereby to function as a Bible school.

In these days of social, economic and political unrest—crisis days that try men's souls—nothing will put iron into the blood and courage into the heart, or conduce to moral stability and idealism, like the Holy Scriptures faithfully presented and rightly interpreted. If Queen Victoria, pointing to the Bible, could say to a distinguished guest, "That book is the secret of England's greatness," or President Jackson declare that "The Bible is the rock on which the republic rests," surely we need today as never before—confronted by the staggering task of a world's rebuilding—to set forth with unceasing fidelity the principles and ideals of the Sacred Volume.

Moreover, that is what people come to the Bible school for. They can hear lectures and music from lyceum platform and in concert hall, but when they come to the house of God they hunger for the bread of life. The Bible school hour, therefore, is the one opportunity for imparting, both to children and adults, the health-giving truth of the gospel.

In the third place, evangelism. Gone forever is a certain type of evangelism, with its cheap jokes, sloppy sentimentalism, vulgar hysterics and emphasis on noses and dollars. May Ichabod be inscribed above its grave forever. But the church of our Lord must remain an evangelistic institution or else surrender its divine credentials and mission.

While not discounting special evangelistic campaigns and efforts—for without them must be torn away many of the brightest pages of the Church's history and triumphs—yet we insist that the Bible school is our greatest evangelistic agency and opportunity. This not only accords with Biblical teaching, but it is based upon the soundest laws of psychology as well. Gather the people into the Bible school and the work is done. They come into the church as naturally and normally as harvest follows seedtime or as the bud unfolds into blossom.

Finally, spirituality must be accented. Is this indeed not the end of all Christian teaching and endeavor? The great, deep yearnings of the soul—yearnings for reality and truth and satisfaction—must be drawn out and fulfilled in God.

Let our Bible schools then by tender sympathy, personal oversight and faithful teaching of the Word lead the multitudes up to higher altitudes of spiritual communion and realization, for if we fail in this we have failed in the supreme thing of life. For what matters it if the Bible school grows in numbers, in evangelistic passion and pedagogical accuracy if human hearts and lives are not attuned to the Infinite?

All this means a deepening and growing experience of vital religion—"the life of God in the soul of man." Such a spirit of reverence and worship must be created and maintained in the Bible school—environing the whole service like an ozone-laden atmosphere—as shall at once quicken and strengthen spiritual insight and appreciation. Thus every song and prayer and admonishment, whether in opening exercise or classroom instruction, should feed the higher nature, thereby developing virile and positive Christian character.

This, then, should be our vision and task as we face the coming year—God's year and ours—and surely it is great enough to call out the best thought and highest resolve of every minister, superintendent and teacher in the land. Let us go forth sowing, cultivating and reaping and we shall witness such constructive achievement in our Bible schools in 1920 as shall send a thrill of joy throughout our great and beloved brotherhood. Thus the Kingdom in radiant and conquering glory shall move forward,—

"Fair as the moon,
Bright as the sun,
And terrible as an army with banners."

Roosevelt's Estimate of the Ministry

THE Literary Digest quotes from Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart's biography of Theodore Roosevelt the statement which he made when told that Dr. Iglehart's son was about to start as a missionary to Japan. After a hearty "God bless him and bless you," he said:

"I have told you many times that I consider the Christian ministry as the highest calling in the world, most intimately related to the most exalted life and service here and destiny beyond, and I consider it my greatest joy and glory that, occupying a most exalted position in the nation, I am enabled, simply and sincerely, to preach the practical moralities of the Bible to my fellow countrymen and to hold up Christ as the hope and savior of the world. I believe down deep in my soul, as you know, my friend, that I have preached the same gospel that you and your boy are called to preach.

"As high an estimate as I have of the ministry, I consider that the climax of that calling is to go out in missionary service, as your son is doing. It takes mighty good stuff to be a missionary of the right type, the best stuff there is in this world. It takes a deal of courage to break the shell and go twelve thousand miles away to risk an unfriendly climate, to master a foreign language, perhaps the most difficult one on earth to learn; to adopt strange customs, to turn aside from earthly fame and emolument and, most of all, to say good-bye to home and the faces of the loved ones virtually forever."

Glory, laud, and honor, Unto Christ the King;

Long Live Those Early Voices

By FRED S. NICHOLS

THE three outstanding words of these days are democracy, internationalism and social service. But these words did not spring full-orbed from the Great War. Here and there throughout the world wilderness voices had long cried out for such a brotherhood order. Among these early voices none has been clearer and more effective than that of the missionary of the cross. In its immediate environment effects and in its invigorating reaction upon the home land, this voice has been of incalculable force in ushering in the new day. Moreover, the continuance of this voice is necessary to the more complete realization of these ideals.

This Voice and Democracy

The meaning of democracy is becoming clearer each day, and with it the consciousness that only some of the first fruits of democracy have been tasted. As the emphasis in democracy gradually shifts from simply political theories and governmental concepts to that of spiritual values, the democratic spirit is recognized as the conscious and constant effort to organize all life on such a basis that every human being may have within his reach the most abundant experience.

Now, just how has the missionary voice been significant here? For the missionary has not been a political theorist or propagandist as such; his primary concern has not been the immediate political structure. But his voice has sounded the fundamental principle upon which all enduring democracies must rest, namely, the divine rights and worth of the individual as such. This is the dynamic that will in time develop, either by peaceful evolutions or cataclysmic revolutions, the satisfying and effective organisms. To deny or attempt to abort this idea in its growth will bring on an "irrepressible conflict." The missionary discovers the individual to himself in the way of his rightful sonship. If "religion is the discovery of persons," it is no less true that the discovery of persons is the beginning of democracy.

This has been the voice of the missionary in the great world wilderness. What of the future? His voice must be sustained. It must be sustained in order to make the world safe for the democracy already attained. Competitive armament will jeopardize it. The League of Nations will help, but only as it rests upon something more basic; an ultimate basis other than an enforcing army and navy. The league's effectiveness will be found in the spirit that promotes the gradual democratization of the world. But world democratization will not become a reality by enforced forms of government, by commercial relationships, nor even by systems or processes of education. It will come by a universally insistent emphasis upon the principle of individual worth until all the people have a flaming conscience upon the matter.

Nor can the world long be safe for a democracy which is in fact only a fractional democracy within the country itself. There must be a going on to a complete democratization of all things. The sphere of democracy must be enlarged; and the wider the area of the elemental democratic idea of individual worth as a religious faith, the more dynamic will it be to reach its goal in all realms.

This Voice and Internationalism

Internationalism is another of the great words today. The menace of an arrogant, overriding nationalism has been unmasked. But the alternative of this is not an undesirable and unrealizable internationalism. Between these extremes there is what might be termed a well balanced national internationalism—the strongest surety of world peaceful progress.

What is the voice of the missionary here? His voice has sounded and will continue to sound, two principles without which internationalism can be only the dream of visionaries. These principles are the spirit of active good will and an appreciative recognition of national characteristics and sentiments. Take the first, that of active good will. Our fear has too often been that of the physical and commercial dangers of isolation. As a result, a minimum cooperation is bargained: a cooperation that insures against military aggression and commercial exploitation. The missionary, concerned not only about the physical dangers of isolation, but more especially in the soul dangers of such a position, interprets internationalism in terms of active good will. It is a sharing process; a sharing of all the good discovered on the way, along with

Not only has the missionary condemned violation of the rights of weaker nations, whether this violation be through diplomacy or militarism, but he has sounded the positive international note of the continued natural right of the weaker to share in the strength of the strong. This active free will sharing must be the basis of any desirable or effective internationalism. Just as we can never have a peaceful and elevated Americanism without active good will toward the mountaineer, the Negro, the immigrant, or the present economic slave, neither can we hope for the best fruits of internationalism unless back of our diplomatic maneuvering and interdependent trade relations we are represented by a group whose religion of universal brotherhood is made natural and passionate in Jesus of the democratic and international mind.

No less significant has been the voice of the missionary in regard to the principle of nationalism. Some utopian dreamers feel that the two members, Nationalism and Internationalism, cannot compatibly occupy the same house; it is a house divided against itself. They believe the two things are eternally contradictory. Nationalism built upon the fictitious will always be inimical to world brotherhood. But these dreamers apparently leave human nature out of account. Brutal outbreaks are not the inevitable conclusions of a normally developed personality. The revival of Polish ambitions and Zionist dreams are surely not entirely of the devil.

The missionary is anxious for nationalism to develop a strong individuality, feeling that the service of such development is indispensable to the best interests of the entire world. It is true he curbs and helps to overcome the spirit and habit of thought that are domestically anti-social and in opposition to the sacred rights of the family of nations. But at the same time he feels that an appreciation of the traditional and historic national background and a discriminating encouragement of strong national sentiments and characteristics will make for a more vigorous and permanent internationalism. The missionary has long looked for the day when the advent of the child Internationalism should be announced. Now that its birth is, we hope, to be recorded, no one can do more than he to give the child a strong, symmetrical growth. Surely we cannot claim an enthusiastic interest in the birth of a child without strengthening the conditions insuring a healthy, normal growth.

This Voice and Social Service

Before the war a few prophetic spirits in this country were calling intelligently, fewer still both intelligently and passionately, for a kind of social service that would be the validation of religious belief. The war experience has popularized this religion of the spirit. Religious war agencies made their appeal to the extent they represented the Galilean peasant who went about doing good. The tragedy of the whole affair is in the fact that this religion of the spirit seemed to many an entirely new brand of religion. The religion of brotherly service, amplified, of course, by wider social concepts and energized by spiritual forces, we hail as a return to the Christ spirit. Now the curious part of this is, that the thing so novel to the soldier and so disconcerting to others, has been the regular matter-of-fact program of the missionary. That which has been considered adventitious at home, has been at the very heart of the missionary's labors. The cadaverous fellow with one lone book under his arm is only a comic cartoon. The missionary's ambition has not been simply to substitute one abstract creedal philosophy for another. He has gone as a preacher, a teacher, a doctor, an engineer, and an agriculturist; in fact, as the promoter of a larger present life in every way.

The stories of our doctors who voluntarily gave up large practices in the homeland and with a cheerful unselfishness gave themselves completely to fallen comrades, fill us with a humble pride; it is an inspiring chapter in the glories of the trenches. But this glory is not eclipsed when we recall that this is no new service. For long the missionaries have thus served on the foreign field. Foregoing the pleasures of a home practice they have given themselves through the long days of the long years. Risking life, they have comradeshipped with untold thousands in their suffering. Theirs has been a social service raised to the highest power. The military doctor's unusual is the medical missionary's normal. And what is said of his intense heroism in the religion of brotherly love, is equally true of his fellow comrades in other branches of the service.

Since we now more clearly discern the summum bonum of religion, we will be true to our light only as we, with a religious passion, intensify and enlarge the fields of serving comradeship. But the temptation to the unsocial meets and conquers many in the doldrums of peace; for then the social urge is apt to weaken. We forget there are other wounds than those of shrapnel, bayonet, or poison gas. And the wounds of peace are awful; awful because so often there is no ministry of relief, nor a watchman to call "the morning cometh." With no bugle sounding we fall back to the beggarly elements of individualism. Not seeing the seriousness of the wounds of peace, naturally there is no thought to inquire into the causes, nor a heroism to abolish the reason for the conditions. In the foreign field the sound and suffering of battle are always on with such force they cannot be ignored. The wounds are so awful, the missionaries are driven to causes and remedies. They are not so easily tempted to build tabernacles of rest and satisfaction.

As the dramatic action of the military inspired a deeper religion of humanity in the homeland, so the persistent heroism of the missionary will not only irrigate foreign deserts, but the influence will always animate in a very telling way all forms of social service at home.

Thomas Ellsworth Cramblet

Seventh President of Bethany College

BORN in Harrison county, Ohio, September 17, 1862, educated in the public schools, Scio College, Ohio State University, Mt. Union College and the College of the Bible at Lexington, Kentucky, Thomas E. Cramblet married Miss Della S. Weaver of his native county in 1887, and in the same year entered upon his career as a minister of the gospel at Mentor, Ohio. Successful pastorates followed at Salem, Ohio, Omaha, Nebraska, and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. His leadership of the East End Church in Pittsburgh showed such marked executive ability that he was insistently called to the presidency of Bethany College, which he finally accepted in 1901 and from which he was released by death June 15, 1919.

The first Mrs. Cramblet died in 1910. Their children, Harold W., assistant secretary of the Pittsburgh Board of Education; Wilbur H., dean of the School of Arts and Sciences of Bethany College, and Mrs. Dorothy Gray of New Philadelphia, Ohio, with the devoted second wife, Mrs. Grace E. Cramblet, survive.

His last illness was brief and he was conscious to the last. In talking with his family he directed that the remainder of his pledge to the Men and Millions Movement be paid as promptly as possible, admonished them to keep the faith and to be loyal to the church and to the sacred trusts of life; chose A. McLean to preach his funeral sermon with Cloyd Goodnight to assist him and selected his funeral hymns, repeating the following lines of one:

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small."

of Jesus Going on before!

President Cramblet did a work for Bethany on its physical side such as none of his predecessors had been able to do, and such a work as probably no other living man could have done. For this work he deserves to be held in everlasting remembrance and honor by the friends and lovers of dear old Bethany. He was able to secure the cooperation of M. M. Cochran, Earl W. Oglebay, the Phillips family, the Oliver family, the Irvin family of Big Run, Pennsylvania, R. A. Long, and many others. It is well known that Mr. Cochran, Mr. Phillips, the Oliver family and others were friends and supporters of the college long before the accession of Mr. Cramblet. Had it not been for them the college would have closed its doors long ago. But even these gave on a larger scale during the incumbency of President Cramblet.

Augustus boasted that he found Rome brick and left it marble. A change somewhat similar was effected in Bethany by President Cramblet. He found the college at a low ebb. The buildings were dilapidated; the endowment was a negligible quantity; the debts were overwhelming; the outlook was anything but bright. Those who were familiar with the Bethany of eighteen years ago can hardly recognize that the Bethany of today is one and the same.

Forty years ago the main building was partially destroyed by fire. The part that was destroyed contained the halls of the literary societies. There was much talk from time to time of rebuilding that part, but nothing was done. No one ever visited Bethany in those years who did not regard the burnt part as an eyesore, and who did not regret that the building had not been restored as it was originally. With funds provided by Mr. Oglebay the Oglebay Hall of Science and Agriculture has taken the place of that part of the college building that had been destroyed. The handsome Oglebay gate and the cement walks supplied by the same generous donor make the approach to the college most attractive. The corridor, that favorite promenade of the students, and the entire building have been put in thorough repair.

The Carnegie library is one of the conspicuous buildings on the campus. Mr. Carnegie gave twenty thousand dollars for a library on the condition that a like amount be added to the endowment of the college. The condition was met and the library building was erected. There are graduates of Bethany still living who can remember when there was neither library nor reading room connected with the college. There were some books from Mr. Campbell's library, but they were kept under lock and key in a small cloak room adjoining Professor Loos's classroom. That day belongs to the distant past. It is possible for students now to keep posted on current events if they so desire.

The Percy B. Cochran Dormitory, built by Mr. Cochran as a memorial to his brilliant son, who died soon after entering upon his professional career, has taken the place of the rambling and unsightly Ranch. Such parts of the Ranch as were deemed worthy of preservation were moved across the street and fitted up as quarters for married students. The Percy B. Cochran Dormitory is a modern fireproof structure, heated by steam, lighted with electricity and supplied with hot and cold water.

In the administration of President Cramblet a system of water works and sewerage, an electric plant, a heating and power plant, and a telephone exchange were installed. There are those still living who can remember when there was only one bathtub in Bethany. Now the dormitories are supplied with abundant bathing facilities, and every home in the town can have a tub or a shower or both. In the olden time coal was carried into the classrooms by Mark Fowler and Henry Sommerville and fed into the stoves. The lecture or recitation was interrupted while the janitor was doing his duty. Now all the college buildings are supplied with heat from the central plant, and class and janitor are relieved and thankful for the change.

The interurban car line connecting Bethany and Wellsburg is an improvement of enormous value to the college. Formerly if one wished to go from Bethany to Wellsburg or from Wellsburg to Bethany, it was necessary to hire a horse and buggy at a cost of a dollar and a half. It took from an hour to two hours, according to the disposition of the horse and the condition of the roads, to make the trip. Now one can go from Bethany to Wellsburg or from Wellsburg to Bethany in twenty minutes and at a cost of twenty cents or less. It has been estimated that this car line was worth to the college as much as an addition of a hundred thousand dollars to the endowment. It brought Bethany into direct touch with the rest of the world, and gave the college mail twice a day instead of twice a week or once a week as it had been in the time of President Campbell and President Pendleton.

Two gymnasiums were built while Mr. Cramblet was president of the college. One was of frame and was burned. Its loss was not greatly lamented. The second is of brick and was erected by the Irvin family of Big Run. This gymnasium is modern in every respect, and is not surpassed by any similar institution in the state. Many years ago a waggish student closed a chapel oration with this sentence, "Let the Buffalo be dammed and give us a gymnasium." The Buffalo has not yet been dammed, but it may be some day and the college provided with boating facilities; but the gymnasium has been given, and the students are making good use of it in providing the sound body for the sane mind.

Through the bounty of Mr. Oglebay the farm once owned by Alexander Campbell was bought and presented to the college. This farm contains two hundred and fifty acres. Within its borders are the Campbell mansion, the Campbell study, the Brush Run Church (restored and removed from its original site), and the Campbell cemetery. Mr. Oglebay built two dairy barns on the farm and loaned the college a herd of fine Guernsey cattle. From this farm the town is supplied with milk and cream of the best quality. Besides, the farm gives employment to a number of students who are working their way through school. Through Mr. Oglebay's munificence a school of agriculture has been established in Bethany. The state and the nation will profit by the work done in this school.

The Parkinson farm on the hill overlooking Bethany has been acquired by a gift. This farm contains two hundred and fifty acres and joins the Campbell farm. Both are operated as one.

President Cramblet was instrumental in having erected thirty-two dwellings in Bethany. Most of these are occupied by college people. Through his efforts the streets of Bethany were paved with brick. Those who can recall what the streets of Bethany were like in years gone by will be able to form some conception of the change that has taken place. The town has a different appearance, and the citizens have increased pride in it because of these improvements.

The new church building is an addition of great value. The old building answered its purpose in its day. It was built before the Sunday school came into prominence, before the Endeavor Society came into being, and before the day of the adult Bible classes. It was an auditorium and nothing else. The pulpit was between the doors and those who came late faced the audience and diverted attention from the speaker and the service. In this primitive building many eloquent sermons were preached and many confessions were heard. Because of its history and sacred associations Mr. Long has made provision for its permanent preservation. The new building is adapted to the new day in which we are living. It is a memorial building and reminds the worshiper of some of the illustrious men who were identified with Bethany in other days. It is a model building in every sense of the word. It was erected and dedicated while J. J. Morgan was the minister in charge.

In the eighteen years that Mr. Cramblet was president the college came into the possession of property consisting of land and buildings worth about six hundred thousand dollars. In the same period, through the gifts of Mr. Cochran, the Phillips family, the Oliver family, Mr. Long and others, the endowment increased from a trifling sum to about the same amount. Meanwhile the floating debt of the college and debts of all kinds were liquidated. These debts amounted to about seventy-five thousand dollars. Some time after Bethany was founded Mr. Campbell said, "Give me a hundred thousand dollars and I will ask no more." One hundred thousand dollars was considered sufficient for all purposes; for buildings, library, apparatus, endowment and everything else. Mr. Campbell was prepared to guarantee his friends that if they would furnish this amount of money he would undertake to educate five hundred students each year, and to supply an abundance of professors and tutors and of the best sort. No doubt a dollar went much farther then than it does now. But a hundred thousand dollars now, even if equal in purchasing power to what they were then, would not go very far in supporting an institution like Bethany. The chances are that Bethany will need and will have an annual income of a hundred thousand dollars and more before many years go by.

President Cramblet sleeps in "God's Acre" facing the college he loved and served. His worn body rests not far from where Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, W. K. Pendleton, Robert Richardson, W. H. Woolery, John M. Trible, and many others of the saints of God sleep their last sleep. For all time his name shall be written high among Bethany's presidents because of the invaluable service he rendered her. President Cramblet, by his contribution to the physical side of the college, made it possible for President Goodnight to strengthen the faculty, to multiply and enrich the courses of study, to increase the number of laboratories, to add to the apparatus, and to make Bethany the equal of any school of its class in America.

John 5:1-9.

THE Apostle John, in looking back from the high vantage ground of long years of service for his Lord, in writing his Gospel chose six miracles from the many signs which Jesus did, and recorded them, that "men might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing they might have life in His name."

To these six miracles then, the disciple who lived near to the heart of Jesus must have attached special importance, as they stood out through the varying and often tragic scenes of the long years that had passed since the death and resurrection of his Lord.

No doubt, during the passing of the years, some of the details surrounding the miracles had been forgotten, as in staging the scenes for the present "sign" John simply states, "There was a feast of the Jews and Jesus went up to Jerusalem."

No doubt, through all the years of His life on earth from the time of His visit to the beautiful Temple, "His Father's House," had been the dearest of all places to Him. Not for its present pomp and show and glitter of hypocrisy, but for what it had meant in the history of His people, over whom He yearned with a love unspeakable.

So to this "unknown feast" He had gone, no doubt, with the hope that by some word or sign He might so appeal to those who were His own, that they would receive Him as their long-expected Messiah.

Long hours He spent watching the crowds as they passed through the "Beautiful Gate" and mingling with them in the Temple courts. But He did not feel at home in the atmosphere of selfishness and hypocrisy of those who there held rule, and turned away to the streets of the city. Here among the poor and suffering, the sheep having no shepherd, He found His real work, His home.

As He was walking He came to a locality apparently well known in John's day, designated as the "pool of Bethesda, having five porches, near by the sheep gate." Here was crowded a great multitude of sick people, blind, lame, withered, such a group as would stir with a loving compassion the heart of the Great Physician.

It was a scene made more pathetic because of the hope of every sufferer in the healing power of the "troubled water" to make him well. It was a scene made most pathetic because of the belief that at certain times an angel descended into the water, causing it to bubble up, and that only he who first stepped into the pool would be cured.

One can picture the straining eyes of the multitude, crowding, pushing, hoping for the one chance, while the Great Healer walked in their midst unheeded. Out of the throng He noted one that seemed the most helpless, hopeless and alone of all, and to him He said, "Wouldst thou be made whole?" The watching, selfish crowd with eyes fastened on the pool gave no heed as he answered, "Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming another steppeth down before me." Jesus said to him, "Arise, take up thy bed and walk."

At the word of command this man, who had been helpless for thirty-eight years, and who no doubt had spent many hopeless days at the pool of Bethesda, forgot all about the troubling of the waters, and straightway feeling the strength of the healing power, arose, rolled up his bed and walked.

Then the multitude gave heed, and wondered that this most wretched man of them all, had by some means been healed without the troubling of the waters, and that therefore there must be some help in Israel of which they had not learned. But there were some of the Jews who forgot the miracle of healing in the fact that the man was carrying his bed on the Sabbath day, which was not lawful! To their rebuke he replied with new courage and loyalty born out of his relief from suffering, "He that made me whole, the same said unto me, 'Take up thy bed and walk'." Neither was he able to tell them who the Great Physician was, for He had passed quietly through the multitude and gone His way.

It is interesting to note that the man made whole soon went to the Temple, where Jesus saw him and, talking with him, gave him good counsel to "sin no more." Realizing who it was that had healed him, the man went at once and made known to the Jews that it was Jesus who had made him whole.

Unheeding the love and healing power of the Great Physician the Jews began a persecution of Jesus because He performed His gracious acts of mercy on the Sabbath, and when in justification of His ministry He said to them, "My Father worketh even until now and I work," the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only brake the Sabbath, but also called God His own Father, making Himself equal with God.

No wonder John remembered this miracle as the occasion of the beginning of that opposition to his Lord which never rested until the cross stood high on Calvary and the Great Physician gave up His own life in the supreme effort to draw all men unto Himself.

For the healing of the nations today the Master waits. Multitudes, too, are waiting by Bethesdas that never can heal, while messengers of mercy tarry long.

"Who will answer, gladly saying,
'Here am I, O Lord, send me'?"

Facts for the Busy Woman

"DURING a visit to Canton I one day accompanied a medical missionary on a visit to a patient in a small village some miles from the city. It was an unattractive village, dirty, squalid and isolated. But in that little village were erected, in a prominent position, three long slender poles, widening at the top, which I was told were the pride of the village, the visible evidence that three of its residents had received the coveted literary degrees which gave them a place among the 'literati,' the only aristocrats in democratic China."

Mrs. Ing, a missionary in Kiukiang, wrote home in 1874, "When we came to Kiukiang three years since, we could not by diligent inquiry find a woman who could read. There was indeed a vague rumor of one thus distinguished, but where we could not learn." Miss Howe, telling of her visits to the homes of the same city, wrote, "Having seated myself I open my book and remark, 'These are Chinese characters. Can any of you read?' Some appear amused, others surprised at the question, while one or two put on an air of offended dignity, intended to very impressively convey the impression, 'No, indeed; I am not so strong-minded as that.'"

The testimony of the Chinese themselves is to the same effect, from the Chinese gardener in San Jose, who when asked by his mistress what seemed to him the most remarkable of all the new things he had seen in America, replied, "The women leadee, litee" (the women read and write)—to one of the gentlemen of the Chinese commission to the Philadelphia Centennial in 1876, who lamented the fact that the education of Chinese women had "fallen into disuse" and attributed America's progress to the fact that the mothers were able to train their sons and daughters intelligently.

At a boys' school in Chefoo some years ago the subject of a debate was, "Which Has More Influence, Father or Mother?" and the boys decided in favor of the mother on the ground that she understood the children better and was more patient than the father." Dr. Williams says, "It is probably safe to say that no country, not Christian, can show in its legislation more care in guarding the sacredness of family ties, defending the purity of the weaker sex, and providing for the maintenance of widows."

Confucius, China's great seer, says that it is "a law of nature that woman should be kept under the control of man and not allowed any will of her own," and that "In the other world the condition of affairs is exactly the same, for the same laws govern there as here." Such sentiments were common enough among all nations in those days, but the general immobility of China has perpetuated their influence on the position of the Chinese woman. "Eighteen goddess-like daughters are not equal to one son with a limp" is a common proverb. "It is impossible to be more malevolent than a woman," "Nothing will frighten a willful woman but a beating," and other similar sayings, show how much less highly women are regarded than men. Doubtless one of the chief reasons why one-half of the nation has been left uneducated is because the other half placed so low an estimate on the rights and value of the former.

"Mary will not give up," said the mother of Mary Lyon, in the days when her daughter was making the brave struggle which finally ended triumphantly in the establishment of Mount Holyoke College. "She just walks the floor and says over and over again, when all is so dark, 'Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him and He shall bring it to pass. Women must be educated—they must be.'"

"Our native patrons have shown almost from the first a reliance upon their sisters which has surprised me. Rarely will they insist on seeing the foreigner when the native physician is at hand. In the out-calls they occasionally send for the native doctor in preference to the foreigner."

While many have distinguished themselves as teachers and physicians, the great majority of the graduates of the schools have married, some as soon as they left school, many of them after a few years of teaching. The supreme ideal of the mission schools has been to put educated, capable women into the centers of the homes.

"While the girls are getting a good footing intellectually, and their spiritual life is carefully watched, the practical side of their nature is not forgotten," one of the missionaries wrote. "Our greatest hope is that they may be model homemakers."

"You do not know of others because their training has been received at home. But can we who know of such cases debate their capability? We know them to be patient, persevering, to have wonderful endurance, quickness of perception, keen appreciation, and unexcelled deftness of touch."

It is an old unwritten rule in China that it is a breach of etiquette even to ask a man concerning his wife's health. It is a rare tribute to a wife, therefore, to have her husband publicly speak of her assistance to him in his work, in terms of highest praise, as did a Chinese pastor in Shaowu not long ago.

A story is told of the late General Ma. He was calling on one of the older missionaries on one occasion. During the conversation he said, "Dr. S——, I want to ask you a question. In your honorable country is the woman the head of the home or is the man the head of the home?" "Why, General, it is this way. If the man is a stronger character than the woman he is the head of the home, but if the woman is stronger than the man, she rules." The General pushed back his chair and said with a smile, "In my miserable country it is exactly the same!"

The Christmas present recently sent by a wealthy student in a mission college to his young wife in their distant home is significant of the influence which Christian ideals are exerting upon the marriage relationship. Neither the young man nor his wife is a Christian, but both read the Bible and are open-minded to new truth. The gift was a gold bracelet, on the inner side of which was engraved, Ephesians 5:25 ("Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church and gave himself up for it.") "My wife will be pleased with that sentiment," the young husband said, and well she might be.

One of the chief factors in the renewal and regeneration of Chinese life is the Chinese woman. Long the victim of repression and ignorance, she is still splendidly endowed, of undiminished vigor, and wields an immense influence over Chinese society. It is quite possible when the defects of Chinese life so far as they affect women are pictured that American women gain a wrong impression, and have a feeling of mingled pity and contempt for those so downtrodden. Nothing can be more unfortunate. While the conditions surrounding the life of Chinese women are far from ideal, and while the conception of womanhood presented in Confucian thought is doubtless inadequate, yet it is probable that no woman of a non-Christian land has had greater influence or dignity than the Chinese woman. Certainly no woman is today more important to reach and educate.

The testimony of Dr. Madge Mateer, that school life, instead of spoiling the Chinese girls for home duties, has made them more helpful, is one of the truest tributes which could have been paid to the wisdom and skill of those who have guided the course of woman's education in China. "I have heard no one complain that her daughter was unwilling to take up less congenial work at home," Dr. Mateer says.

Home is woman's realm. In it she is the accredited ruler. She is supposed to prepare her husband's food, care for his clothing, bear and care for the children, call a teacher for her son and place him in school, teach her daughter fancy work and cooking, and—

"If from fancy work and cooking
You can save some precious hours,
You should spend them in embroidering
Ornamental leaves and flowers."

But as a matter of fact, in the country and among the poor farmer folk the wife is sometimes hitched up with the husband and the donkey to the plow, the handle of which the son holds. The girls and women often go out in the fields in the busy season of planting, hoeing and harvesting and work beside the men, and you will rarely find a man who cannot cook.

Much has been written of the Chinese custom of binding the feet of the girls, and very much has been done by the Manchus, who never bind their feet, to break up this custom. Whatever may be said as to the origin of the custom, and there are several stories current among the Chinese as to its origin, it has been practiced for the most part because it is a custom, because everybody liked to have small feet and because it adds to their beauty.

This is the reason given in the "Classic for Girls," where we find the following stanza:

"Have you ever learned the reason
For the binding of your feet?
'Tis from fear that 'twill be easy
To go out upon the street.

"It is not that they are handsome
When thus like a crooked bow,
That ten thousand wraps and bindings
Are thus bound around them so."

Perhaps the worst of all domestic conditions in China are poverty, the inability of the woman to go out into service of any kind and help herself, and concubinage. Shut up in the common family home, in which live several families and as many generations, if she is poor, she has little to do; for she has nothing to work with, no separate home of her own to keep clean and neat, no clothes to give her an appearance of respectability; while on the other hand she has other women to quarrel or gossip with her, with constant complaints and jealousies. Congenial employment, which would bring her some income of her own, is one of her real needs.

"One-fifth of all the women of the world are found in the homes of China. One baby girl out of every five is cradled in a Chinese mother's arms, unwelcomed and unloved, unless by that poor mother's heart. One little maiden out of every five grows up in ignorance and neglect, drudging in the daily toil of some poor Chinese family, or crying over the pain of her crippled feet in the seclusion of a wealthier home. Among all the youthful brides, who day by day pass from the shelter of their childhood's home, one out of every five goes weeping in China to the tyranny of the mother-in-law she dreads, and the indifference of a husband she has never seen. Of all the wives and mothers in the world, one in every five turns in her longing to a gilded goddess of mercy in some Chinese temple, counting her beads and murmuring her meaningless prayer. Of all the women who weep one out of every five weeps alone, uncomforted in China. Out of every five who lie upon beds of pain, one is wholly at the mercy of Chinese ignorance and superstition. One out of every five at the close of earthly life, passes into the shadow and terror that surround a Chinese grave, never having heard of Him who alone can rob death of its sting. One-fifth of all the women are waiting, waiting in China, for the Savior who so long has waited for them. What a burden of responsibility does this day lay upon us—the women of Christendom."

Mrs. F. Howard Taylor.

Now this is not to say that there is nothing good in Chinese medicine. The Chinese began 2,700 years B. C. to experiment with herbs in the treatment of disease, and have discovered and used for centuries, many of the common physics, astringents and other household remedies which our mothers and grandmothers used. Chinese medicine is what our medicine would be without medical colleges or systematic instruction.

"The amount of disease and suffering in China," says Dr. Stewart in the Chinese Recorder of October, 1896, "is very great, and the methods of native medical practice tend rather to increase than to lessen it. The rich and the poor alike suffer. Ignorance, superstition and filth are as apparent and potent among the wealthy as among the poverty-stricken. Scientific diagnosis and rational treatment are an impossibility even to the most wealthy for the reason that a requisite knowledge of medicine cannot be said to exist in China at the present time."

"It is not always the telling of the story of Christ and his love that counts most. A woman was carried from her home to the hospital on a stretcher. For weeks she had been suffering with inflammatory rheumatism, and the slightest movement seemed to cause intense pain. For weeks she had lain on her kang, or warm brick bed, without bath, and without change of clothing. Naturally, a bath was the doctor's first order; and Miss Powell, wishing to give her nurses an object lesson, determined to carry out the order herself. It was a difficult and unpleasant task, but proved well worth while. I am sure that woman will never cease to speak of Miss Powell's gentleness and kindness. 'Why,' she said, 'I have many dear friends and relatives, but there is no one who would do for me what you have done today!' She went home several weeks later, impressed with the thought that there is power in the Christian religion to change the human heart!"

One of the first graduates from the school of medicine in Peking University was Dr. Wang. When the Boxer trouble reached Peking he was arrested, his little son with him. The Boxers were ordered to put to death anyone who would not give up his faith and burn incense to the gods in the temple. But educated men were few in China, so they said to him:

"Dr. Wang, you are an educated man; we do not want to put you to death, but we have no liberty in the matter. You go with us and burn some incense and we will let you go."

"No," said he, "I will burn no incense."

Miss Mary Kingsbury

TO this devoted missionary belongs the honor of having given more years of service than any other in our history on the foreign field.

She was one of the four pioneer missionaries who were sent to India by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in September, 1882. She located with the others first in Harda, and then a few years later went with a group to open a new station two hundred miles farther east at Bilaspur.

Here she has labored ever since, for most of the time in charge of the orphanage with the exception of one year in Jhansi. After the death of Miss Ada Boyd in June, 1915, she took over the zenana work in the station. Thirty-seven years of consecrated service in India, crown this woman with glory and honor.

"Well, we want to make it easy for you," they continued, "you just get some one to go and burn incense in your place and it will be all right."

"No, I will not get anyone to burn incense for me," he persisted.

"Well, we will get some one to burn incense for you," they continued. "You just go over to the temple with us."

"No," he answered, "I will not do that."

"Then," they continued, "we must kill you."

"You may kill me," he answered, "but I will not worship your gods. How could I look my teachers in the face if I burned incense in that temple, to say nothing of my Christ! We are four generations of Christians, my grandfather, my father, myself and this little boy. Do you think I could allow this child to see his father deny his Savior? Kill me if you will, but I will not deny my Lord."

They ran him through with a spear.

Standing as she does, the first Chinese woman physician educated in a foreign land, Dr. Hu King Eng is an honor to her race and a joy to the society under whose auspices she works. Her life, too, is well expressed in her own words,—"I just 'look up' and 'lend a hand'."

"While in this country her influence was very helpful to others. One grateful mother exclaimed, 'Little did I dream when giving money for the work in China that a Chinese girl would lead my daughter to Christ!' God is faithful to His promises. As we send the joy and blessing to the far-away ones, He gives us back joy and blessing—'good measure, pressed down and running over'."

"The Memory of the Just Is Blessed"

AT various times we have spoken of the Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Coe Memorial, which is our girls' school at Luchowfu, China, built by a gift of Mrs. Josiah Coe and her children, as a memorial to her husband and to herself. At Pendra Road, India, we have the Amy Kinnis Coe Memorial, which is a home for missionaries at the sanitarium station. This also was built by Mrs. Coe, a few years ago, in memory of a loved and lost daughter. A letter has just been received from Mrs. Jennie Coe Jordan, who has been for a long time secretary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in Montana. We believe that many friends who were personally acquainted with Mrs. Jordan's mother, or who knew her for her work's sake, will be interested in the following letter from Mrs. Jordan's pen, under date of November 14:

"In the gray dawn of the early morning, last Sunday, our mother's beautiful spirit passed out to the God who gave it. The Sunday night preceding, while sitting before the fireplace she repeated from memory the first and fourth chapters of St. John. 'Lead, Kindly Light' and 'Crossing the Bar' were her favorite poems, and often she repeated them, in the twilight before retiring.

"It was our prayer that there might be 'no moaning of the bar' when mother 'put out to sea' and it came so quietly that we did not know she was on the brink until she had met her 'pilot face to face.'

"Her old pastor, B. Franklin Hall, of Auburn, Nebraska, had charge of the funeral service, on Wednesday morning, assisted by the resident pastor, Brother Elston.

"The seven of us are all here for the last time in the old home, but we have the most blessed memories to carry with us through all the days, and the power of His abiding presence. The Scripture lesson on Wednesday was the Twenty-third Psalm, and Revelation 22:1-5, and also the fourteenth verse. What a tower of strength mother has been, and what a great vision of the program of our Lord Jesus!"

Interchurch World Movement of North America

National Leaders' Training Conference, Atlantic City, November 5-8, 1919, Preparing to Conduct the Sixty-Six State and Regional Conferences that Have Since Been Held.

Two Protestant Conferences—One National and the Other Ecumenical

CHRISTIAN unity affairs are moving with increasing interest, and in this article I wish to speak of two movements in which the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity is actively engaged, and which must have back of them the thought and prayer of every Disciple of Christ. These two movements are the Conference of Evangelical Protestants for Organic Union, which will meet in the Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, February 3-6, 1920, and the Ecumenical Congress of all Protestants, which will meet in Europe perhaps in the summer of 1920, or not later than 1921.

In 1918 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. sent out an invitation to the evangelical bodies of Protestantism in America for a conference on organic union. Sixteen bodies responded and met in Philadelphia, December 4-6, 1918. The Disciples of Christ were represented in this body by fifteen delegates. The president of our General Convention that year, Edgar DeWitt Jones, presided over one of the sessions and other delegates were active in the proceedings of the conference. An ad interim committee was appointed to work on a plan, etc. They have met every month since their appointment and have given much time to the plan and general work of the conference. Through the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity the Disciples have had full representation on this committee and have been as active in this work as the members of other churches. At the February meeting the plan will be presented and it is hoped that there will be such readiness of response that evangelical Protestantism in America will be able to get closer together in this work than ever before. We must understand that these movements cannot go too rapidly lest multitudes of reactionary thinkers in all communions will break with the forward movement. For myself I should like to see in this Philadelphia conference a long step forward for this union, and there are scores of others anxious for it and ready to go a long step toward freedom from the past, with the basis upon Christ and Christ alone. But there are multitudes who would not stand for radical changes; consequently there is work of education to be done and much time should be given to prayer.

In the work of Christian unity we are all coming to learn that we do not progress if we criticize, if we find fault, if we hold aloof, if we take the position that we are always right and others are always wrong, if we are arrogant, if we are dogmatic. To be teachable we have got to find the humble mind, the willing spirit, and maintain the sense of veracity and fairness in dealing with all others, for long ago He said, "One is your Teacher and all ye are brethren."

The other conference referred to is that which grew out of the recent meeting of the International Committee of the World Alliance at The Hague, seeking for foundations upon which to found a permanent basis of international friendship, and at the same time seeking to remove barriers that hinder that friendship. It was a meeting of the greatest importance and the problems we had to handle were of the most delicate character, for here were Englishmen and Germans, Frenchmen and Italians, Swedes and Americans, and so on, including the fourteen nations—men whose viewpoints necessarily were different because of training and environment, but men whose one passion was to find a basis for international friendship and to help in removing the barriers to that friendship.

It was not a conference of wrangling and insinuations and charges and countercharges, but every man who took part in that conference sought to maintain that fine principle that he was brother to all the nations represented in that group, and consequently he approached all the subjects with humility and due deference to the other man's point of view. The result was a conference of unusual fraternity and courtesy which at the same time made a long step forward towards retying the broken ties of friendship which had been severed by the disastrous war.

It was the consensus of the conference that there could be no permanent international friendship unless its basis were Christian and that one of the first barriers to Christian friendship was the division in the Church. Consequently the first move was a plan toward lessening those divisions and making possible the unity of the Protestant forces of the world by holding a congress at an early date somewhere in Europe next year or the year following. The chief voice in this cause was the Archbishop of Upsala, a man of unusual grace and power. Since there are so many divergent Protestant elements and such unripeness in many instances in the entire Protestant household for unity, it was thought best and finally so recommended that this ecumenical congress should represent the church federations of the various countries instead of the various Protestant churches. It is a pity that it could not be a representation of the churches, but there are many churches that would have wrangled over it and refused to send delegates. To avoid that the church federations in the various countries in the world, which have worked together so long and have seen the need of union by practical, every-day observance, and therefore furnish the ripest forces in the Protestant household for friendly conference and irenic approaches, have taken up this task. So this congress will not only be made up of representatives of the church federations in all the countries of the world, but likewise all associated Protestant work, such as the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.

This ecumenical congress ought to give an understanding in the Protestant household certainly for closer affiliation, if not organic union, and help toward the great work that is being done under the plan of the World Conference on Faith and Order. The whole world wearies of our divisions. The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity is active in both of these organizations, so that the movement of the Disciples is seeking to make its contribution and is helping to increase the passion that God put into the heart of Thomas and Alexander Campbell for the unity of His Church.

Every man and woman among the Disciples of Christ is pledged to a definite interest in the unity of the Church of God. Plans will take care of themselves, but there must be a sincere passion among our own brethren for the fulfillment of the prayer of Jesus. I close this article with the following declaration, which was unanimously passed by The Hague Conference and was forthwith published in the papers throughout Europe in many languages:

"We meet at a time when the disunion of Christians, and of different churches, nations, and classes has been and is painfully conspicuous. This disunion has brought upon the Christian name great reproach, and has to a large extent paralyzed Christian power for good in the general life of humanity. But yet we rejoice in the assurance that underneath this disunion there is a real force of unity which it is our duty gratefully to recognize. We must labor for its increase, and that its power may be brought to that increasing in the life of the future. Leaving entirely aside all question of denominational differences, their nature and importance, we are united in believing in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men as fundamental truths of our faith. We believe that they were revealed by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who lived and died and rose again that they might be realized in the Kingdom of God. Together we pray that God's name may be hallowed, His Kingdom come and His will be done on earth as it is in Heaven. Neither in the social conditions nor in the conditions of people to each other have these convictions prevailed. Therefore, the existing order of society has come to confusion. From this it follows that the one hope for society is that it should now be rebuilt on Christian foundations and that the mind of Christ should be expressed in every human relationship, overcoming the forces of disintegration and rebuilding civilization on a higher plane.

"We maintain that the consciousness of right and wrong, and the system of law and political order which spring from that consciousness are good gifts from God to man. Therefore we are bound as Christians to assert the authority of justice and law, and to fight against any glorification of violence and force alike in the social and the international spheres. At the same time we believe that every existing system of law and justice is incomplete, and will have to be continually renewed as the moral sense becomes more perfect. It is therefore our duty as Christians to help on that renewal in every social and international relationship. We therefore are convinced that the time has come when a strenuous effort should be made by all Christians to realize all that is implied in Christ's teaching of the brotherhood of mankind, and to impress alike upon themselves and upon others that here alone lies the hope of permanent peace among the nations, and of any true solution of social and industrial problems. But we would go further. We believe that in the good providence of our God He will bring out of all the darkness of the last years a new and fuller understanding of His redeeming purpose. Out of this day of the Lord there is being revealed to all, as is witnessed by the thoughts of many hearts, a quite new understanding that His holy will is not only the salvation of individuals, but the transformation of the whole life of humanity and of all its corporate activities, by the Redeemer's kingly law of Love."

$8,000 From the Annuity Fund of the Board of Church Extension Enabled the Richmond, California, Church to Build Adequately

The Best in the City

AMONG the congregations of Disciples of Christ, all of which are struggling valiantly to bear witness to the truth of the gospel in that most difficult of all fields, the San Francisco Bay region, there are perhaps none that have given more challenging accounts of their stewardship during the past three or four years, than has the one that is located in Richmond, one of the most rapidly growing and promising centers across the bay from San Francisco.

The origin of the church in Richmond goes back some fifteen years to almost the beginning of the city itself, at which time, in order to secure some lots that had been proffered them by a realty company a few brethren got together and ran up a shack on the rear of a couple of these lots.

The church somehow failed to grow up with the city, but there were a few souls of the more heroic mold who never lost heart and hope. Thus, a little more than four years ago, soon after the beginning of the present administration, a program of advance was formulated, and presented, and the congregation committed itself to a task that was commensurate and worthy of the cause for which the little unsightly shack had stood all these years. A campaign was carried on both in the congregation and the community at large for funds with the result that we are today, not only the best housed congregation in the whole city, but also are being accorded a place of leadership that is commensurate in every way with our building.

The building, which is hereby reproduced, is of the French bungalow style of architecture, and is of such character as to attract universal attention in its favor. Dr. H. O. Breeden, who was master of ceremonies at its dedication spoke of it as being "so beautiful as to be almost dainty." It is spacious, covering an area 84 by 112 feet. It is so arranged that the main auditorium and a series of departmental Sunday school rooms, which are separated by a series of glass doors, may be thrown together with a seating capacity of a thousand people.

The general equipment includes, besides the auditorium and Sunday school rooms referred to above, a choir assembly room, a modernly equipped kitchen, a dining room, which will seat 150 persons and which may easily be enlarged to twice that size, a ladies' parlor with a fireplace, men's parlor, ladies' cloak room, men's cloak room and pastor's study. The church is heated by a furnace. It is equipped with a two-manual Johnston pipe organ, which was pronounced by Mr. Clarence Eddy, the world famous master, who gave three recitals for us, as an unusually fine organ.

Of course, it goes without saying that there were problems of various kinds to be encountered by the wayside, the biggest and ugliest of all the problem of inadequate finances, which loomed larger and larger above the horizon as the work neared completion. When, however, we had exhausted our resources, and were strained in our perplexities to the breaking point, along that way came a good Samaritan by the name of George W. Muckley, of the Board of Church Extension; so it was that we were heartened and helped in the hour of our extremity, and here we are ready by as much as in us is, to cooperate with these agencies of the Almighty in manifesting the same spirit of helpfulness to others who may be in like distress.

THOMAS A. BOYER, Minister.

Adult Mobilization Week, January 4-11

HUNDREDS of adult classes in all parts of America are taking the next step in aggressive service. The next step is to bring our adult classes to the point where they represent our whole available strength.

It is not unreasonable to expect every Christian to spend at least an hour a week in Christian training and Bible study; I mean every Christian. Those who refuse to serve or even train for service can hardly claim the name Christian in this critical hour of history.

The organized adult class is a place above all others where every Christian can really enter the service. We have long sung about the task that awaits every hand, we have preached about it and grown sentimental over it; but the adult class is the place where we face it.

Inasmuch as the church depends largely upon its Bible school for progress, and the Bible school looks to the adult department for its solidity and its leadership, we may say without exaggeration that the Kingdom of God is waiting upon a new forward move on the part of our adult Bible classes. The service is both reasonable and necessary; it is also not difficult if we face the program seriously. The same methods that apply for any other successful enterprise will do wonders for the church through the organized adult classes.

There is no enterprise of any Christian character that will not be benefited by adequate mobilization of our adults in organized classes; such classes will vastly promote the task of foreign missions, of home missions, of Christian betterment in social, economic or citizenship conditions. Here may well be brought the serious problems of making our churches more efficient, our educational policy more comprehensive and far-reaching as well as more permanent, and our home life more full of meaning for the generation which is to come. The adult class is at the root of the Christian enterprise. It is the work of God because it is God's church at work.

Mobilization for service is in the air. In every state our schools are taking it up. The movement needs you, but much more you need the movement. It is the next step forward and now is the time.

Superintendent Adult Division.

The House Beautiful

HAVENS HOME at East Aurora is indeed a haven of rest for many a weary soul. In the last thirty years the shadows of sleep have fallen on many, and they rest in the homeland, in the House Beautiful, that needs no sound of hammer nor repair of the workman.

For many months during the summer time some of us who live a short distance from East Aurora have dropped in for a chat with the dear old people of the home. Many times we saw the need of renovating. Since New York State has taken the work over in a more definite way and appointed a subcommittee we, too, have taken our work up in a very definite way.

When we went to inspect the home we listened to the requests of the cook, housekeeper and nurse and saw how anxious they were to get the things most needed. They were pathetically afraid of asking too much. With pencil and paper in hand we wrote, and wrote down actual needs; cooking utensils, a new bathtub, foot tubs, table linen, towels—and oh, so many things that I have not taken time to enumerate.

When the committee reached home we wondered if we dare ask the churches of the Niagara frontier for $300. We apportioned every church according to her numerical strength. We gave them just two weeks to raise the amount, and asked them to report at a general meeting of the frontier churches. We had the largest meeting of the frontier churches we ever had, and almost every church that reported exceeded their apportionment. Mrs. Miller and I went back to the home and took another look. We again inspected and again made a memorandum of things needed.

The tearing up has been a stupendous task. We told them things would be worse before they were better. But—the result! Old rugs have been replaced by new ones—not cheap ones—for your committee loves the beautiful, and we counted we were spending money for our Havens Home. We aim to make it the House Beautiful for the spirits beautiful to dwell in. We have papered nine rooms, and through Mr. and Mrs. Mead the three halls have been papered.

Interest and enthusiasm have grown, donations have come in through other sources. A new carpet replaced the old one downstairs in the hall. A new stair carpet makes the old one move up a flight. New mattresses have made the beds more inviting. New blankets, bed spreads, dresser scarfs, table napkins, oil shades, twenty new pairs of marquisette curtains give a new aspect to the home. New furniture has been added, new table and chairs, a bed complete, new linoleum for the second and third hall floors.

One of our ladies who formerly lived in a very large home and recently moved into an apartment, donated to us a load of furniture, dining room chairs and table, small tables, a rug and some very lovely pictures.

Saturday last we went out again to the home. We hung the pictures and curtains and again inspected. We have spent all of our money—all of it. And still rooms are untouched. Still more rooms need papering, carpets or rugs, dresser scarfs, curtains, shades and all the things I have enumerated.

The nurse of the home told me of this little expression of gratitude of Auntie Cook, 84 summers old. After her room had been freshly papered, at the evening bedtime hour nurse went quietly into her room to see her roommate, Mrs. Foster. Auntie Cook was kneeling at her bedside, audibly praying. Can't you see the picture, in night cap and white night robe thanking the Giver of all good gifts for the beautiful wallpaper on her room? It seems to me if she dared to open her eyes and looked at her carpet, patch upon patch, she never could have finished her note of thanksgiving.

There is a humorous side to all that is pathetic. We were beckoned by a wink or nod from room to room when in the halls, and when the door had been tightly closed, we hear, "I haven't asked for a single thing." Then the bad spots are uncovered. "I am so tired of this" or "that," "can't you do something to make my room a little brighter?"

Mr. Scott thanked me twice last Saturday and told me he slept till five o'clock in the morning after he got his new mattress. Another old lady told me her yellow paper brought sunshine into her room—but her old rag carpet frowned in her face every time she looked down. I could enumerate case after case of expressed gratitude, and yet if you people went through the home after all our hard work—which we have counted a pleasure—you would say, "Well, while you were doing it, why didn't you put a new carpet on at least eleven other rooms, put a new roof on, fix up the radiators so they won't leak and spoil your paper?" We know where we could use $1,200 more to put things in proper shape. Niagara frontier churches have given us $695. What will the rest of the state do to help us complete the work begun?

MRS. S. B. LINDSAY.

Porto Rico News

A NEW chapel was dedicated in Sonadora, Porto Rico, on October 26. This was built from funds raised on the field except for the use of some lumber purchased from the camp by the mission a few months ago. We have a group of faithful members there and also received considerable help from friends in the community. The day nursery for children of working mothers has been started in Bayamon. It seems to meet one of the needs long felt, and has called forth the support and approval of many of the townspeople. The mothers pay ten cents per day for each child. One of the Bible women, who is a former orphanage girl, has charge of the nursery. Her salary is paid by the mission. We have a monthly subscription from merchants and other friends of more than thirty dollars, for the maintenance of the enterprise. We have been unusually busy the past months. The Perrys will receive a most hearty welcome. We long for their coming. (See note elsewhere of their arrival.)

The Church School of Missions

By EVA N. DYE

What It Is

THE Church School of Missions is not a theory. It is a clearly conceived, and successfully operated plan of missionary education which seeks to include the whole church in its classes. It, therefore, commends itself to those who would exalt the church above its subsidiary organizations. It has also the advantage of having passed beyond the experimental stage, having been successfully used and enthusiastically commended by many scores of churches.

To Mrs. Royal J. Dye, of Pomona, California, was given the vision of the plan and possibilities of the Church School of Missions. It was she also who conducted the first school. Thoroughly consecrated to the missionary cause, led by the spirit of God, Mrs. Dye has given to the churches a scheme of missionary education which will aid mightily in the extension of the Kingdom.

The Church School of Missions is the membership of the church organized into classes, studying a graded course of missions, holding its sessions preferably in connection with the Sunday night preaching service. The classes meet in separate rooms just as they do in Sunday school. The school runs through a period of eight weeks.

Its Origin

The Church School of Missions is the result of an effort in an individual church to get the entire church to study the world task. The church to which this honor belongs is the First Christian Church of Pomona, California. For years a plan of missionary education had been sought that would reach the whole church. A system of graded missionary instruction had been introduced in the Bible school, mission study classes had been held among women and young people. None of these proved adequate, being necessarily limited to certain sections and organizations. In the summer of 1916, a new plan was proposed which was heartily endorsed by the missionary spirited pastor, Charles Rollin Hudson. A United Missionary Committee was formed, representing every missionary interest and organization in the church, that a thorough promotion campaign might be carried out. In October of that year the "Church School of Missions" opened, two hundred and sixty-seven out of a membership of six hundred and fifty being enrolled for eight weeks of definite study.

The Schedule

The best results have been obtained when these schools have met once a week for eight weeks, preferably on Sunday evenings. Some have met on a week night, however, closing with a prayer service. When the school meets on Sunday night there may be an opening musical program or vesper service planned for each week. This induces the whole school to be on time for the study period.

Such a plan has met with splendid success in several instances. On the other hand the classes may go at once to the rooms previously announced and plainly indicated by placards. At the close of the hour's study a processional hymn will call the assembling school together for reports of classes and short dramatizations, followed by a unified evening service. Young people's societies should meet thirty minutes earlier than the study hour or simultaneously with the opening exercises of the school.

Schedule

6:00-6:25—Music.
6:25-7:30—Study Period.
7:30-7:45—Reports and Dramatization.
7:45-8:30—Evening Service.

Organization and Promotion

The United Missionary Cabinet

The one factor essential to a unified missionary program in any church is a central group representing its varied missionary interests. This may be variously called a committee, council or cabinet, but the working plan remains the same. It may be composed of two officers or representatives of each organization of the church, such as the Bible school, Woman's Missionary Society, Junior, Intermediate and Young People's societies. Others may be added as may seem advisable, the pastor always being a member. In this unit the world-wide work of the whole church is co-ordinated and correlated. The formation of this cabinet should be authorized by the church board, to which it should regularly report. Each church must make its own program; however, the few suggestions on the activities of the United Missionary Cabinet at the close of this article may be found helpful.

Promotion

The United Missionary Cabinet should have charge of the Church School of Missions. They choose a dean and faculty, together with whom they decide upon the course of study for all ages. They then institute a promotion campaign throughout the church continuing for several weeks in every departmental assembly of the Bible school, and in every meeting of the various organizations. The cabinet and faculty may follow effectively the plan of "Four Minute Men." A booster meeting is advisable, a basket, box or cafeteria lunch being served to all church leaders when the Church School faculty presents brief spicy reviews of the books to be taught and the whole evening is filled with inspiration for the coming campaign. Much should be made of advertising by newspaper, posters and slides. Other plans will readily suggest themselves to the cabinet. Even though a church has held one or more sessions of the School of Missions, the same active promotional work is necessary each year to maintain and increase the interest and attendance.

Enrollment

After interest has been aroused in every department of church activity, enrollment cards may be passed to every class in the Bible school. After the canvass is made in the Bible school it should be followed up in the homes as an Every Member Canvass campaign. A continuous enrollment may be made throughout the three or four weeks of the promotion campaign. Suggested enrollment card:

Classification

The number of classes will depend on the probable attendance and leaders procurable. It is best not to have large classes as the method best adapted to their use is that of free discussion. Classes should be provided for all ages. Parents may then enroll, knowing their children are being cared for by specially prepared leaders. In large churches with many classes, there may be a director chosen for each department in addition to the dean for the whole school.

The following is a suggested classification, small congregations combining classes as necessary and large congregations providing as many classes in each department as seems advisable, fifteen being the suggested enrollment for an ideal class:

Primary—Story Hour.
Junior.
Intermediate.
Senior—Young People.
Adult—Men and Women.

Curriculum

General Theme and Courses of Study 1919-1920

There is one general theme for this year's study, Christianity and Human Conservation. Following is the suggested curriculum:

Primary

Story Hour—"Mook," by Evelyn Worthley Sites. True tales about a Chinese boy and his friends. Price, cloth, 60c; paper, 40c.

Junior

Foreign—"The Honorable Crimson Tree," by Anita B. Ferris. Stories for boys and girls of the New China. Price, cloth, 60c; paper, 40c.

Home—"Americans All," by Augusta H. Seaman. Ten stirring stories of Americanization—stories to tell to children. Price, paper, 40c.

Intermediate

"Brother Van," by Stella W. Brummitt. The life of a pioneer home missionary in Montana. Price, cloth, 75c; paper, 50c.

Senior and Young People

"Ministers of Mercy," by James H. Franklin. Ten biographical sketches of famous medical missionaries. Price, cloth, 75c; paper, 50c.

ADULTS

Foreign—"New Life Currents in China," by Mary Ninde Gamewell. Owing to the present interest in China, this book comes at an opportune time. Informing chapters on public health, general and medical education, and Christian missions. Price, cloth, 75c; paper, 50c.

Home—"Christian Americanization," by Chas. A. Brooks. An outline of the "After-the-War" task that awaits the Christian forces of our country; the outcome of extensive European investigation by a man rarely qualified for his task. Price, cloth, 75c; paper, 40c.

In primary classes only the leader should have a textbook, while in all other classes every member should be urged to buy a book. These may all be ordered from College of Missions, 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.

SUPPLEMENTAL MATERIAL

There are many books which bear directly on the themes of this year's study. Several of last year's study books are splendid helps for this year's course, notably "Men and Things" for use in connection with "Christian Americanization." "Foreign Magic," by Jean Carter Cochran, cloth, $1.50, may be used as supplemental reading by seniors and young people's classes. An extended list is suggested at the close of each study book. Every magazine and newspaper will furnish fresh material daily on these great topics of the day, China and Americanization. Leaders should watch closely for these. The following magazines will be valuable for references:

World Call	$1.00
Everyland	1.50
World Outlook	2.00
National Geographic	2.00
Asia	3.00
Missionary Review of the World	2.50

LEADERSHIP

The leaders should be chosen with respect to their adaptability to the various ages. Those who have shown qualities of leadership should be selected wherever possible. The city library is a valuable aid and will provide books and lists of references if previously requested. If possible, leaders should be sent to the educational conferences of the Interchurch World Movement. These inter-denominational conferences are held for ten days each summer. Normal classes are conducted for the training of effective leadership, especially with respect to Church Schools of Missions.

Besides these inter-denominational conferences, several communions hold training schools or institutes in connection with their annual conventions in which a similar work is done. The joint committee on Missionary Education of the Christian Church, through its Pacific Coast representative and her co-workers, this year held normal classes for the training of leaders in connection with the state conventions of Arizona, Montana, Idaho, East Washington, Northern and Southern California. Its value has been demonstrated, and this year the Board of Southern California, under the leadership of Secretary F. M. Rogers, voted two hundred dollars toward defraying the expenses of a chosen faculty to attend the Asilomar Missionary Conference, to prepare for leadership in the training school during every afternoon of the state convention held in Long Beach. Northern California paid the expenses of the same faculty to do a like service at Santa Cruz. This practical training of leaders is recommended to every state board. Such a program would undergird the whole missionary enterprise and assure its success.

Dramatization

The value of this element in the Church School of Missions cannot be overestimated. By impersonation, tableau, drama or pageant, the lessons can be more deeply driven home. One class may be made responsible for a short demonstration each evening. These will often be suggested by the chapter studied. Every chapter of "Mook" may be readily dramatized.

Life Decision Service

Every church holding a Church School of Missions this year is urged to make the final study hour a Life Decision Service for the groups of young people. A definite program should be planned for this service. The leaders should themselves be prepared. Two leaflets have been written by J. Campbell White, of the Life Work Department of the Interchurch World Movement, one for pastors and leaders, the other for young men and women. These are recommended for use in this closing session. "The world will be evangelized in that generation in which the Christian teachers of its youth determine that it shall be done." This is the only generation we can ever reach and there was never a needier one. After such definite study of world fields in the Church Schools of Missions, the leaders of our youth have an unprecedented opportunity. The Master missionary is still heard saying, "Lift up your eyes and look on the fields" . . . "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest" . . . "Go ye into all the world."

Tangible Results

There have been certain outstanding and far-reaching results of this educational campaign that will commend it to other churches. Many have enrolled in these schools who have never been interested in the missionary work of the church. The Commission of Christ has been interpreted in terms of today and a new conception of the work of His Church has resulted. The dissemination of so much definite missionary information has revitalized whole churches. A deepened sense of personal stewardship has followed as shown by the increased offerings and dedication of lives to Christian service. Prayer has become intelligent, heartfelt intercession.

City-Wide Campaign

Churches in large cities will find it advantageous to conduct a city-wide campaign, holding schools simultaneously.

The city-wide campaign should be under the general supervision and direction of an inter-denominational committee, representing all communions and missionary organizations in the city. One interested person may begin by presenting the plan to the missionary committee of the Church Federation, or to the Federation of Women's Missionary Societies or the Ministerial Association, or by giving personal invitation to a called meeting where the subject may be freely discussed.

The interest and cooperation of even two or more churches being secured, then the best trained leaders should be selected for the community normal classes. Each church participating would proceed exactly as though carrying on an individual campaign, only that the chosen leaders would attend the community classes for training. The "Schools" would be held simultaneously, closing with a pageant, if desired, each church preparing a definite part. The value of such a united educational campaign in a community cannot be estimated.

The United Missionary Cabinet

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL

1. Choose representatives of every missionary interest in the church. The pastor will always be a member. Correlate the whole work of the church.

2. Make a written report regularly to the church board. These reports should be kept on file.

3. Take a church missionary inventory. Include every church activity as a basis for an intelligent program of work.

4. Use missionary literature liberally. Put a missionary magazine in every home. Have a display table with sample copies. Unify all books in one library. Keep it up-to-date.

5. Plan a challenging program of missionary finance. Estimate and apportion the missionary budget of the church. Strive to increase this budget every year. Make a list of all non-givers and cultivate them individually. Launch a tithing campaign.

6. Have a unified program of missionary education. Have graded missionary instruction in the Bible school. See that the young people have the special helps provided for twelve missionary meetings yearly. Make a calendar of special days. Hold a Church School of Missions annually.

7. Help young people find their lifework. Life decisions are mostly made in the teen-age. Use "Making Life Count," by Eugene C. Foster, as textbook on Christian Vocational Guidance. "How Pastors and Other Christian Leaders Can Help Young People Find Their Life Work" and "How To Find Your Life Work" are the titles of two leaflets written by J. Campbell White, director of Life Work Department of the Interchurch World Movement of North America, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Order a number of these; study and use wisely.

8. Pray. Undergird the whole program with prayer. Be a medium of uninterrupted power between Christ and the waiting world.

This program of the Church School of Missions is sent forth with the unqualified endorsement of the Joint Committee on Missionary Education.

Chinese Mission of Metropolitan Church, Chicago

"The Stranger in Our Midst"

THE Master's injunction to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" is being obeyed with ever increasing enthusiasm by the men and women who have caught the vision of the world redeemed through the good news which Christ brought to this sin-cursed world of ours. But there are sections in our own large cities which are just as truly "all the world" as the crowded river section where a quarter of a million Chinese live and die without ever stepping foot on land, or the banks of the swiftly running Congo. These people have come to us and are anxious to learn the source of America's greatness.

Among the nations represented in Chicago there are about five thousand Chinese. To minister to their needs, work was started a number of years ago and carried on largely by the churches which are doing mission work in South China. After working independently these missions united in a central church, called the First Chinese Evangelical Church, which has a resident native pastor and carries on to a limited degree the activities of any American church. Their work is supplemented by the Sunday schools conducted by the local churches, which are supporters of the union church.

We have two Chinese missions in Chicago, one at the Jackson Boulevard Church and one at the Metropolitan Church. The mission at the Jackson Boulevard Church has been organized for years and has taken an active part in the union work.

The work at Metropolitan, with which we are particularly concerned, was started about six years ago by Miss Lillie F. Abbott, now one of our missionaries in China. For months the Chinese manifested little interest in the mission, and it seemed doomed to failure. Only a few attended, for they are a cautious people and probably wished to assure themselves that there was no ulterior motive in this apparently unselfish effort. Gradually the tide turned and the men commenced to come.

The purpose of the mission, as announced on the printed cards which the teachers and pupils distributed, was to teach English to the Chinese, and a number of consecrated men and women gladly gave their Sunday afternoons. But English was not the only study undertaken. The opening service consisted of gospel songs—sung in Chinese by the pupils and in English by the teachers—Bible reading and prayer. Then there was a study period of an hour, during which every pupil learned a verse from the Bible. The Chinese-English Testament was used, so that the pupil had an opportunity to read in Chinese what he was learning in English. If he knew only a little English, perhaps his first verse was "God is love," or "We love Him because He first loved us." English songs were learned, and how they did love to sing, although in some cases the melody had to be imagined rather than heard.

Slowly they became interested in the things of the Kingdom, and how carefully and prayerfully they were led until one—perhaps braver than the rest—asked for baptism. He had never seen anyone go down into the water grave, but his faith was sufficient. After the first others came, until now many of the men in the school are Christians.

After a number had become Christians they asked for the privilege of having a study hour in Chinese, when they could discuss the Bible school lesson, and this hour before the regular study is their own. The talks are all in Chinese, and the pianist is the only English-speaking person present. (For this study Bible school lessons are sent from China.)

The results of the work have been more than gratifying. The men come in stolidly at first and seem absolutely lifeless, but slowly the smiling greeting of the teacher brings forth a like response, and they become interested in what is going on. Christianity is not forced on them, but the verses bearing on salvation, the gospel songs, the influence of the Christian men, silently do their work, until one of the Christians will come to the superintendent and say, "—— wants to be baptized." Then come the confession and baptism the following Sunday—itself an object lesson to those who have not given their lives to the Savior.

After they decide that the teachers are truly their friends, the Chinese consult them on matters of business, and the teacher must say that the lease is in proper form, or the application for gas is all right, or the personal property schedule should be filled out; for too often have our shrewd American business men taken advantage of their lack of knowledge.

They are invited into the American homes occasionally and they do not soon forget the lessons in Christian family life and American courtesy they receive there.

A native worker has been employed (and her salary is paid by the school) to visit in the homes in China of these men, and to teach the women and children, and help them to grow as their husbands are developing while here. The men write back home of their new-found joy, but it seems so strange to the people there, and the Bible woman, one of their own race, can explain it and open the heart to the same message.

One of the men, who has become a Christian since he left home, is planning for his son in China to become a minister. The daughter of another is looking forward to a life given to the Christian medical service. One of the pupils is now in China studying for the ministry.

Does it pay? Oh, the joy of bringing a soul to Christ and setting in motion influences which will go on down through the ages, of men and women redeemed!

ELVA L. ABBOTT.

A Satisfied Annuitant

THE National Benevolent Association's annuitants constitute a numerous, well satisfied family. It is growing very rapidly. Doubtless one of the secrets of the gratifying enlargements of this department of the Association's work is the prompt and efficient way in which this phase of the work is conducted. The annuity checks go out with such regularity and promptness as to occasion frequent and favorable comment from the annuitants. The following letter is a sample of the many commendatory letters received:

"Dear Brother Mohorter: Thank you for the check for $12 interest on bond No. 153, which was received yesterday. If all who handle the Lord's money were as prompt as you of the National Benevolent Association, much more work could be done. Of course most of the delay is before it leaves the hands of those who consider themselves the owners. I am very glad indeed that more and more Christians are coming to realize their duty to the homeless and lonely ones. S. A. Summy, Washington, D. C."

Church Extension Our Good Samaritan

PHILOSOPHERS tell us that without struggles, tribulations and anguish of spirit there is no development of character. If that be true with the individual, it is also true with the Church of the Firstborn.

The Chestnut Avenue Christian Church of Forth Worth, Texas, ought some day to be a shining gem in the crown of our Lord, for it has had trials, tribulations and setbacks that would have discouraged some congregations to the giving up point. But there are no such words as "give up" in the vocabulary of this congregation.

Some ten years ago a small band of "Christians only" met in a private home. They had no preacher, nor had they money to hire one. But those few saints loved New Testament Christianity and taught it to their children. Gradually the tiny band grew. Then they met in a lodge hall, a tent, a tabernacle, and in an abandoned Methodist church building.

Three years ago the leaders of the congregation, catching a vision of the tremendous opportunity here, began to formulate plans for the erection of a suitable house of worship. They had been meeting in shacks. But shacks are not attractive to the thinking people of any community, so our people realized that if they were to really command respect and attention they must build a church that would not have to be apologized for. Some wanted to build a small church to meet present needs (strange it is, but that element always seems to be present). But the wiser ones knew it would be sheer folly to erect a building too small for future needs as well as present needs. Finally, after much discussion it was agreed to erect a structure that would accommodate a thousand members.

And then entered the ghost, the financial bogey man. Architects said the building would cost at least $20,000. Even the most optimistic members trembled at the gigantic undertaking. The money was not in sight nor in the pockets of the brethren either. Nor could it be procured at the banks. For the number of banks that will not take church notes is legion.

And then cometh the good Samaritan, Church Extension. They granted us a loan of $10,500 on a building that cost $27,000. Had it not been for the promise of that loan even before we let the contract, we could never have erected this beautiful and commodious temple of worship. Every man and woman of this congregation breathes a prayer of thanksgiving for the timely help of the Board of Church Extension.

Chestnut Avenue Christian Church has an ideal location. It is situated just twelve blocks west from the great Swift and Armour packing plants, which employ more than 5,000 persons. It is on the corner lot of Chestnut Avenue at 25th Street, which is destined to become one of the great highways of traffic in Fort Worth. In the summer it is a conservative estimate indeed to say that at least 20,000 people pass our building every day. On special events, such as the Fourth of July at Lake Worth, probably 50,000 people pass our corner in one day. The parish in which we have to work as the sole Christian Church is a residence district of at least 30,000 people.

September Bible school average, 197. Bible school collections for the entire year will average above $11. Audiences at the preaching services will average at present between 125 and 150, three to four times as many as in the little church. The pastor has had the joy and privilege of adding 71 new members to the church during the past eleven months.

The future of this church is bright, and fraught with possibilities. All members are elated over the growth made this year and the minister and his congregation turn with joyous faces to greet the new year.

ROBERT R. YELDERMAN, Minister.

Development Department

Christian Woman's Board of Missions

Development of the Home Base

JESUS is calling to His Church today for the consummate work of world reconstruction. He calls in the challenge of conditions among all the nations. He cries to us from every devastated land. He has flung wide the doors of opportunity throughout the earth. He prescribes the principles of brotherhood and peace for clashing races and classes. By His eternal power and authority the Church is commanded out across the world to inaugurate Christ's program among men.

Through the scourge of war our dead consciences have been lashed to life, our hearts have responded to the cry of crushed humanity, and our hands have learned to let go their hold of wealth and to fling forth God-intrusted bounty to heal a wounded and dying world. The Spirit of God is moving mightily upon the whole Church today, and a new sense of responsibility and stewardship is being born. The Interchurch World Movement is marshaling the armies of God as they have never before been marshaled, while new potentialities of prayer are being released and the voice of intercession is carrying the throbbing heart of the world to the great God of the universe for His healing touch.

Untouched Resources for Service

One of the most significant lessons from our war experience is found in the response given by women to all patriotic and humanitarian appeals. As we think of the multitudes of devoted and capable women who rendered such important auxiliary service, we realize the tremendous resources latent in the Christian womanhood of Canada and the United States.

Women are peculiarly responsive to appeals of human need. Their deep capacity for religious experience, their sympathetic nature, their relationship to childhood and to the homes of the world, their faithfulness to duty and their capacity for love fit them in unique ways for service of Christ in the work of world uplift and redemption.

The Christian womanhood of the world, with its measureless sources of service, love, gifts and prayers only waits the impelling vision and the practical leadership to be effectively marshaled for the world's uplift. When the Red Cross organized for enlisting and utilizing the energies of the womanhood of America thousands of thoughtless and self-centered women found a new significance in life as they lost themselves in service for others. Conclusive demonstration has been given of the response that may be expected when leaders in missionary work develop the organization, adopt the practical plans, train themselves for fullest efficiency, dedicate their time and strength to this supreme task and vitalize their work through prayer.

Responsibilities of Leadership

When a woman is elected to any official position in Christian activity it is not only an expression of confidence on the part of others, but every such opportunity for service is an invitation from God. With the invitation comes the command, and with the command the power, if we seek it, to effectively perform our appointed tasks.

No one should accept an office without giving to the responsibilities assumed the very best service of which she is capable, and no Christian can decline such a call until assured that the call is not of Christ. Appeals for consecration have become trite, nevertheless, consecration is the first step in the Christian life following the burial of the old body of sin in the baptismal grave with Christ. We rise to walk and serve in a new life—a Spirit filled life, an abounding life of love, and joy, of gentleness and humility, of service, and peace, and victory and power.

If the women of our churches are not won and held for the work of world uplift, this most important of all undertakings, with the very presence and power of Christ promised for it all, is not the failure to be found in the leadership? Surely it is not in the message, nor the Power.

Women are much given to group activity. They respond to all calls for organization that seem to them worth while. They listen with eager interest whenever the calls and opportunities for missionary service are brought to them convincingly. Is it not a first and fundamental duty of every officer and field worker to prepare herself to present the work convincingly? The tremendous service given through Red Cross and other war activities is an earnest of the response that will come whenever equally imperative duties and responsibilities are convincingly brought to the womanhood of our churches, together with practical expressional opportunities.

May we not, as laborers together with Him, enter into such a dedicated and prayer-empowered service as our past has not known? All the resources of Christ are ours if we can but wholly leave the lowlands of self-interest and desire, and climb to the heights of life with Him. For He is able to do for us exceedingly abundantly beyond all that we ask or think.

Preparation for Leadership

In this little message to state and provincial officers and field workers, we would suggest three essential phases of preparation for effective service:

First, we must realize that no service can be strong and fruitful until there is complete and constant surrender to God, and consecration to service. Are not daily communion and power in intercessory prayer prerequisite for such service? Do we not all need the same devotion, the same enduement, and guidance that we expect to find in the lives of missionaries? Assuredly our first preparation must be spiritual.

Second, we must know the Book. We must be able to quote and read those passages from the Bible that reveal the great plan and program of God. We must vitalize our presentation of the Scriptures with understanding and enthusiastic faith on our own part, knowing that the Spirit will not fail to convince and bring conviction to those who hear.

Third, we must "look upon the fields" until our hearts burn for their entry and development. Our messages, spoken and written, must bring vision and realization to the women of our churches. Much reading, careful selection and preparation of information to be presented, then the whole vitalized through prayer will make our messages richly fruitful.

The last phase of preparation lies in mastery of plans for expressional work on the part of those who are reached and enlisted through our messages and appeals. Women must be led to see that there is worth-while work to which their time and money are to be given; and further, that plans are adequate to accomplish the desired results. We must master plans and methods as outlined and adopted if our army of development workers, state and provincial, district, county and local, are inspired and instructed for attaining their objectives. Electric power, no matter how great, is ineffective unless applied to the necessary machinery designed to produce desired results. The machinery of organization is as essential in Christian work as in Red Cross work, war campaigns, or any form of cooperative activity, while the divine sources of power available to us assure immeasurable results if we but rightly make the connections.

Our Home Base Task

As a people we have about 8,000 churches in the United States and Canada. Fewer than 1,000 of these congregations are giving worthily for missions. Thousands of members in our inert churches have no realization of the importance of Christ's commission, or vision of the waiting world. In about 5,000 of these churches there are no missionary societies, but in all these visionless churches there are earnest-hearted Christians who must be enlisted for cooperation in the missionary cause. The cause needs their love, their prayer, their gifts.

Churches that have had a woman's missionary society for a few years are not visionless and non-cooperating. Wherever groups of women are earnestly banded together "to cultivate a missionary spirit; to disseminate missionary intelligence; to encourage missionary effort in the church, and to secure systematic contributions for missionary purposes" the church will be brought into touch with the great missionary movements of the day and will gradually come into cooperation with all lines of missionary enterprise.

It is estimated that there are at least 600,000 women and girls in our churches, while but 100,000 are as yet actively enlisted in missionary work.

The aims of the Five-Year Campaign constitute our immediate Home Base task. The General Aims for 1920-21 are as follows:

Organizations	10,000
Enrolled Members	250,000
WORLD CALL	100,000
King's Builders	25,000
Offerings	$1,000,000

Departmental Aims for 1920-21 are as follows:

	W. M. S.	Y.W.M.C.	Bs &Gs
Organizations	4,500	1,500	4,000
Members	175,000	25,000	50,000
Subscriptions	100,000		25,000
Offerings	$500,000	$50,000	$30,000

Cultivation of Churches

Careful study should be made of all churches of the state or province, planning for all of them something of missionary information; cultivating a missionary spirit in at least a few women in every church, and carefully fostering any awakening interest until the time comes for organization. This program will involve a systematic study and classification of churches, preserving information in a usable form. Such information should be secured and tabulated concerning all churches listed in the Year Book. As information is secured churches should be listed as:

1. Waiting for organization.
2. Indifferent toward missionary work.
3. Opposed to missions.

Methods to be used in opening the doors of non-missionary churches can be adapted to the attitude of the congregation. Correspondents should be found in all churches who will undertake to circulate missionary literature. Stereopticon presentations will often win a hearing, overcome prejudice and awaken interest. Some churches will require cultivation through a period of years before a missionary society should be organized.

A definite number of non-cooperating churches should be reached each year. Lists of churches should be carefully studied to determine the form of field work best adapted to meet local needs. Itineraries should be planned for the holding of efficiency institutes, rallies, missionary schools, stereopticon lectures, visits by returned missionaries or field workers, and house to house calling by county committee women.

Young Woman's Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs

The Circle Department is entering upon the growth in its work for which it is planning, working, and praying. Between October 1st and December 1st there were reported twenty-six newly organized circles. This is a splendid beginning and we confidently expect the rate of increase to advance so that we shall really be able to have 1,200 organizations by October, 1920.

Circle girls will be interested to know what has recently happened in the District of Columbia. Something over a year ago, they had only one circle. Now they have eleven, and one more about to be organized will place one in practically every church in the District. They have made a very fine record and are enthusiastic, loyal girls. They hold quarterly meetings for the whole District, which is a plan more Circles might follow to advantage.

A new Circle play has just come in to headquarters. It is called "The Pill Bottle" and is as interesting as its title suggests, being a presentation of medical missions. Any Circle wanting something new to give should secure this. Its price is fifteen cents a copy.

The annual Board meeting of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions at Cincinnati took action to place the Triangle Clubs in the Circle Department. Since the Clubs are made up of teen age boys and girls it seems fitting that they should enter the Young People's ranks. The Circles are glad to welcome the 315 Clubs and hope they will like their new associates.

The state secretaries who have charge of Circle work will now direct Triangle Clubs also.

New Triangle Club programs are now available from the Literature Department, College of Missions Building, Indianapolis, and all Clubs which have not yet secured them should do so at once. They are for use from January to June and are studies about China, in accordance with the United Missionary Study work. We want to see Triangle Clubs grow this year, just as Circles are going to.

Our Boys and Girls

Are the boys and girls of your church receiving any missionary instruction? Why?

If they are it is because somebody is realizing that in your boys and girls there are future church leaders, and preachers and missionaries and that the training for this important work must be begun in the impressionable years of life. If they are not it is probably because everybody thinks it should be done and nobody says, "Here am I, Lord."

The clearness with which we see the task which is to be laid upon the Church fifteen years hence, and the alacrity with which we respond to the call for the foundation work today is a good index to our faith that the "knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

If there is "no place" in the program of the church to show the need of the world to its young life there is every reason to expect that when full growth has been attained there will be "no place" in that life for world service.

In every primary and junior department of every Sunday school there should be missionary instruction. Aside from this in every church there should be an additional meeting of the same juniors at least once each month for instruction and training along missionary lines. If the instruction in the Primary Department of the Sunday school is properly given that is perhaps adequate, but not so with the juniors. This is the age for the assembling and the memorizing of facts. Definite studies of the great fields of service should be given and memory work required. This cannot be done in the time allotted for Sunday school work.

The obligation upon the church for the training of the young is as certain as that which rests upon our nation for the education of its youth in the public schools.

Beginning with January and continuing for six months the Juniors will study China. In the Sunday schools it will be "The Flag of Five Colors." In the King's Builders, missionary studies for the Junior Societies and Mission Bands will be in the form of special study of our stations in China with handwork as an interetsing feature. Additional articles on "Chinese Boys and Girls at Home," "Chinese Boys and Girls in School" and "How Chinese Children Worship" will appear, also pictures of Chinese life and other interesting bits of information.

Picture sheets of Chinese life and of our own stations may be secured from headquarters. "Waiting for the Doctor" is a good play for Juniors. "Mai-ling's Adventure," a chapter of "The Honorable Crimson Tree," has been dramatized and can be put on by Juniors with the assistance of one or two older ones. These are available now. A list of Chinese stories and where they are to be found will be sent upon request to the Boys' and Girls' Department.

Literature

Lord Bacon wrote long ago that "Reading maketh a full man," and we are finding it difficult today to keep pace with the "filling process" our missionary women are demanding.

The uncertainties of the printing business these days caused a delay of a month in the delivery of the program leaflets for January-June, 1920. However, these are now ready and may be secured from the Literature Department, College of Missions Building, Indianapolis, Indiana, price 50 cents per set; single leaflets, 3 cents.

January—Sunderi, Experiences in India (Dr. Ada McNeil Gordon); Sanitarium at Pendra Road (Dr. Mary Longdon); Three Autobiographical Sketches and Personal Experiences (Dr. Zoena M. Rothermel, Dr. Bertha M. Thompson, Dr. Jenny Crozier).

February—The Healing of China (Mrs. Eva Raw Baird); How the Medical Missionary Works (Dr. Osgood); Six Hobbies and a Family (Bert Wilson).

March—Opening Tibetan Doors; The Healing of Tibet (Bert Wilson); A Life for Tibet (Ellie K. Payne).

April—Women and Children of the Phillippines (Mrs. Myrtle Wilson Stipp).

(Mrs. Pickett kindly consented to prepare a leaflet, but was hindered by illness. We are hoping for one later.)

At a conference of state officers in connection with the Cincinnati convention it was decided to have the News Letter issued quarterly this year.

The issuing of the campaign leaflets has been delayed for a number of good reasons. New Home for the Aged in Florida

THE National Benevolent Association has just acquired the property of the bankrupt Florida Military Academy at Murry Hill, a beautiful suburban community of Jacksonville, Florida. This property consists of six acres of land under cultivation, and a very substantial, ornate brick and stone building. With comparatively little alteration it will accommodate from eighty-five to one hundred persons. It has a capacity almost equal to all of the Association's other homes for the aged combined.

The opportunity to secure it seemed providential. The Association was confronted with a long and constantly growing list of waiting applicants. Daily messages were being received from churches and ministers begging us in mercy's name to admit some worthy Disciple of Christ in dire distress. Often and often before the request could be granted the applicant had to be sent to the poorhouse, to the humiliation of the church. The necessity for enlargement was great, but there was the prohibitive cost of building standing squarely across the way. The Board was perplexed and distressed. Immediate enlargement was a necessity and the per capita cost of a new building was staggering. Then came the word from John T. Boone, minister of the First Church, Jacksonville, Florida, that the creditors of the Florida Military Academy would take their equity, $30,000, for the property. A careful appraisement places its present valuation at from $60,000 to $75,000. With an outlay of about $10,000 for alterations and $5,000 for furnishings, it will give us an ideal home for the aged and enable us to give relief almost immediately to that long line of travel-worn pilgrims who stand waiting outside our doors.

Florida furnishes a delightful climate for old people. The winters are mild, indeed they are often so mild as to scarcely require any fuel. Vegetation is abundant. Flowers bloom almost every month in the year. Here, fanned by the sea breezes in summer, secure from the rigors of our northern winters, they will find the largest degree of comfort.

Within three months' time the Association hopes to be ready to throw open the doors of this beautiful home with a cordial welcome to our aged, needy brethren. Here they will find each a room for himself with hot and cold water. Here they will find a reading room, spacious social rooms, a good chapel and a hospital. We need $10,000 at once for alterations. Who will be the first to subscribe? We will need $500 to furnish the hospital. Who would like to furnish it as a memorial? We will need $100 apiece for at least 50 rooms we desire to open at once. A gift of $100 will entitle the donor to name the room. We should have $500 for the dining room.

Brethren, here is an opportunity to have fellowship with Christ in His sufferings. Report at once to the National Benevolent Association, 2955 Euclid Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri.

Living Links

THE scale of advance for missionary salaries, beginning with October 1, 1919, the high cost of exchange on money of foreign countries and added expense in upkeep of stations, demand an increase in cost of Living Links. The Foreign Christian Missionary Society and Christian Woman's Board of Missions are submitting the following increase to all individuals, organizations and churches in the Living Link class:

Where an individual missionary is assigned to a church, organization or an individual, they are asked to give $1,000 annually.

Some churches and organizations supporting missionaries in the past may be unable to meet this increased amount. Any such are requested to assume support of a Sustaining Link.

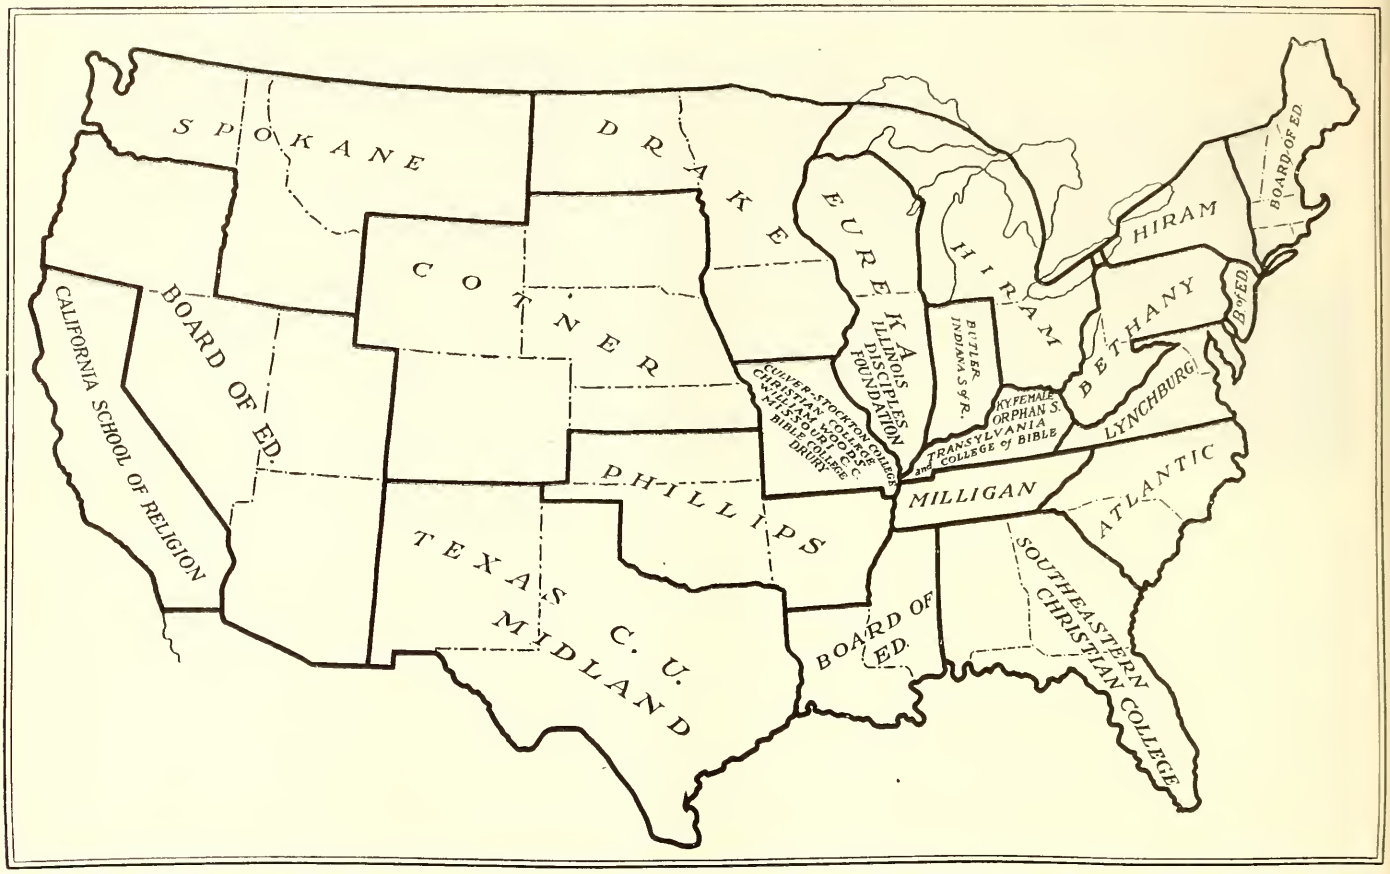
The Sustaining Link provides support for the activities of a certain Local Station, or may be divided among two or more stations. In every mission station there are current expenses on property, repairs and upkeep; supplies for schools, orphanages, hospitals, dormitories, native churches, relief and evangelistic work, support of native evangelists, Bible women, teachers, hospital assistants, helpers and wards.

Support for Sustaining Links will be assigned to churches, or organizations or individuals contributing $800 annually for such work. Those supporting Sustaining Links may designate the station in which they wish their funds used.

Churches and organizations providing $600 annually will be listed for support of Living Link Standards and may be assigned to a unit in some station.

All leaders are urged to bring their churches and organizations up to the required amount necessary for the Living Links this missionary year. All churches, organizations and individuals who have been assigned an individual missionary will be given due time in which to reach the required amount of $1,000 annually. No individual missionaries will be assigned from this time on for less than $1,000 annually.

New Plan for Handling Education Offerings



The Board of Education Suggests This Allotment of Territory to Its Institutions in Order That an Intensive Cultivation of the Whole Field May Be Assured

The Board Desires in No Way to Hamper the Promotional Work of Institutions Which Are at Present Not Represented on the Board.

The recent International Convention held at Cincinnati, Ohio, adopted certain recommendations regarding the handling of offerings from the churches to the colleges for defraying current expenses. The recommendations were presented to the Convention on Friday afternoon, October 17, 1919, by the Committee on Recommendations and were adopted practically unanimously by the Convention.

The new plan differs very materially from the apportionment plan of the Men and Millions Movement and also from the former method of handling the educational offerings which form part of the missionary budget of the local church. It is believed that the new plan meets all the objections which have been urged against the former methods. Every effort possible has been put forth to formulate a plan which will be just and satisfactory.

The new plan concerns only those institutions which are members of the Board of Education but, inasmuch as twenty-six of our colleges, universities, and Bible chairs are members, and only two or three institutions do not hold membership in the Board of Education, the new plan is well-nigh universal in its application. If offerings are designated to those institutions which are not members of the Board, they should be sent direct to those institutions and not to the office of the Board of Education.

Recommendations Adopted at Cincinnati, Ohio, Friday Afternoon, October 17, 1919

We recommend:

1. That the Board of Education be made the clearing house for all gifts to current expenses, for the colleges and institutions belonging to the Board.

2. That the territory allotted to the respective colleges and institutions for cultivation be observed, and that it be taken for granted that the gifts from a given territory are to go to the institution or institutions of said territory unless otherwise specified.

3. That where there is more than one Disciple college in a given territory, a basis for the distribution of gifts from said territory shall be mutually agreed upon; and in case of failure of such colleges to reach an agreement, the Board of Education shall determine the ratio.

4. That the right of solicitation of gifts for current expenses by the colleges, from churches and individuals, be recognized and encouraged; but that institutions shall urge the churches in their territories to remit all moneys to the treasurer of the Board of Education.

5. That there be the closest cooperation between the colleges and the Board of Education in this matter, and that monthly reports be made to the Board by the colleges, and by the Board to the respective colleges, of all gifts received during the month.

6. That a full and complete account and report be made each year by the Board of Education to the International Convention of all moneys received during the year by the Board and each of its constituent members.

7. That, as the offerings are sent in, the Board of Education shall deduct such proportionate amount per month as is apportioned to meet its budget. The balance shall be remitted to the colleges monthly. (It has been agreed that the small sum of one penny per year per church member will be tolled for budget of Board.)

Reasons for Plan

1. Because of mistakes and misunderstandings regarding the disposition of offerings, it seems necessary to have a plan so simple and clear that no one can misunderstand. The new plan is easily understood.

2. Because in states such as Missouri, where we have more than one college, many churches have not desired to designate any one college; hence, in many instances, no offerings have been made. The new plan solves this problem.

3. Because it is desirable that a complete report of gifts to education be made each year for the International Convention. Under the old plan this has been impossible.

4. Because it is important that churches making offerings to education be given proper credit in the Year Book. The new plan takes care of this for the twenty-six members of the Board.

5. Because a more equitable method of financing the Board of Education is needed. Under the old plan the colleges have borne the expense by direct assessments. This has worked a hardship on the weaker institutions.

6. Because the Board of Education is not included in the United Christian Missionary Society. The Society will have a central treasury. It is necessary that the educational interests have a central treasury also.

7. Because there is needed a strong and efficient Board of Education which can help our struggling colleges to secure adequate support. Unless the Christian colleges survive, the Christian church will perish.

Points to Remember

1. Do not confuse this plan with the Men and Millions Movement apportionments. They are entirely distinct propositions.

2. Definite territory has been assigned the institutions that hold membership in the Board of Education for cultivation and support.

3. The offerings from each territory go to support the institutions in that territory unless otherwise specified.

4. No money is sent from one state or territory to another except by special request.

5. The small sum of one penny per year per church member will be assessed against each state or territory for the expenses of the Board of Education.

6. This plan applies only to offerings for current expenses. It does not include gifts for buildings, equipment, and endowments.

7. All offerings should be sent to the Board of Education. After they have been properly credited and receipted, the money will be sent to the institution or institutions for which it is intended.

"White Coal" in the Church

THERE'S a lot of beautiful water loosing its power over the waterfalls of America—loosing and losing. They call it white coal. There's a lot of honest energy in the church today foaming over the rocks of pay-the-debt and buy-the-coal and rescue-the-perishing with chicken pie suppers at half price. They call it the Ladies' Aid Society. Good and loyal to the core, this home guard of the church has been treated more like a body of marines that were just naturally expected to land anywhere that trouble was and not only carry the job to a finish, but do it well—anything from cleaning up the cemetery to buying a new hood for a smoking chimney, and pay for it stitch, stitch, stitch!

Oh, what a waste of the ministry of women! Oh, that one might free them from the task of the smoke-hood and set a child before them. Give them the things their hearts rejoice in, the tasks of ministry and mercy. What a world of "white coal" ready to move the machinery of love!

The other day we saw this wish come true. It was at Princeton, Illinois, where the teacher of a class of young married women who had been using their needles for war needs, proposed that since the war need was past they go right on, but switch their activities into the established program of the church. Specifically, she proposed that they sew for the orphanages of the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. This met with instant approval. But this teacher was a general and overlooked nothing. She saw at once that her class comprised but part of the women (and girls) of the church. She proposed to the rest that they form an organization with directors that would enlist every woman. It was done. Each member of the league or guild was to make two articles (from washrags to dresses). All material was to be new. An experienced seamstress amongst them guided them, especially in the cutting. A letter was written to one of our orphanages inquiring just what items would be most acceptable. Now they could act intelligently and do nothing at random—a valuable point to be remembered. Fingers began to fly and hearts to tingle with the thought that they were not only rendering a loving service to a host of little folks, but were helping the church to honor its Christ right in its own land and country. In all this cutting and sewing and talking and imagining do you think these folks had a good time? And what do you estimate was the value to the younger members of joining with their elders in this fervor of service?

Well, bye and bye the garments were completed and they brought them to the church for an evening of happiness. They hung them on the walls and over the rostrum and laid them on the tables, a great multitude of them. Then they invited their friends, and these modern Dorcases, improving a bit upon the model, refused to leave the exhibition of their work to any posthumous agents, however well intentioned, but insisted on themselves showing to their friends the garments that they themselves had made. Little Mary Alice conducted many a friend (and with what pride you may imagine) to see the two washrags she had made. Matron Nimblefingers showed the two dresses she had made for girls of ten, and Grandma Goodheart showed two each of pillowslips and sheets for single beds. The evening ended with very light refreshments at five cents a plate to provide money for more new material. Do you think that evening was a success for solid enjoyment? Moreover, there were some outsiders who caught the idea and hurried home to plant the seed in another church.

So when that happy evening was over they took all those pretty garments from the walls and packed them in a very large box—there was two hundred dollars' worth of finished garments, made mostly of laughter and good times, having cost much to nobody.

In due time the box arrived at one of our orphanages, and then what? Nothing but more good times. And when it came to trying on there were laughter and looking-glasses (what's a new dress without a looking-glass and a wry neck?), giggles of joy and blushes of pride and—oh, joy!—best of all, they fit, and they were new!

Then, last of all and maybe best of all, there came back to these needlewomen of Princeton, Illinois, a goodly letter of gentle and genuine gratitude for the big box of love. And in a public place they read the letter, and every one knew that Christ comes into the hearts of men "that their joy might be full." FRED KLINE.

As an addendum to Brother Kline's article on "White Coal in the Church," I wish to say a few words to that same loyal "home guard of the church" who have been losing their power, so to speak, in doing things that ought to be done in other ways.

Brother Kline tells of how the loyal home guard of the Princeton, Illinois, church have decided to use this white coal of energy in making garments and providing the things necessary for the comfort and support of the children in the orphanages of the National Benevolent Association of the church. That is well, very, very well, and we rejoice with Brother Kline over their happy work. But now, this is what I would like to add: We have some of the dearest old people in our havens of rest for the aged and they, too, need comforts and support, they, too, are made to laugh and be happy over the opening of a box of nice new and pretty things. Why not include them in the proposed activities? Of course, there are more children and more articles must go in their box, but might not the old people have one article from each loyal home guard, or even a third of the number of articles for their box? Dear friends, do not forget the old people. Their delight, their happiness and appreciation of what you may do will surely abundantly repay you for all you may do.

We hope many of our ladies' aid societies will follow the example of this fine society of Princeton. It will do them good as it will do good to the family in our homes whether children or old people, and help the governing boards in their problems of how they shall be clothed and fed and made comfortable. MRS. J. K. HANSBROUGH.

Willing Workers Guild, Princeton, Illinois

The Princeton Plan

THE guild was born in the hearts of a few women who wished to enlist the interest and efforts of the women of our church in clothing the children in our Christian orphanage in St. Louis. Their enthusiasm was contagious and in a few weeks most of the women and girls of the church were organized in groups of ten, with a leader for each group, and all had promised to furnish two new garments annually as their membership fee in the guild. Wednesday afternoon was set aside as guild afternoon when the women were to meet and sew for the orphanage. Twice each year an exhibition of goods made and contributed is held at the church when the membership of the church is invited to look at the display of garments and supplies.

The effect of the guild upon the church has been marked. It has resulted in increased liberality of time and money on the part of the women and many of the men are making cash gifts who were not interested in benevolence prior to the organization of this guild. The entire membership has a sense of pride in the work the women are doing and the cash offering to the National Benevolent Association more than doubled during the past year.

Socially this organization is reacting favorably. It furnishes a worth-while outlet for the social energy of the women. It takes the place of Wednesday clubs, thimble clubs and other social clubs of a purely social nature, for in the guild meetings this side is kept alive and light refreshments are served at the close of the work period. Every care is taken to create a splendid social atmosphere in the guild meetings.

The guild has appealed to several splendid women who are not members of our church, and they have been added to the list of the friends of the church through this work. They are naturally becoming more and more concerned with the work of the church and especially of the Willing Workers' Bible class, under whose auspices the guild work was instituted and is being carried on.

As a pastor I am delighted with the way in which this organization has linked us with those who need our help. We cannot serve without being helped ourselves, for bread cast upon the water will return in many ways. The growing feeling of friendship that comes from a comradeship in a worthy cause is one of the by-products of this helpful service and I can heartily commend the Willing Workers Guild to every church and minister in the brotherhood. I will be glad to answer any inquiries in regard to the details of the organization and conduct of the guild. CECIL C. CARPENTER.

Great Survey Conference at Atlantic City in January

INVITATIONS have been sent to more than a thousand leaders in home and foreign missions, and other church activities for the World Survey Conference to be held at Atlantic City January 7 to 10 next. Those who attend will be the representatives of the evangelical denominations and boards, numbering nearly a hundred, which are co-operating in the Interchurch World Movement of North America.

The conference will consider the preliminary results of the world-wide surveys the Interchurch Movement has been carrying on for many months and decide on a joint program. The surveys will make it possible for the first time to visualize the whole task of the Church and to know approximately what it will cost in men and money for American Protestantism to undertake its fair share of responsibility for world evangelization. The various denominations will be asked to determine their individual responsibility, to frame their own budgets and to decide by mutual agreement on a date in the spring of next year for a united, simultaneous financial appeal both to their own constituencies and to American Protestantism as a whole.

The Interchurch Movement has made public the following tentative program of its activities next year:

Spiritual emphasis during January, beginning with Week of Prayer Conference, Field Department, Atlantic City, January 6-7.

World Survey Conference, January 7-10, Atlantic City.

Ministers' State Conferences, January 20 to March 1.

Laymen's Conference, January 31, February 1-2.

Christian Stewardship: February 22, Stewardship: February 29, Life Enrollment.

County Conferences, February-March.

Metropolitan Conferences, February, March, April.

Township Conferences, March-April.

Life Service and Evangelism, March, culminating in a great ingathering on Easter Sunday, April 4, 1920.

Financial Campaign, probably last of April. Date to be determined by World Survey Conference.

May to September, Conservation conferences, also Missionary Education and General Interchurch World Movement Conferences.

Panther Attacks Dr. Mary Longdon

INDIA is the paradise of all sorts of wild animals. Even in India, however, it is not very often that the missionary has a personal encounter with any of the more dangerous inhabitants of the jungle, such as tiger or panther. In all the years since the Disciples of Christ began their mission work in India until now, no missionary had ever had even a scratch from a wild animal, or been bitten by a snake. When at last the fateful day arrived, it was not one of the men, who sometimes go out with guns to challenge the beasts —and take their skins as trophies—but one of the women who went out with empty hands to protect her homestead, to whom the lot fell.

This introduces the story of Doctor Mary Longdon's nearly fatal encounter with the panther. Doctor Longdon lives all alone on the edge of the jungle near the tuberculosis sanitarium at Pendra Road. In the small hours of the morning of October 14 the doctor heard something tearing down the little house near her bedroom door, where she kept some fine fowls on which she depends for nourishing food for the sick folks in the sanitarium. Without stopping to think much about it, she went out alone in the dark, just in time to see the shadowy form of a panther sneaking away toward the jungle. The intruder had fled on her approach, but no sooner had she tucked herself in bed again than the fowls were attacked a second time. This time she rushed out and caught the thief inside the chicken house. She tried to drive him out with a stick. At first he refused to run away. Then, having escaped from a hole in the rear of the house, he came around to the front and suddenly threw his huge form upon the unsuspecting doctor. He seized her arm in his teeth, which passed entirely through the arm, and with his claws he tore her skin in a dozen places, scratching her badly from head to foot. The doctor's screams brought a patter of bare feet from cottages and hospital, for all the people knew she was alone with nobody but themselves anywhere near. At the sound of voices and flash of lights the panther reluctantly released his hold and again fled, growling, into the jungle.

Now here was the doctor at four o'clock in the morning, terribly wounded, and the nearest doctor many hours away—it was sixty hours before a doctor finally reached her. So, suffering from pain and shock and fright, she proceeded to tell Harri Singh, one of the old Damoh orphanage boys, how to clean the wounds and sew up the worst of them; and he did it.

As soon as might be, they telegraphed to Doctor Mary McGavran at Damoh. There is no other doctor at Damoh except the government surgeon. The native hospital assistant was very ill with fever and there was no one who could carry on the treatment of the one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty patients a day who were coming to the hospital, so it had to be closed. Doctor McGavran reached Pendra Road by the quickest possible way, sixty hours after Doctor Longdon had been mauled. She took the doctor to Bilaspur and there, Doctor Crozier helping in every way possible, they kept up the fight against infection and death day and night for weeks. Mrs. Penner, from the Mennonite Mission, a trained nurse, left her home and work in answer to a telegram and took the night work in caring for Doctor Longdon. After some days the fever began to abate, some of the wounds healed and at last reports, though still very weak and ill, Doctor Longdon was out of danger.

This story points several morals. First, when they took the doctor away from Pendra Road, Ivalu Andrus, one of the new missionaries from the College of Missions, went to Pendra and alone took entire charge of the hospital and sanitarium. The panther came back and prowled around the house as usual, and later killed a child, and still threatens the neighborhood for all anyone here knows. There is not an extra nurse or even another extra missionary to send to Pendra Road to be with Miss Andrus in this somewhat lonely place. There is no competent native assistant, either man or woman, to help with the care of the people in the tuberculosis sanitarium or in the hospital. Do we here at home believe that this is even good business, or that it is worthy of our people? The tuberculosis sanitarium, which serves our own and several other missions, and is a very haven of salvation to multitudes of Indian young people, is located at Pendra and is a great example from which other folks judge as to just what sort of people the Disciples really are.

Second. The Mennonite friends, our nearest and good Christian neighbors, had to cripple their own work and send one of their most needed workers to help out our overtaxed and undermanned Bilaspur station. No one out in India has yet suggested that these good friends are either "seetarians" or "denominationalists." The missionaries out there call them brethren in Christ and thank the Lord that they are there.

Third. The Damoh hospital for women and children, treating an average of one hundred and thirty a day, had to be closed for three weeks or more, because it is normally undermanned and inadequate, and has to close whenever an accident calling the doctor away happens, the doctor herself breaks down, or supplies run out. In that three weeks nearly three thousand treatments that ought to have been given—some of them matters of life and death—were not given. Is it any wonder that missionaries and native helpers alike, grow discouraged and fall ill under such circumstances?

Since the above account went to the printers further and worse news has come from Dr. Longdon. The wounds refused to heal. Tetanus set in and for four days her life was in momentary danger from lockjaw. The doctors had done all they could to anticipate this danger and had used serum as soon as it could be procured. On the twenty-third day, after five days of tetanus, she seemed to be out of danger for the time being.

Going and Growing

AT the last meeting of the Board of Ministerial Relief five names were added to the relief roll, two preachers, two missionaries and one widow. Increases were made to four, making the total per month allowed at this one meeting $130. This brings the total number on the roll up to 229 and the payments are now at the rate of $54,304 annually.

The Board is compelled to make many increases owing to the continually rising costs. Many new names are added at each Board meeting. This necessitates a much larger gain in receipts. We have faith to believe that when the churches know of the great and urgent needs they will respond to meet them.

The Board congratulates itself on the election of G. I. Hoover, evangelist of the Eastern District of Indiana, as a trustee to fill the place left vacant by the death of W. S. Dickinson. Mr. Hoover is deeply interested in all the enterprises of the churches and because of his wise counsel and discernment will be a very valuable addition to the Board.

Since the removal of W. S. Dickinson as vice-president, his place had been vacant. At this meeting President T. C. Howe was elected to this position.

Receipts for the year thus far make a good showing, the total gain over the same date last year is $2,893.67, indicating the continually larger place this sacred ministry has in the affections of the churches.

Is Their Fight Our Fight?

"LET no man suppose that progress can be divorced from religion, or that there is any platform written for the ministers of reform other than the platform written in the utterances of our Lord and Savior." —Woodrow Wilson.

As has been said before, the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare is now launching its new and enlarged program, and in the future will stress and labor for the enforcement of law, for world prohibition, and for social welfare. Lincoln said regarding law enforcement: "Let reverence for the law be breathed by every American woman to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpits, proclaimed in legislative halls and enforced in courts of justice, and in short, let it become the political religion of the nation, and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all the sexes and tongues and colors and conditions sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."

A recent Methodist Temperance Bulletin under the heading of "Their Fight, Our Fight," says: "The war has cast a lightning-vivid flash of illumination upon the fact that all of the world's eggs are in one basket. What is produced in England and France and Scotland, and all Europe, goes into one pantry with the production of the United States." If this is true commercially, should it not be true socially, morally and spiritually? Are the people of our country to shut their eyes to the proceedings and happenings of the rest of the world?

Dr. C. W. Saleeby, an Englishman, has written to the "British Journal of Inebriety," concerning prohibition in the United States:

"It is not the monomania of a few so-called fanatics, but the general consensus of public opinion in all classes that has added the prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution of the United States. The results of the drastic measures of prohibition already taken in wide areas, both urban and rural, have widely convinced many, from governors of states downwards, who were opposed to such measures until they had been enforced. I was in twelve states, most of them 'dry,' and nowhere did I find any appreciable or respectable body of opinion asking for a return to the old conditions. I was enabled to compare the vital, criminal and industrial statistics in many states and cities before and after prohibition—in cases both of recent and of more remote enactment. Their evidence conforms to more than the most sanguine expectations, and it is particularly to be observed that the contrast was between prohibition and extensive measures of control. I had the advantage of personal conversation with several governors of states, and with more mayors, chiefs of police, medical officers and so forth, than I can remember. Their testimony was unanimous and enthusiastic.

"There is a general determination amongst American people everywhere to make the eighteenth constitutional amendment as effective as the rest of the Federal Constitution in increasing degree from January 16, 1920."

The following paragraph shows the readiness and willingness of representatives from other countries to cooperate with us in the suppression of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks: "At the conclusion of a recent Washington Temperance Conference, representatives from Australia, Canada, Denmark, England, France, Ireland, Japan, Mexico, New Zealand, Scotland, Switzerland and the United States assented (subject to the confirmation of their respective organizations) to the constitution of a World League for the suppression of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks. The United Kingdom Alliance of England, in its organ, The Alliance News, says: 'America has begun to think internationally, and the initiation of the proposal for a World League was the outcome of the recognition that only a co-ordination of all the forces working for the suppression of alcoholism could make the world safe for prohibition.'"

First Report on the $100,000

THE Bible schools are striving to raise $100,000 this year as their offering to the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society. The campaign opened most auspiciously on Thanksgiving Sunday. Previous requests had so demanded copies of "Building the Church," the exercise for the day, that a second edition of this popular program had to be run.

Record-breaking offerings are reported for the first week of the campaign, November 23 to 30. The schools are multiplying in enthusiastic fashion all previous offerings for this cause. Cynthiana, Kentucky, last year giving $250, this year reaches the new mark of $633, the largest single Bible school offering ever made to the American Society. Kentucky also holds another record with North Middletown, a rural school, giving $350.

Most encouraging reports are coming from every section. Fort Smith, Arkansas, doubles last year's gift with $125; Jackson Avenue, Kansas City, Missouri, reports $120; Evanston, Cincinnati, goes from $226 to $311; Hopkinsville, Kentucky, raises $550; Houston, First, Texas, breaks the record for the Lone Star State with $316; Mansfield, Ohio, from $100 to $171; Pine Bluff, Arkansas, makes a century offering. Spokane, Central, with $400, Seattle, First, with $250, and Twin Falls, Idaho, with $500, assure victory in the Northwest. Atlanta, Georgia, First Church, wired $367, one dollar for every day in the new year. St. Charles Avenue, New Orleans, Louisiana, enters the century list. Paris, Kentucky, makes it an even half thousand dollars, and First Church, Jacksonville, Florida, $250. Reno county, Kansas, led by the great First Church Bible school of Hutchinson, makes a Living Link offering of six hundred dollars and will probably watch and help the good church at Palo Alto, California, come to self-support. The Indianapolis schools send nineteen offerings in one bunch, making it unanimous and every one showing increase.

The total for this first week in actual money received is nearly five thousand dollars, just about double the receipts for this week a year ago. In all, one-tenth of the $100,000 has been received by November 30.

It is hoped that December will be used to round out and forward all possible offerings. Let none of them go astray for every dollar is needed. By December 31 fully two-thirds of the $100,000 should be cash in hand.

The Bible schools are going over the top this year. Your school will delight to join in this Victory Campaign for building the church in the life of America.

Bible School Secretary.

The Dependent Child the Victim of Politics

IF THERE is any phase of social service that should be kept above and beyond the influence of politics it is the case of the orphan and dependent child. With our theory and practice of government, the state institution, as a rule, is not the place for a child deprived of the benefit and protection of his parental home. The fortunes of state institutions are influenced by party considerations and are too often used by politicians for private or party ends. Consequently these institutions and their helpless wards are often the victims of the gravest abuses. A special committee appointed to investigate the condition of a certain state orphanage reported that they found it in a generally demoralized condition. Abnormal children and children with infectious diseases were found mixing freely with those in normal health. There were some children in a condition to menace the health of every orphan in the institution.

The bathroom, the report says, "beggars description." Only two bathtubs and four washbowls were maintained for all the children in the main building. "The practice of allowing mentally deficient children to mingle with normal children should not be tolerated," the report says. And it further declares that "the mentally weak are not receiving proper medical attention."

There was no milk, because the cows of the institution had been condemned by a state inspector as being tubercular.

The state health board declares it is the fault of the state policy. They do not speak sparingly of the state board of control. This state institution is not worse than other institutions. Indeed, we suspect that it is equal to, if not better than the average. The condition that existed in this particular home is inevitable, sooner or later, to all institutions that must depend upon party politics for their support and direction. Until we have learned to render state service to our social wards, free from personal or party interest, the dependent child is far better provided for under the care of the Church of Christ.

The child's greatest need is love, constant love. The Church's largest asset is love. Her motives are of the highest. Her service the most unselfish. She is giving her life to save the lives of others. J. H. M.

What Answer Shall We Give?

A MINISTER of one of our smaller churches came to us recently seeking advice as to what to do with a man over eighty years of age, an active member of the church from boyhood. He has no kinfolks but his brothers and sisters in Christ. He has grown so feeble that it is unsafe for him to live alone. He has enough income to sustain him, but not enough to enable him to employ someone to care for him.

A woman seventy-five years old, a pioneer in one of our small town churches, has just written in, saying: "I am getting too old to live alone. I could pay the full cost of my living in one of the homes of the church, but not enough to enable me to board in a private family. I would like to spend my few remaining days in the company of my brethren."

A young deacon in one of our western churches has provided a home for years for his aged father-in-law. The increased cost of living and the failing health of his wife have made the burden more than the young people can bear.

She was a bright, promising little girl. A severe illness left her with a frail body and perhaps a mind that had lost its fine edge. After the death of her parents she made her home with a married sister. The sister and her husband, both of the richest cream of our brotherhood, are now both old and in rapidly declining health. They have asked the Association to take over their ministry of love and with it property to meet her modest needs.

What answer should the Association make to these and scores of appeals like them? It has not been its policy to admit anybody with anything like sufficient means for self-support. We have penalized property and put a premium upon poverty by declining to admit any but the most desperately poor.

From experience we have learned that there are many persons in our churches, both men and women, with a little income, whose greatest need is a home, care and companionship and who, if admitted to one of our homes, would come more properly as boarders than as wards.

What shall we do? Shall we enlarge our facilities for the care of the aged and modify our rules so as to receive such as these into our fellowship and under our loving care? We need your counsel. We await your reply.

BULLETIN CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, VANCOUVER, B.C., Nov.30, '19.

Miss Marie Beall's Sunday School class of boys gave $5.00 to Grandview's Contingent Fund last Sunday, so Bro. Gray reports.

Our city papers gave us 34 inches of space announcing the reception to Dr. and Mrs. Macklin and Mrs. Meigs. That's fine.

All enjoyed the duet with guitar accompaniment by Bro. & Sister Muro Sunday night.

Fairview's Sunday-school promised rejuvenation last Sunday as result of personal work by two teachers. Good. Someone has suggested that if the minister is at Fairview Sunday mornings there ought to be an adult class. What say you?

The Kirkwoods have bought a home at 2734 - W. 5th Ave. Call on them.

More than 30 boys from 3 or 4 Bible-schools were at the Conclave in our Grandview Church last Thursday night and enjoyed Mr. Miller's talk on Mountain Flowers. Mrs. McLean, Miss Chittenden and Mrs. Ely surprised them by serving cocoa and doughnuts. The boys have written expressing their thanks.

We enjoyed Bro. Roadruck's report of the Cincinnati Convention and were glad to have his visit.

An expert house-mover has informed us that to move the Fairview Church building as has been proposed is not practical. Therefore, until we can sell our property or some other way opens, we must make the best of present conditions. With everyone seeking to win souls for Christ and trying to edify saints in the faith we can do a great work even now. That's our business under the great Commission of our Lord. That does not wait on buildings but on persons. "To the work, to the work, we are servants of God".

To obey the Great Commission, that is the supreme thing for every Christian. Go, Preach, Baptize, (those who believe, repent and confess), Teach, And God's promise then is "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Miss Maud Williams presents you with the bulletin this week.

Our chorus practice at Grandview the other night was fine. Let's try it again tonight.

The Mission Band in Grandview started off in fine style, 18 children were present the first day. Marie Beall is leader.

Miss Doris Brealey is putting in some good work on the Christmas program, beginning in time is half the task.

Grandview's Board Meeting is Tuesday night. The King's business again.

Miss Minnie Vautrin writes "Please give my greetings to the members of your church, especially to the Women's Missionary Society". She tells of a restful, pleasant voyage. Over 50 of the 94 first class passengers aboard were missionaries. Read in the November Ladies' Home Journal "- And 45 Missionaries". We hear that Miss Vautrin is to be Acting President of Ginling College for girls in Nanking.

Bro. Bert Wilson writes from Hong Kong, "Neither Mothersills nor newspapers, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature is of any avail when the Equinox gets her back up. But I lived through it. Thanks for all your kindness".

A letter from Bro. Geo. W. Knepper of Spokane has this line in it: I do glory in the Vancouver churches and their fidelity and as for city, you Canadians will admit it is a wonder!"

On Thursday Dr. W. E. Macklin and wife and Mrs. F.E. Meigs sailed on the Empress of Russia for China. Aboard the vessel were Prof. John A. Williams and wife. Prof. Williams is Vice-President of Nanking University. All our people enjoyed the visit of the Macklins and their interesting addresses. The reception on Wednesday evening brought together not only our own people from Grandview and Fairview, but also a goodly number from Hastings St. Church of Christ and others. We were glad to welcome the Hastings St. people and hope they will come again.

The Fairview Aid Society which met with Mrs. Chittenden on Wednesday appointed a committee to complete arrangements for a rummage sale soon. It was felt that such a sale would not only prove a source of revenue but would also give opportunity for a worthy community service. Mrs. Kirkwood was enrolled as a member of the Aid.

Enterprise in Home Missions

The Literary Digest was not the original typewritten publication! Note also the contents of this Bulletin, then consider the following:

VANCOUVER, British Columbia, is a city of 100,000 people. Greater Vancouver, which includes a number of municipalities, has a population approximating 200,000. It covers an area 13 by 17 miles in extent.

We have two churches here. They are three miles apart. The writer is the missionary pastor of both. Both churches are about three miles from the post office, which is the center of the downtown section. Our members are widely scattered over the entire area of the greater city.

Our missionary societies are investing this year $900 in the support of our Vancouver work. They have been supporting the work nearly eight years, and the Church Extension Board has invested $10,000 in the two properties. If this investment is worth while year after year, then surely the expenditure of a few hundred dollars (about $1,000 in Canada) in an automobile would make the other investments more effective, bringing in larger returns. MARCELLUS R. ELY.

N. B. This is a worthy appeal. We know several people who will help, but not enough to provide the car. Shall Vancouver have it?

F. W. BURNHAM,
Pres. American Christian Missionary Society.

Roy N. Cloyd

THE Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society is happy to introduce to our Bible schools a fine new worker among young people. He will be associated with Garry L. Cook in the Central Regional District of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. Mr. Cloyd comes to his task well prepared for a great life service as this brief statement furnished by Mr. Cook will indicate.

Roy N. Cloyd was born near Clinton, Indiana. His early life was spent near and in Clinton. He graduated from the Clinton High school, received his A. B. degree from Wabash College, then spent four years in the College of the Bible, Lexington, Kentucky, receiving a B. D. degree and doing a year's post-graduate work.

Mr. Cloyd did four years' student preaching while in college and was prominent in athletics, especially football and basketball. He holds a record in athletics.

For nearly two years Mr. Cloyd served as chaplain in the United States army, eleven months overseas, in England, France and Germany. He began his duties as Secondary Division Superintendent for the Central Regional District of the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society on November first. Mr. Cloyd is well fitted for work among young people, and has already made a fine impression. He will be located in Indianapolis with the Central Regional District offices at 821 Occidental Building.

Man Needed to Manage Sawmill in Africa

THE church at Ionia, Michigan, has recently given, through the presentation of Dr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye, $10,000 for a sawmill and equipment for the African mission. This is one of the finest things which has happened for the African work in many a year. All of the lumber for the new hospitals, schools, churches and missionary homes must be gotten out of the forest. The old process of sawing by hand took endless time and the attention of the missionaries when they should be free for the distinctly missionary service. We need now an experienced man who can manage the sawmill, direct the native workers and the whole lumber and material supply for the African Mission in the Ten-year Advance program. Such a person would not necessarily have to have the full collegiate work usually necessary for missionary service. A married man is preferable. A man of this type of preparation who is looking for a great place of service could not find a rarer opportunity to help advance the Kingdom of Christ than to undertake this work in Central Africa.

The Woman's Missionary Society

THE early months of the new year should be busy months for the women of the local missionary society. As we look back over the year just closing we realize there will never be an opportunity to do the things that were left undone in 1919. The new year opens with the greatest opportunity in history for women to render a mighty service for Christ and the world. There are no less than five hundred thousand women in our churches today who should be led to enlist in the joyful service of saving a world.

The Enlistment Campaign should be pushed to the limit. Every woman and young woman in the local church should be visited repeatedly and made to feel her responsibility to the great world task. Mothers need to be faithful to some definite work for the sake of their own children. One little girl down in Arkansas, whose mother was president of the local missionary society and a member of the State Board, prayed one night, "Dear Lord, bless mother in her missionary work. Dear Lord, bless her in her Board of Missions. Dear Lord, help her in her B. W. C. M." The prayer of that little girl is being answered. The missionary spirit will ever be in her life. Women who are sharing in the organized missionary work, are contributing as mighty an influence in the home and local church as to the farther-reaching service.

H. C. Combs

THE subject of this sketch was born in New Franklin, Ohio, October 8, 1866. He was educated at Mt. Union College, Alliance, Ohio, and the Bible College of Lexington, Kentucky, receiving a classical diploma from each institution. His first pastorate began in 1892 at Macon, Georgia, where he began with no building and only thirty-five members. After seven years' ministry he left a membership of one hundred fifty, with property of their own.

In February, 1899, he accepted a position as state secretary of Georgia, in which he served until December, 1901, when he accepted a like position in Virginia, coming to Virginia in January, 1902. He served as state secretary until January, 1916. Among the outstanding features of this work in Virginia are the following:

1. He succeeded in removing to a very large extent the anti-missionary spirit among our churches.

2. He advocated and succeeded in a measure in the grouping of county churches and placing pastors in fields so grouped.

3. He advised the building of parsonages for country groups of churches, so that the pastors of said groups could be centrally located.

4. He increased the Trust Fund of Virginia Christian Missionary Society from $6,000 to $17,000.

5. He encouraged the people throughout the state to invest money with the society under the Annuity Plan. In this he was also successful.

In the fall of 1915 he resigned as state secretary of Virginia and accepted the pastorate of the Portsmouth, Virginia, church. This church had just passed through a very strenuous time, and by his wise leadership and Christian bearing, he succeeded in reuniting a divided congregation, and has done a splendid work. Early in 1919 he began to show signs of breaking health, but, unwilling to give up, he forced himself by his indefatigable energy to push forward even with greater vigor, until finally he was forced to resign.

So great has been his service to the people of Virginia that they deemed it their privilege to raise a fund sufficient to grant him a twelve months' leave of absence on full pay, with the hope that this might be the means of restoring his health and sparing him for many years of useful service to our brotherhood.

At the recent State Convention a resolution was passed calling upon the churches of Virginia to respond to this appeal, and they have done so magnificently, thus showing to the world at large that we as a people are dealing honestly with those who serve in the ministry.

Subscriptions already amount to two thousand dollars. Payments are made to the Virginia Christian Missionary Society, which passes the money on to the Board of Ministerial Relief, that we may not only honor the man, but also honor the agency which represents the brotherhood in such cases.

Mission Study Classes

Mission study classes open up a vast and, to most people, heretofore undiscovered world. Someone recently said, "Our grandfathers were citizens of a state, our fathers citizens of a nation, but we are citizens of the world." If this be true, which it is, the women need to know something about the people and conditions of the world. The Christian literature of today affords great opportunities for busy women to inform themselves through mission study classes. Leaders in missionary societies should present the urgent necessity for the whole church to acquaint itelf with the work of Christian missions. The necessity and the value of mission study, both to the individual and to the cause, should be strongly and enthusiastically presented.

Women of the local women's missionary society are urged to cooperate with the church in holding a Church School of Missions. Where the church does not hold such a school, mission study classes should be formed under the direction of a capable leader. The book being used at this time, "A Crusade of Compassion for the Healing of the Nations," is one of the greatest study books ever published, and should be studied by every Christian.

Day of Prayer for Missions February 20, 1920

"TOGETHER" surely is the key word of this era. We have witnessed nations doing mighty things together, things impossible attempted separately. And we have seen the conquering power of a united front attacking sin citadels. Councils and federations have been born and waxed strong. An international mind and interdenominational vision have become existent. The line of demarcation between Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria and the uttermost part of the earth is fast ceasing to be a line of cleavage.

For many years missionary societies have been observing interdenominationally a day of prayer for foreign missions and a day of prayer for home missions. Now, at last, together the thanksgiving petition and intercession for home and foreign missions will arise. The first Friday in Lent has been chosen by the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions and the Council of Women for Home Missions for the annual observance of this united day of prayer.

Together these two organizations have prepared a program for February 20, 1920, based on the happily-inspired theme, "The World to Christ We Bring." Copies may be secured, one cent each, from the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, College of Missions Building, Indianapolis, Indiana.

This program will be ready and on sale January 1. "A Call to Prayer," a two-page card, contains topics for preliminary, preparatory prayer. These cards, which fit an ordinary correspondence envelope, should be widely distributed. They are now ready and may be secured free.

Notes and News

Word from the Northwestern home at Walla Walla announces forty on the waiting list. They demand the immediate enlargement of the building.

Mrs. Casselberry, the newly elected treasurer of the California home, recently celebrated the birthday of her good mother, who a number of years ago went to her final reward, by entertaining thirty-five of her friends at Massie Hall.

The American Christian Missionary Society has added to her corps of workers Chaplain Karl Borders, late of the U. S. S. North Carolina. Mr. Borders has been called to become superintendent of the Community House in Chicago.

And the Floridians not to be outdone by the Carolinians went on record in their convention at Tampa for an immediate campaign that should include a substantial sum for the work of the National Benevolent Association in the South.

The South Carolina brethren are not one whit behind their brethren of North Carolina in their devotion to the Association's ministry of mercy. They pledged themselves to a campaign for $25,000, $10,000 for the building of the Southern Christian Orphanage.

The State Convention at Robersonville, North Carolina, recently passed resolutions calling for an immediate campaign for a quarter of a million dollars, $25,000 of this amount to be used in providing a new, modern building for our children's home in Atlanta.

The campaign in the South for funds with which to erect a new building for the Southern Christian Orphanage at Atlanta is progressing with a gratifying degree of success. The campaign in Georgia yielded nearly $90,000. The campaign in Mississippi promises to reach $40,000 if not $50,000.

C. W. Houston writes of the work in Gloversville, New York: "The church at Gloversville is pressing forward and will, without a doubt, be absolutely self-supporting after this year. The additions have not been many, but are of the sturdy sort and mean very much to us who are the only living organization of Disciples in the county."

A few days ago the National Benevolent Association received a check from the Tomlinson Company of Wilson, North Carolina, for $100. It was sent through J. E. Stuart, minister of the church. The donors said that they wished to express their gratitude for a year of blessing and prosperity and selected the orphan children of our home at Atlanta as the object of their grateful expression.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Davis of India have been visiting among the churches since the Cincinnati Convention. Mr. Davis reports that the Missionary Conference in Yonkers, New York, under the Interchurch World Movement was an inspiring meeting. He writes, "The 'Lack of Missionaries' was a note too often struck to leave us overly happy, but we know the boards are doing their best to change that." Mr. and Mrs. Davis expect to attend the Student Volunteer Convention in Des Moines, December 31 to January 4. After that the College of Missions is anticipating a visit from them. They hope there will be new missionaries to go with them to India next fall.

Guy V. Ferguson writes thus encouragingly of the work in Rockford, Illinois: "Attendance and interest increasing. Additions almost every week. Primary obedience keeps the baptistry filled all the time. Our Endeavor is doing good work. One volunteer for the mission field. Miss Beulah Thomas leaves in February for the College of Missions. The work is moving on in an encouraging manner."

Word has come of the safe arrival in Porto Rico of Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Perry. Just before the gangplank went up our missionaries on the dock thought they recognized their new co-laborers. Miss Mills held up a copy of WORLD CALL, the new arrivals nodded assent, and no further introduction was necessary. They were soon happy on their way to Bayamon together.

A recent mail brought two very urgent applications from two aged ministers, both receiving pensions from the Board of Ministerial Relief, but still both sorely in need of a home. Either we must make it possible for the Board of Ministerial Relief to pay larger pensions or we must cordially welcome these aged ministers of the Word into our homes for the aged.

The Florida State Convention at Tampa expressed its great delight over the prospect of having a home for the aged located in their midst. They appointed the following named persons to serve as a committee to assist in the direction of the home to be located at Jacksonville: John T. Boone, chairman; C. W. Zaring, treasurer; C. G. Sneed, Mrs. Fred Bowen, Mrs. Jennie Clarkson, R. A. Russell, Mrs. Peters, Jacksonville; C. O. Woodward, W. G. Brorien, Tampa; I. E. Adams, Miami; G. W. Mershon, Lakeland, and Mrs. A. O. Smith, Lake Butler.

A fine report from Alameda, California, W. C. Jones, pastor, follows: "As a result of a short evangelistic campaign we have evoked considerable interest in the community and eighteen were added to the church. A Christian Endeavor Society of thirty members has been organized. Last Sunday one hundred and sixty scholars attended our Bible school and ere long an evangelistic effort will be launched on behalf of our children. All departments of the work are showing valuable improvement."

S. T. Willis of Duluth, Minnesota, says: "The work is starting nicely this fall. Our annual meeting October 7 showed all departments in fine condition and growing. A total of something over $5,500 was put into circulation to the account of the church. Of that amount $1,500 was paid on the principal of the debt, nearly $200 for interest, and $425 for missions. The spirit of the meeting was happy and hopeful and the outlook is prom-

Dr. Esenwein

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Versification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers; sample copy 20 cents, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

using, but everything in the way of success depends on the completion of our church plant. That must be accomplished in 1920, but the Church Extension Board will have to give us $20,000 and also make a loan to enable us to do it."

The work in Rochester, New York, under the pastorate of Harold E. Dickins, has taken on new life. From the October report we read: "During the past month we have voted to purchase the five-room cottage adjoining the church on Columbia Avenue. We will get possession just as soon as we make the necessary financial arrangements. This cottage we will use this winter in order to relieve our Bible school congestion. We are at the present time too crowded for good work. Last Lord's day morning we had 40 children—two different departments and two sets of lessons crowded into a room about 20x28. Our attendance for the morning was 114. No special effort was put forth and no special program, just interest. Next Lord's day will mark the beginning of the second year of the present ministry. We are looking for an attendance of at least 150 to be crowded into an auditorium seating 100."

The Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Limited, R. M. S. Empress of Russia.

We have finished our furlough and spent most of the time among the churches. We wish to express our appreciation of the kindly reception we experienced everywhere. We now realize that we are representatives of the Church of Christ sent to China to do the work of the Church. In the early days it seemed that we were doing our mission work and that the churches were merely encouraging and helping us. Now we serve the Church in her work. We thank the brethren and sisters everywhere for their cordial reception and treatment.

Our feeble efforts are made effectual by the encouragement and prayers of the saints.

We are setting sail on Thanksgiving day and we have gratitude in our hearts that we are again permitted to work in such a great field. W. E. MACKLIN.

H. L. Patterson, Kingsport, Tennessee, reporting his October work, says: "I held a ten-day meeting at Butler, Tennessee, commencing September 29. The audience the first night numbered 40. It increased to 200 and closed out the last night in a rain with 150 present. Butler is a small town of 800. Our membership there is 15 with no house of worship. We held services in the Methodist Church. There was one confession. As a result of my visit they will arrange with some professor to preach there once a month. The Corning Glass Works of New York have purchased the shell plant and will remodel and build with a view to employing 300 workmen. They are now grading for the new buildings. The dye plant, which has been closed down about four months, has announced that they will resume operations the middle of the month with a force of 300. Mr. Johnson, manager of the Improvement Corporation, has agreed to point out our building site this week. High pressure must be put on to get a building as soon as possible as we are too crowded in our present place for our Bible school work."

WHAT A MAN SAYS WHO HAS PROVED THE PUDDING

"If the 'proof of the pudding is in the eating,' the proof of your Class Books and Records is in the using; and since I have eaten the pudding and used the books, I know about both.

"I have tried, and seen tried, all sorts of plans, schemes, contests, etc., for building up a Sunday school, but among them all I put your system at the very head, for increasing and sustaining a continuous interest and constant, steady, sturdy growth.

"The method of marking attendance and giving credit for faithful work has given our school a long list of "Honor Roll" members, of which we are all justly proud. I am glad to commend the books, and do it most heartily."

This man is only one of the hundreds of satisfied users sending us similar appreciations.

F. E. Livengood, Jubbulpore, India: My chief business this month, as in all the months I have been in India, has been the study of the language. I expect to take my first Hindi examination, and my first Urdu examination, next month. The first of the month Mrs. Livengood and I returned to Jubbulpore from Landour, where we had spent the hot weather. On the way down we stopped to see the sights in Delhi and Agra and to see the work in Bina and Damoh. We shall both be glad when we have enough of the language to do some real work.

Dr. A. L. Shelton, Batang, West China: It appears to us from reports from everywhere that the church is developing and that things will go forward now. I was just discussing the world situation with our evangelist, whose name is Lee Gwa Gwang, the other day and at the close he, in his quaint Chinese way of saying things, said, "Well! I guess the devil must have palpitation of the heart these days." We watch with deep interest the things that are being done and my one regret is that I am not twenty-five years old instead of forty-five. The opportunities are so great, and are growing greater day by day, and a man's ability to ride a mule over mountains 17,000 feet high declines rapidly after he is fifty years old. But I thank God the man and the opportunity came together when you sent MacLeod. He can't be beat.

W. H. Erskine, Osaka, Japan: We have been greatly cheered and blessed by a flying visit from Bert Wilson. He had a hard day in Osaka, but did us much good. We used every minute of his time. He gave three addresses, and we had conferences with him between times. We hope that some one will come to Japan and study the field and workers as he plans to do in India. The Institute continues to prosper and we are kept busy. Prices have risen again in Japan and strikes are taking place everywhere. In Osaka the street car men are off today.

Herbert Swanson, Vigan, P. I.: Everything is going as well as usual with the work in the evangelistic field, and in the dormitory and the Bible college as well. It is keeping us pretty busy, even when we slight everything that can be slighted, but we hope for a relief pretty soon for we are looking for Mr. Saunders about the first of the month.

Mrs. George E. Miller, Mungeli, India: We are finding plenty of work since returning. We went out to Fosterpur and spent a couple of days there with the Christians. Mr. Shah and his family are doing a splendid work. His house is just about finished and they are pleased with it. The government has famine relief work there and we went to see that. They have a big rock quarry and over two hundred workers, half of whom are children. They had about fifty non-workers at that time, that is, those who are not able to work any more. There were deaths every day. The workers receive from four to six cents a day for breaking rock. This is the first time I have seen famine conditions. These poor people were nothing but skin and bones, and the wonderful thing to me is that many of them seemed rather happy.

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India: We have had excellent meetings with the patients and have had a chance to speak to a large number of people. The month's statistics are as follows: New patients, 1,228; treatments, 2,574; in-patients, 7; operations, 22; visits to homes, 141. This makes an average daily attendance at the dispensary of 99. We feel that we have the good will of the people and the attention they give to the preaching of the gospel is encouraging. In our medical work we have a great variety of diseases to treat and yet many cases have similar symptoms. Among the cases we are treating now there is a woman about thirty-five years of age who has leprosy. I am giving her a new treatment—Sodium Gynocardate by intravenous injection. She is of good family and lives in a village not far from Harda. She comes three times a week for treatment. I am hoping for good results in this case. This is the season for malarial fever and we are having many cases of it.

A. F. Henscy, Bolenge, Africa: In spite of many absences, I have been able to help in the evangelistic work at Bolenge, and we are having a good year. There have been 509 baptisms, and the offerings for the first six months are about $900, or some $200 more than for the same period of last year.

C. E. Robinson, Osaka, Japan: The remodeling and rebuilding of the Tennoji Mission Home and the Tennoji kindergarten, necessitated by a new electric car line, have been completed. The Erskine family are happy in their new location and the kindergarten is flourishing. A splendid young woman was baptized in the Tennoji church since the last report.

Mrs. Lillian Johnston, Nearing Boma, Africa: We get to Boma today. We ought to get up-country in ten more days. We have made excellent time and have had an unusually cool voyage. Even now in the Congo River it is cool. The rains have not begun yet, so the river is so low that it was necessary to unload cargo to lighten the ship so that she could get over the sand bar. The baby has done well. If he continues to do well, we shall have solved a great problem for ourselves and others regarding children in the Congo.

Miss Edith Eberle, Laoag, P. I.: When cholera is everywhere; when people are dying all around you; when you have 45 girls to keep, girls who by their carelessness and indifference might well say, "I will have cholera, no one shall help me"; when it is your turn at running the dormitory mess, you don't get much further in your missionary work than boiling water, scalding dishes just before using, dipping the everpresent banana in boiling water, keeping fresh antiseptic for washing hands, and seeing that it is used, asking continually, ceaselessly, "Did you wash your hands?" "Was it boiling?" "Did you scald it?" watching what they eat and where they eat it, keeping jars of boiled water covered, teaching new girls and different squads to boil, scald and wash, when they think it's "foolishness," incidentally teaching your six or seven periods daily, trying to do a few other things, too—well, did it accomplish much for Him?

Miss Rose T. Armbruster, Akita, Japan: "Busy" hardly describes the past month of September, it was more a grand rush from morning till night. Thirty meetings of various kinds with a total attendance of over 750, with 10 persons taught in my home, and 7 women taught at their homes is my personal record, while the Bible women made many more calls. The kindergarten opened September 10 and by the 15th had full attendance with yet a waiting list. Miss Garst returned to Akita on the 23rd and took charge of the kindergarten a few days later, so this relieves me of that responsibility, and I hope to have time to do some other long-planned-for things. September 19 the Akita City Sunday School Union met with me to reorganize for work after having had no meeting for over a year. They re-elected me president. More literature is being bought and read than ever before, especially by women. September 15 being the annual city religious festival we had street preaching that afternoon and until late at night, and also sold many New Testaments, hymnals and other Christian literature.

R. A. MacLeod, Batang, West China: Average attendance in Sunday school, 222; inquirers' class, ten. Our building is too small to accommodate the school and we are planning to move into larger quarters.

Ray E. Ricc, Damoh, India: July was a month of new beginnings in the Boarding School. The old boys came back to school, and we have a lot of new boys. We never had such an enrollment. We now have 234 boys. Mr. Plopper has always urged us to get more boys, for support could be had for more, and we are getting the boys. The fact is that the rooms and hostels are filled and we have few places for more. If the number goes over 250, measures will have to be taken to house the boys. The outside Sunday school work has gone on very well. Someone in Washington had a lot of picture cards sent out from the Christian Board of Publication, and they are doing wonders in the village schools. A grant of rupees 1,135, or about $375, has been granted by the government for the rebuilding of McLean Hall. This is much appreciated. All are well in the station. Dysentery is our pest at this time among the boys.

J. E. Moody, Bilaspur, India: We reorganized our Sunday school this morning. There were over three hundred present in the Central school and nearly seven hundred in the outside schools. Many of our teachers have taken training courses. Five sat last month, three getting honor certificates from the India Sunday School Union, and two getting first-class certificates. I have had ten in another class called "Bible Knowledge." They are now ready for their examination. Recently six girls from the boarding school and four boys were baptized. Several are under training and are nearly ready for baptism in Moripar, Savatal and Amora.

Dr. Mary T. McGavran, Damoh, India: The attendance at the mission dispensary ran high last month, there being 105 a day. We find more people suffering from digestive disturbances due to famine conditions than for many years. These patients are usually children, and the death rate among them is high. Deaths in the boarding school have been many from this cause. We are having to refuse children on account of the lack of money.

A paper published in Jamaica gives an account of what was called a miraculous escape from sudden death of one of the workers of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions: "Mr. C. S. Shirley was returning from the outstations in Portland, and was riding home across the mountains. In going over one of the narrow footpaths along the steep hillsides he overtook a party of women with donkeys traveling in the same direction, and would have passed by. He had just got abreast the first donkey when the whole platform of earth overhanging an awful precipice gave way beneath the weight of his horse. The next instant both horse and rider were falling to certain death into the awful abyss below. Providence intervened, and not far below the brink of the precipice they were caught by a growth of withes that thickly clothe the side of the descent, the horse's feet upwards and the rider with his foot fastened in one of the stirrups, dangling in space.

"The plucky women immediately came to the rescue. Though a perilous undertaking, they managed to extricate the parson and pulled him up to safety. Getting the ropes round the neck of the animal they succeeded in getting it up, looking more dead than alive. Fortunately, it revived and not long after plunged to its feet, not much the worse for its terrible experience. Had the support failed in the least the story would have been entirely different."

Miss Edith Parker, missionary to Tokyo, Japan, was recently made very happy by her Living Link Church at Carrollton, Missouri, when they presented her with a new Corona typewriter, which she is taking back with her to her field. The usefulness of every missionary is greatly increased by having a typewriter.

EDUCATION and MISSIONS

These two great enterprises of the Church go side by side, hand in hand and heart to heart. Witness the host of young people, now in the colleges, whose likenesses appear herein.

Equal in Importance

The preacher is more essential than the pulpit. The missionary is more essential than the mission station. These young men and women are preparing for Christian service. They are the leaders of tomorrow.

Equal in Support

The Christian College has its colossal task—the training of these and hundreds of others for the work at home and abroad. Unless the Church furnishes the men and the money the colleges cannot furnish the ministers and missionaries.

And walking by the sea of Galilee, he saw two brethren, Simon who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea; for they were fishers. And he saith unto them, come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they straightway left the nets, and followed him.

Matthew 4:18-20

And he saith unto them, Be not amazed: ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, who hath been crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold, the place where they laid him! But, go, tell his disciples and Peter he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you.

Dr. Shelton Held for Ransom

[Associated Press Dispatch]

PEKING, Jan. 7 (Associate Press).—Dr. R. A. L. Shelton, a Christian missionary, was captured by bandits at Laoyakuan, near Yunnan-fu, on Saturday, January 3, and is being held for ransom, according to reports received here.

The wife and two daughters of the missionary have arrived at Yunnan-fu, the former declaring that the kidnappers acted under orders of Yang Tien-fu, a notorious outlaw, who has been operating, with 5,000 followers, in the Kochin Mountains. It is said that the object of his lawless act has been to discredit the local governor for the latter's refusal to accept the terms of surrender laid down by the band. The brigands said that they would treat their prisoner as a guest unless the military was employed to effect his release.

Yang Tien-fu is reported to have been educated as a military officer in Japan.

Officials of the American Legation here and Chinese authorities are actively investigating the case.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12.—The American Legation at Peking has been directed by the State Department to request the co-operation of the French Consul at Yunnan-fu in efforts to obtain the release of Dr. Shelton. It was explained at the department today that this action was taken because there was no American consul nearer than Canton.

The legation has also been instructed to take up the matter directly with the Governor of the Province of Yunnan, in which Dr. Shelton is held.

On seeing the above dispatch in the daily papers President A. McLean and Stephen J. Corey of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, who were attending the annual Interdenominational Foreign Missions Conference at New Haven, Connecticut, went immediately to Washington city to make sure that no effort should be spared in promptly securing our beloved and famous missionary's release.

A telegram dated Cincinnati, January 17, reads as follows:

"No new developments regarding Dr. Shelton's capture in China, but the state department is pushing the matter through the American Legation at Peking. Dr. Tenney, head of the legation, understands the situation in China well and will use every means for quick relief and safety. All indications point to Dr. Shelton's ample protection.

"STEPHEN J. COREY."

A Correction

THE name of Mrs. C. R. Pierce was included by mistake in the January list of "These All Died in the Faith." We are very glad to correct this error and to notify our readers that Mrs. Pierce is alive and well.

A Splendid Report

ROBERT M. HOPKINS, our Bible school secretary, sends this encouraging word with his financial statement, which appears elsewhere in this issue: "Here is the best financial statement for any month that the Bible School Department of the American Society has ever had. Indeed, the receipts for December, 1919, surpass the total receipts for the twelve months five years ago."

FEBRUARY 1920

Man, What a Chance!

THIS exclamation of Ralph Connor (Charles W. Gordon) in his great sermon on the call of Jesus to the rich young ruler may well be repeated to every young man of our day who in any way becomes aware of God's challenge to his soul. The need is so vast and so imminent that the war situation is repeated. Something like universal divine conscription of both young men and young women must be recognized. One who will not answer the call must prove his exemption or forever stand among those who failed their hour.

The call of God used to be the exception. "There were many widows in Israel, but to only one was Elijah sent." There were many cobblers in England, but only one William Carey; many weavers in Scotland, but only one David Livingstone; many West Point graduates, but only one Charles E. Garst; many penniless foreign boys landing in America, but only one Sam Higginbottom; many Japanese schoolboys thirty years ago, but only one Paul Kanamori.

Universal Divine Conscription

The young man or young woman of good mind and physique who is not taking up definite Christian service as a life work, must answer to his own soul, as well as to the Lord of the harvest, with something more than an excuse.

God's call cannot be put aside lightly; cannot be put aside at all except to add another to the list of eternal tragedies in which the rich young ruler stands hard by Judas Iscariot. What if Moses had chosen to enjoy the pleasures of sin rather than to share ill treatment with the people of God? What if Saul of Tarsus had been disobedient to the heavenly vision? What if Florence Nightingale had offered any one of fifty excuses that were at hand? What if Frances E. Willard had chosen enjoyment rather than service? What if William E. Macklin had rejected God's call to Nanking? Such conjectures are simply impossible. To reverse the course of Martin Luther is as inconceivable as to obliterate the sun.

Every Life a Plan of God

But my life is just as important to me as Alexander Campbell's was to him. I can no more afford to miss going where God wants me than Mr. Campbell could afford to stay away from America or from Bethany. His success, his joy, his eternal destiny were there.

We cannot imagine what disaster, starvation and defeat might have followed if Herbert Hoover had not been where God had appointed him to be. But the Christian transformation of India, or of China, or of Africa, will save more lives, because it will go on forever. It involves also, not merely the relief of physical hunger and suffering, and that in the wholesome and permanent way of teaching the people to help themselves, but of vastly more importance, the moral and religious redemption of the people.

Behold the joy of Dr. Shelton in witnessing thirty baptisms on the border of Tibet, and hear God calling you to the three million Tibetans that wait beyond.

See the Scudder mission in India receiving more members last year than the entire Reformed Church of America that sent out the missionaries; hear Sherwood Eddy tell of preaching to thirty thousand eager hearers in one audience; witness the tragic loneliness of our own scattered missionaries, Dr. Mary Longdon's narrow escape from death, G. L. Wharton dying at his post, and conclude that God is assuredly calling you to come over and help in the harvest of millions, the deliverance of a race.

When the crisis in Africa constrains Dr. Jaggard to return to the Congo though he has buried his wife in the homeland; when our missionaries as captains of twenties and hundreds of native evangelists are successfully withstanding the Mohammedan advance, but seeing the lines break beyond their reach; when the Eldreds counted not their own lives dear into themselves; how can you ignore the zero hour of God's largest continent, but one of the neediest and readiest of all?

Hear Inman testify that all of Latin America spends less on education than New York City alone; see Taylor's photographs of thousands of Mexican children eagerly accepting the teaching of American Christians whenever they have the chance and realize that not by war nor by diplomacy nor by commerce, but by Christian education Mexico and all Latin America may be transfigured into a very garden of God; and answer, why not through you?

Mark the glorious success of our Christian institutes for the physical, mental, moral and religious training of the American Negro, read the fascinating story of Jennie Porter proving in Cincinnati's blackest belt that "black is just as good a color as white, and brown is a perfectly beautiful shade," and then calculate, if you can, how many thousand chances there are for you among these eleven million of your fellow citizens to win the same sort of victories for God and humanity!

Ray Manley and C. Jaroshevich, Frank Butchart and Basil Keusseff have demonstrated that our foreigners—and there are fifteen million of them—will accept Christ as readily as they will go after Lenine, if given a fair chance. Here is your chance at once to save them and to safeguard your own country.

Greatest of All

If none of these calls "find" you, review the American babies on daily parade along Riverside Drive in New York, Green Street in Augusta, or a thousand other places, count the millions of their older brothers and sisters in our non-religious public schools and claim the glorious privilege of somehow bringing Christ into their lives. If God permits you to serve here, as pastor or as teacher, you haven't time to be president of a bank, a railroad or a nation!

A Sunday at Sea in the United States Navy

By LIEUT. FRANK H. LASH

FOUR strokes on the ship's bell. The mellow tones of the most musical bugle call of the navy. The measured beat of the bell tolling in rhythm with the notes sounded by the bugler. A furled pennant raised on a halyard to the peak of the flagstaff, above the national colors. A blue Latin cross emblazoned on a field of white broken to the breeze, as the Stars and Stripes are lowered slowly by the quartermaster, and Old Glory takes its place beneath another flag—the church pennant—the only flag that ever floated above the national ensign on an American man-o'-war. The Banner of the Cross, and the Banner of the Free. The emblem of our country crowned with the emblem of our Faith.

This seen by the casual observer on the shore of the harbor in which the battleships of the United States are anchored, means that it is ten o'clock and divine worship is being conducted on board.

Within the ship this is the signal for other steps in promoting this feature of the week's routine. As the bugle call announces the hour of public worship the boatswain's mate on watch strides through the ship blowing his shrill pipe and passing the word in each compartment, "The smoking lamp is out. Divine worship on board. All hands pipe down."

This vernacular of the sea translated into the words of the landsman means that it is time for church and no smoking, boisterous conduct, games, or irreverence will be allowed until the chaplain has notified the officer on watch that church is over, and the church pennant is lowered after the colors have been hoisted to the place they shall occupy each day until another week has passed, when they shall again do deference to the faith which gave them birth.

Meanwhile blue-clad sailors wend their way through the decks of the dreadnaught to the large gun casemate where church has been "rigged." This means that a working party in charge of a petty officer has been busy transforming part of the ship into a chapel. It is peculiar how readily the enclosed spaces of a ship lend themselves to a multiplicity of uses. Housing great modern guns, each one is a scene of busy activity during the week as men hurry to their battle stations for drill in obedience to the general alarm sounded on the clanging gongs. Three times each day the folding mess tables and benches are lowered from the racks where they are slung overhead between meals, and the space becomes a dining room. Each night on the blare of the bugle hammocks are taken from their nettings and slung on little hooks secured to the steel beams running athwartships on the overhead, and the compartment is transformed into a dormitory. But on Sunday morning the working party rapidly changes the enclosed deck used for the purpose into a very presentable church.

The space is enclosed with signal flags of varied hues, draped over the bulkheads, and across the openings. The folding pulpit is brought out from its storage space, and set up in front with a starry Navy Jack draped over it. Chairs are brought from the wardroom for the officers, and mess benches are put in place for the enlisted men. Hymn books are distributed by the librarian, who is usually one of the chaplain's enlisted assistants. To the sightseeing passerby the scene is reminiscent of a brilliantly decorated auditorium housing a religious convention.

The ship's orchestra takes its place grouped about the piano. A well ordered ship has several such musical instruments. The sailors file in and take their seats. Perhaps a group clad in "liberty blues," with knotted neckerchiefs, and hat bands bearing the name of another ship enters. It is a "church party" from a neighboring ship. Several such may attend.

The chaplain, wearing the uniform of his rank, or if he desires, the vestments of his church, nods to the bandmaster seated at the piano. The orchestra plays the prelude, which is usually a sacred selection from the score of a classic oratorio. The chaplain rises and says the words of the call to worship, and announces the first hymn. It is usually "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "Stand Up, Stand Up, for Jesus," or some other well-known hymn of the church militant. The invocation and reading of the morning lesson follows with the resonant bass voices of the men blending in the responses. Another hymn and all heads are bowed for the morning prayer. As the chaplain concludes the petition for Divine forgiveness and guidance all voices unite softly in the immortal words of the Lord's prayer. The softly sounded strains of "Nearer, My God, to Thee" or "Rock of Ages" played by the orchestra as a response follows as a period of silent communion with God. Then perhaps a bluejacket quartet rises and sings, "Throw Out the Life line," or "Lead, Kindly Light," or a clear-voiced young tenor in navy blue sings, "Eternal Father, Strong to Save." If the spirit of general participation seems to be lacking the chaplain may have the men hum and whistle the air of some hymn.

After this period of worship the chaplain rises and announces that all are invited to avail themselves of a copy of the New Testament at the close of the service, and if any would like to talk over personal relationship with God the chaplain will be in his room to consult with them after church. This done he gives his message for the day. He does not preach a long, dogmatic sermon, neither does he merely tell jokes to entertain. Instead he tries to speak a clear, forceful message on some matter connected with the problems of a sailor, phrasing it fearlessly, and yet wisely considerate of the needs and opportunities of his youthful congregation. It is not a mixed audience, and he is speaking to virile, manly men whose perception will not permit insincerity, platitudes, or empty aphorisms. They have been schooled in the halls of common experience and are living in a little closely packed community where pretense is stripped clear in a day. They detest nothing so much as cowardly selfishness and bigotry. And no one admires fair play, unselfishness and upright Christian manliness more than they.

The sermon over, another hymn is sung and the benediction pronounced. As the orchestra plays the postlude they probably pause long enough to shake hands with the chaplain or greet a "buddy" from another vessel, and then go back to their part of the ship ready for a "fight or a frolic" or for anything their duty may bring.

In response to a request from one of the editors of WORLD CALL I have endeavored to describe a religious service on board ship. It is not far different from church at home. Certainly not, for the men participating are the products of your homes and communities and are changed only by their varied experiences and uniform attire.

The foregoing description is that of a service on board a large, well organized superdreadnaught such as I am attached to, and is typical of church services on all larger ships to which chaplains are attached. Less ideal circumstances have attended services I have conducted on smaller craft, such as destroyers, supply ships, mine sweepers, and airplane mother ships. There I have often gone taking a small folding organ, my communion outfit, and a few hymn books. These services have been without elaborate preparations, but usually with gratifying results. I have found many Christian men in the navy and the attendance, conduct, and reverence has been equal or superior to the best that could be expected ashore. Almost three years have been spent at sea and I count them among the best years of my life.

Once each month, or more often if opportunity affords, the Lord's Supper is observed at the close of the hour of public worship. All are invited to participate. The response has been above my most sanguine expectations. I have had as many as one hundred and fifty men, representative of all denominations, share in the holy ordinance. In addition, communion has been administered to many sick men at the bedside. During the influenza epidemic last winter I spent several hours each day on board the fleet hospital ship, ministering to those ill with the disease. I talked to them, joked a bit, took letters home from their dictation, read to them, prayed with them, broke the bread of communion, and ministered to their welfare as I could. I found them greatly appreciative and very responsive.

I have had the pleasure of baptizing several men during my months at sea, and have had some very fine Bible classes at different times.

Opportunity is given all men in the naval service to attend church. If a ship has a Catholic chaplain, church parties are sent to another ship or station having a Protestant chaplain, and vice versa. The relationship between chaplains of the different faiths of Christendom is very cordial, and the cooperation has been close. Prior to the war for many years there were only about twenty-four chaplains in the navy. During recent years the size and scope of the chaplain corps has received considerable attention, and now there are over a hundred being retained in the corps. Practically all large ships, flotillas and stations are furnished with chaplains, chosen after a very careful examination from the representative religious bodies of the land.

In addition to his religious duties the chaplain has much to do in promoting welfare, education, amusement, athletics, and general morale agencies and organization. These duties alone would require much space to describe and I shall not mention them at this time.

Not the least among my pleasant personal experiences has been meeting and enjoying companionship with several of our pastors and workers. I recall many such fraternal occasions. The kind advice and assistance of E. B. Bagby, George A. Miller, and Earle Wilfley at Washington has been of great value. At New York with Finis Idleman, Norfolk with C. M. Watson and his fine people, also B. S. Ferrall of Buffalo, who did camp pastor work there. And since my ship has been transferred from the Atlantic through the Panama Canal to the Pacific fleet I have had the happy experience of meeting several of our pastors on the west coast. I arrived just in time to attend the Southern California Convention at Long Beach and met many old friends besides having the opportunity to worship with George P. Taubman and his great church. My ship has had two young officers who are sons of well-known ministers, namely, W. G. Conley of Ontario, California, and A. R. Adams, formerly of Buffalo, New York. I have met many men in uniform from our churches, and have enjoyed the friendship of many noble Christian workers in different ports and countries.

I feel that I must speak appreciation of the assistance rendered by the American Christian Missionary Society through its War Work Committee. It has supplied me with a portable typewriter that has been very useful. It also furnished a large individual communion service as well as a hospital outfit. These kind remembrances have done much to aid in my work and I rejoice to know that our great brotherhood is standing behind its chaplains in the service. No religious body is better fitted to minister to men in uniform, and nothing is craved so much as the sympathetic interest of those who are serving by doing their bit to "keep the home fires burning."

Petrus Rijnhart: Pilgrim and Pioneer of Tibet

By CHARLES T. PAUL

Exalted dome of Asia, where eternal snows are gleaming,
Where the crystal crowns of Kwen-lun and of Karakorum rise;
Strong citadel of Buddha, where the golden gods are dreaming
*Of the blissful Sukhavati shining through the sapphire skies—
Thou hast kindled from thy hidden heart the fire of far emprise!

THIS article deals briefly with the pioneer mission work in Central Asia, which preceded and largely occasioned the establishment of the Disciples' mission at Ta-chien-lu in 1913, which was transferred to Batang, their present base, on the confines of western Sze-chwan and of K'amdo, the principal province of Eastern Tibet. Particularly, the story presents some of the immediate and conditioning antecedents of the enterprise recorded in the late Dr. Susie Rijnhart's book, "With the Tibetans in Tent and Temple."†

A summary of the chief events leading up to the point where Dr. Rijnhart's narrative begins is necessarily biographical, for it partakes of that picturesque sort of history "with the purple touches," which James Anthony Froude described as "always personal." This is the tale of a Dutchman's daring deeds to extend the far-flung borders of Christendom. It is a short chapter from the life of the intrepid Hollander, Petrus Rijnhart, Dr. Susie's husband.

Born in Rotterdam, the son of a major in the Dutch army, Petrus was educated in a Netherlands war college, where for a time he fell into the customary turbulent ways of the continental soldier-student. In the midst of his careless career he was checked and transformed by a marvelous conversion, which issued in an unwithholding surrender to Christ. Warm and generous in temperament, he was seized forthwith by a passion for pilgrimage and proclamation—a modern efflorescence of that burning missionary spirit which Holland anciently knew in the Frisian and Frankish students of the cathedral school at Utrecht, under the spell of the English Willibrord, first proclaimer of the gospel to the lowland pagans. From the very beginning of his new-found life Petrus felt he would go far afield for his Lord.

After a period of fruitful witness-bearing in Rotterdam he set out for America, reaching Toronto, Ontario, in 1888. Fair as a Goth, of tall, lithe and powerful frame, with frank, wistful countenance, with eyes blue as the Zuyder Zee and lit by an almost leaping radiance, he arrived dressed in a military cloak and cap, presenting a bizarre combination of the chivalric dash of a Henry of Navarre, the cheerful asceticism of a David Brainerd, and the propagandist zeal of a Raymond Lull.

In his preliminary announcements, made in Dutch and in French, the newcomer ventured some vague hints about faring forth on a distant Christian mission. Adding that he wished to learn English and Chinese, he was received at the School of Languages, where the present writer taught him the English tongue. So amply did he sustain the reputation of his countrymen in linguistic acquirement that, six months after reaching Canada, he was eloquently addressing public audiences in grammatically faultless Anglo-Saxon. He became known as a persuasive evangelist in the missions of Toronto, often preaching to crowds on the street corners and in the open spaces of the city squares.

Was this tall stranger, importuning people about their souls, a poser or a prophet, a "crank" or a genius, a charlatan or a saint? Even the pious wondered. Then came the fuller revelation of his life-purpose, and of that reserve of spiritual dynamic which had mysteriously fascinated even those who were puzzled by the modes of its expression, and which now disclosed itself in an outburst of heroic self-dedication. Here was a great soul who had been greatly exercised for a task that transcended even the dreams of the valiant. There was little in Toronto to generate or nourish the incomparable enterprise which had been born in his secret broodings. It was like a mighty river suddenly springing from the silence of the hills. Those who knew him best felt that on the head of Petrus Rijnhart rested invisible hands of consecration to a venture, which none but a specially chosen knight of the Lord could so ardently conceive and so willingly embrace. There was an inner circle of acquaintances who eventually caught with him the vision, at least the dim outlines, of other invisible hands—invisible to the unsympathetic—hands of human, unmet need, stretched toward the sunrise from the faint shadows of a land so distant that it lay beyond the common consciousness of the Christian world.

It was in the spring of 1889, in a classroom at the School of Languages, that the said revelation of purpose and power was vouchsafed to a little group of his friends, when Mr. Rijnhart first unbosomed in choice English his decision to invade the impossible, to penetrate the inaccessible, to beat a path "behind the beyond"—in short, to go as a missionary to Tibet. To his friends the announcement sounded at first like a message from the dead. It was a shock from the unknown. Had he declared his baggage checked for Mars the little company would scarcely have been more astounded. All the canons of common sense, all the conventional conceptions of extraordinary exploits seemed for a moment to collapse in the minds of the young Dutchman's professors, who thought themselves reasonably au courant of Tibetan matters in those days; for, did they not know that nobody was supposed to know anything about Tibet, since it was the great Buddhist hermitage of impenetrable isolation, closed against foreign ingress, labeled alike by geographies, histories and books of travel "The Forbidden Land." The project seemed so much the more presumptuous since its proposer cherished no illusions as to its difficulty. What soon dispelled the doubt of his friends and won some to cooperation was the contagion of his own conviction of a divine call, and his faith that the call could and would be obeyed.

Mr. Rijnhart knew that the last European up to that time to sojourn in Lhasa, the Tibetan capital, was Thomas Manning, who through disguise ingratiated himself with some lama officials there in 1811. He knew that, since the days of the Roman Franciscan missionaries, Desideri, Freyre, and Orazio della Penna, who for brief periods in the eighteenth century had lived and labored in Ulterior Tibet, no white foreigner had secured the right of permanent residence in that mountain-guarded zone. Aware also of the unsuccessful attempts to reach the capital, made during the latter half of the nineteenth century by such capable and dauntless explorers as Prjevalsky, Kishen Singh, Bonvalot, Bower and Prince Henri d'Orleans, he vividly appreciated how nature, diplomacy, racial antagonism, priestly conservatism, primitive custom and popular superstition had conspired to close the country to the "barbarians of the West." He knew that, for political reasons, chiefly fear of British encroachment from India, the Himalayan passes on the south were rigidly sealed and sentineled by Tibetan guards against all pale-faced travelers—an exclusion policy due to the instigation of the late Manchu government of China, which, as a reward for crushing a Tibetan insurrection by Chinese troops in 1708, had, since that date, exercised a tribute-bearing protectorate over the rulers of Lhasa. The western border between Kashmir and the Lhasa territory was likewise officially defended and, moreover, was physically impassable by all but the stoutest and best equipped expeditions, on account of the gigantic ice-laden altitudes of the Karakorum and other mountain ranges which flank the Indus river. Wilderness, marshland, robber districts, and again formidable mountain walls blockaded the north, from the sand-duned desert of Gobi and the mountains of Altyn Tagh to the far-reaching heights of the Kwen-lun. On the eastern, i. e., the Chinese frontier, where the altitudes descend, where the border lines are somewhat vague and shifting, where the Chinese and Tibetan populations tend to merge and coalesce, there might be a chance to get a foothold and an entrance. This was the chance that Petrus Rijnhart had chosen. Just when he was about to start came report of the journey of the American traveler, William Woodville Rockhill (later United States minister at Peking) through Kansu and Eastern Tibet, emerging on the Sze-chwanese highlands. Yet he realized that a missionary would probably meet greater obstacles than an explorer, for he was aware of the official hostility to Christianity. The hierarchs of half a million Buddhist lamas were bent on keeping the gospel from 4,000,000 people. So far as was known there was not a single Christian within the confines of Tibet proper. A few lone missions hung about the fringes of the land—the Roman Catholics and two lone outposts of the China Inland Mission on the east, two or three small stations in Sikkim and Almora on the Indian side of the Himalayas, and, best established of all, the Moravians in Ladakh on the west, where since 1885, the indomitable Redslob, Francke and Marx were carrying forward at Leh and Nubra the work of the veteran Jaeschke, though still thwarted in their desire to penetrate the interior. The Moravians had translated the Bible into the Lhasa vernacular and had prepared the first Tibetan grammar and dictionary for the use of foreigners.

What human torch had been used to light the imagination and kindle the conscience of the young Dutchman to the lure of this remote, secluded, inhospitable and neglected region, so that, with a yearning which scorned all barriers known and unknown, he regarded it as his divinely appointed goal? It was a book. A piece of literature has lit the way to a life work for many a missionary and led him to his field. What Cook's Voyages did for William Carey was done for Petrus Rijnhart by a copy of the Abbe Huc's Souvenirs d'un Voyage dans la Tartarie et le Thibet, a rare old volume even in its English translation by Hazlitt, the English essayist, until the publication of the American edition in 1900.‡ This book is an account of the remarkable journey of the Lazarist fathers, Huc and Gabet, across southern Mongolia to northwest China, whence from Kansu province, under extraordinary circumstances they succeeded in entering Tibet, even reaching Lhasa in 1846. They were arrested soon after their arrival in the lama capital, were falsely accused of political espionage, and sent back as prisoners to Peking. The last Europeans whose eyes had looked on the holy city, the narrative of their experiences, containing vivid descriptions of the regions through which they passed and of the tribes which they encountered, not only stirred Mr. Rijnhart's ambition to take the gospel to the Tibetans, but to enter, if possible, by the same gate which these Catholic missionary travelers had found ajar more than half a century before; and to witness for Christ in Lhasa.

The manner in which the fulfillment of this missionary ambition was wrought out in action was quite as unusual as the personality of Mr. Rijnhart. He was "a born original," an individualist in temperament, a dynamo of aggressive energy, an establisher of new precedents, a blazer of new trails—in short, a leader. And he was a difficult man to follow—not indeed because of a disagreeable disposition—on the contrary he was wonderfully tender and winsome—but because of his daring faith and his uncompromising fidelity in the performance of what he believed was his duty in his Master's service. "God uses irregular men in irregular ways for extraordinary work." We can best follow the young pathfinder from this point onward—in memory—by thinking of him as Christian pilgrim and pioneer.

Three things made Petrus Rijnhart a pilgrim on the way to his goal. They were conviction, necessity and faith. Three compelling facts confronted him. (1) No Canadian or American missionary society was working exclusively among Tibetans. (2) One society under which he sought an appointment for Tibet could give him no encouragement for that field. (3) God, he felt sure, had called him for Tibet; to Tibet, therefore, he would have to go.

From the circumstance that no missionary society could send and support him, he drew the simple conclusion that he must start out himself, that God would provide his maintenance and open a path for him beyond human foresight or customary devising. Then he launched forth on the great adventure. In August, 1889, he set out from Toronto on foot, determined to walk to the Pacific coast, convinced that there a way would be found for his transport across the ocean. The first stage, a hot day's tramp over a dusty road, brought him at dusk to a little town west of Toronto, where he surprised the writer during a vacation visit. The announcement of the pedestrian program was another revelation of the unconventional initiative of a resourceful spirit. Both appearance and apparatus were unique. The pilgrim looked as if he might have walked out of the pages of John Bunyan. He wore a broad-brimmed hat, and carried on his back a long black patent-leather knapsack, on which he had painted in large white letters Mark's form of the missionary command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." An umbrella and a modest valise containing his personal belongings, reduced to the minimum, completed his outfit. In the knapsack was the remainder of a supply of New Testaments and Christian tracts which he had distributed to persons he had met as he walked. This use of knapsack and literature he had deliberately adopted to create opportunities for "personal evangelism." He had preached Christ to many persons that day. In the evening, under the clear Canadian moon, he conducted a meeting with some newly made friends on the shore of Lake Ontario. The following morning prayers and farewells were said near a willow-shaded stream up the western highway. The pilgrim left the writer standing on a bridge to watch him disappear in the distance around the last visible bend in the road. Except the ferry across the Detroit river he covered on foot the whole distance between Toronto and Chicago, about 512 miles. The nights he spent in city, town, village or farmhouse, though he had not a single acquaintance west of the place where he halted on the first day. Of cash he had only a few dollars when he left Toronto. There was, as already indicated, no missionary society behind him. He had no guarantee or promise of support from any human source. He believed that his essential needs would be supplied in answer to his prayer. In this expectation he was not disappointed. Toronto friends, with whom he had left an itinerary of his proposed journey, were deeply stirred by his departure and sent to several addresses in advance of him letters containing small remittances of money to help him onward. As he proceeded he made other friends, many of whom voluntarily contributed to his little fund. Invited to make addresses in churches and Y. M. C. A.'s he solicited no money, nor did he even mention his financial situation. Enough and more than enough was contributed to meet his daily necessities. From Chicago he completed an additional walk of about 500 miles to Kansas City, where he arrived in time to attend a missionary convention, at which he made an address telling of his plans for Tibet. The convention was so warmly impressed that an offering was taken up and presented to Mr. Rijnhart, with insistence that he should walk no farther but should use the money to travel by train to San Francisco. Interpreting this as a divine expedition of his course, he accepted the gift and purchased the ticket, which took him to the coast. He reached San Francisco with insufficient funds to pay his ocean passage, but firm in the faith that God would "get him across." After a brief time of prayerful waiting, during which he delivered a series of Bible readings at the Y. M. C. A., enough money came to enable him to sail for Shanghai.

The pilgrimage was at an end, so far as the footsore journeying was concerned, and the weary itinerant was now steaming across the Pacific. What experiences awaited him in China? He knew not a single soul, either Chinese or foreign, among the 400,000,000 inhabitants of that vast empire. No missionary society or missionary associate would be waiting to welcome him. No arrangements had been made for him. No one, so far as he knew, had been apprised of his coming. But he set foot in the Orient with a faith in God confirmed by all the gracious guidance which had attended him and "made straight his path" since the clear August morning when he first struck out on the trail in far-away Ontario.

With his arrival in China the pilgrim entered upon the preparatory stage of his work as a pioneer. That would really begin only when he got to the Tibetans. He was yet 2,000 miles from his objective. But, realizing that experience in China and "things Chinese" was indispensable for a wise approach to Tibet, he accepted an opportunity for service under the China Inland Mission, in whose school for language study he was soon enrolled. Before leaving Toronto he had mastered the 214 radicals of the Chinese language. After six months of intensive study in China he had made phenomenal progress in the most difficult of tongues; and then turned his face northwestward toward Central Asia. From Hankow (600 miles from the mouth of the Yangtze) his route lay up the Han river 400 miles by houseboat to Fan-cheng in northern Hupeh, where the Han divides into the Pai and the Tan; thence by mule and cart another stage of 200 miles overland into Shen-si province to its capital, Hsi-ngan-fu. The third stage of 350 miles—the most laborious of all, over rough roads and many rivers, brought him to Lan-chou-fu, the capital of Kansu, on the upmost reaches of the Hwang-ho. At Lan-chou-fu, the most remote provincial capital in north China, and 150 miles from Tibetan country, he remained nine months, continuing his Chinese studies, preaching in Chinese, gathering information about Tibet, getting a start in Tibetan colloquial, and otherwise preparing for his future task. In 1891, with a Chinese traveling-servant who spoke Tibetan, he traversed the 120 miles of wild country west of Lan-chou-fu, between the Hwang and the Hsi-ning rivers, and finally, despite wolves and robbers (successfully warded off) he arrived at the first destination of his 12,000 miles journeyings from Toronto, viz., the great Buddhist sanctuary of Kumbum, of which he had first read in the Souvenirs of Huc.

At last he was among Tibetans. The pioneer enterprise had begun. The base of his labors was the former Tibetan province of Amdo, in Chinese, or Outer, Tibet, but now politically included within the extreme western border of the province of Kansu. The population comprises Tibetans, Mongols, Chinese and Turkestanese; but the Tibetans predominate. They are distinguished from other Tibetans as Amdo-wa and are divided into a number of tribes under hereditary chiefs now responsible to the Chinese amban (official) at Hsi-ning. From the purely religious viewpoint no more strategic outpost could have been chosen. Next to the Lhasa district, Amdo is the greatest stronghold of lamaistic Buddhism in Central Asia. It is far-famed for its holiness throughout Tibet and Mongolia, and in western China vies in sanctity with the region about Wu-tai-shan in the province of Shen-si. Out of a total population of less than 100,000 Amdo has from 25,000 to 30,000 lamas resident in its 24 lamaseries. With the foremost of these lamaseries, or monastic colleges, Mr. Rijnhart by extraordinary tact and by his medical knowledge succeeded in establishing relations, even gaining the friendship of the k'anpo, or abbot. Kumbum with its gold-tiled roofs and golden images of Buddhist saints, its 4,000 resident lamas, its throngs of pilgrims from many Buddhist countries, its halls of learning, its spinning prayer-wheels, and its ascending columns of juniper incense, actually became the headquarters of a Christian mission! This lamasery, which arose in the fourteenth century, marks the birthplace of the Tibetan Luther, Tsong-K'apa, the great reformer, and founder of the Geluk-pa, or "Yellow School," now the strongest Buddhist sect numerically, and the most orthodox, in all Tibet. At and near this sanctuary, 500 miles north of Batang and 750 miles from Lhasa, Mr. Rijnhart remained ten months, winning the confidence of the lamas, teaching Christianity, distributing portions of the New Testament, making short trips beyond the Kansu frontier, westward among the robber Panak'a of the Koko-nor, and southwestward toward the Ts'aidam. He acquired a working knowledge of Tibetan and Mongolian, made acquaintance of travelers and officials from Lhasa, and received delegations of nomadic chiefs with their retinues from the interior, who had heard of the white teacher with "the new doctrine and the healing medicine." He was dreaming of further ingress when in the autumn of 1892 important personal matters called him home to Holland. His financial needs up to the present had not failed to be met. Even the amount for the long journey to Europe was supplied. Reaching home he stirred Holland by his lectures, and in the winter of 1893 arrived again in Toronto, where he visited the writer and spoke of his larger hopes and plans for Tibetan work. As a result of an interview with him published in the Toronto Globe, describing his extraordinary experiences among the Kumbum lamas, invitations for public addresses began to arrive. The last $20 in his possession he paid for rental of a Toronto hall in which he told his thrilling tale. This resulted in an increase of invitations. Interest multiplied, so that for several months he traveled in Ontario and in the United States presenting the call of Tibet. He announced that he would return to Tibet with other workers, but made no appeal for funds. For the supply of finance, of the missionary associates and of the necessary equipment, he chose to rely wholly upon his secret prayer to God. To be brief, in the autumn of 1894 he stood again on the Californian coast with all the co-workers for whom he had prayed—a man associate, Mr. W. N. Ferguson; a medical missionary and a wife all in one, in the person of her who became known to the Christian world as Dr. Susie Rijnhart. The party was well equipped with things needful and had behind it a Tibetan council, organized to administer the new mission. The party crossed the Pacific, followed Mr. Rijnhart's former route across China, and in April, 1895, arrived at his already established base, the lamasery town of Kumbum.

It is at this point, with some slight recapitulation, that the story is resumed in the volume, "With the Tibetans in Tent and Temple." That book tells finally of the tragic journey toward Lhasa in 1898, of Mr. Rijnhart's disappearance, of Dr. Susie's escape to China, and of her return to America. The book is silent on one interesting fact, namely, that before leaving San Francisco Mr. and Mrs. Rijnhart united with the Disciples of Christ. With his Bible open upon his mule's back, as he itinerated over the hills of Amdo Mr. Rijnhart had worked his way alone to the scriptural position distinctive of that body of Christians. Dr. Susie followed him in her convictions. When through their travels in the United States they discovered the Disciples, they realized and rejoiced that they had found the household of their faith. To the Churches of Christ, therefore, Dr. Susie turned with all the yearning of her heart, after the collapse of the memorable expedition beyond the Dang La mountains of Inner Tibet. Their response was the establishment by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, of the Disciples Mission with its present headquarters at Batang. The vanguard of the new venture consisted of Dr. and Mrs. Shelton, and Dr. Susie, who under the Foreign Society's appointment left America in 1902.

That the career of Petrus Rijnhart, pilgrim and pioneer, was crowned with martyrdom, is a fact to be faced in the light of his own oft-repeated declaration, "It matters not whether by my life or my death, provided only Tibet is opened to the gospel." Only by faith even at last did he behold from the heights of Nagchuka—150 miles away—the golden domes of Lhasa, when he was beaten back to Tashi Gomba, there to pay "the last full measure of devotion." His sepulcher was the restless Tsa-Chu, the upper-water of the mighty Meekong which, bursting from the Tibetan gorges, across Yunnan and Burma, sweeps onward through Siam to the sea. The dauntless Dutchman's dream did not die with his demise. Rather is it fulfilled in the Dalai Lama's recent permission to Dr. Shelton to open a hospital in Lhasa.

The Loudest Call of All—The Call for Leadership

By J. CAMPBELL WHITE

(Director, Life Work Commission of the Interchurch World Movement)

IN the rapidly expanding programs of the evangelical churches of America, the greatest unsolved problem is how to secure an adequate supply of qualified leaders. It seems probable that we are now entering into the greatest era of Christian activity which the Church has known since apostolic days. All churches are being moved with a common conviction that the hour has come for a world-wide expansion of Christianity. To do this will require hundreds of thousands of employed leaders and multiplied millions of volunteer workers.

It is estimated that at least 100,000 new employed leaders will be required in the next five years for the ministry and the foreign mission fields, to carry forward the types of work that are already developed. In addition to these needs there are many indications that new types of work are sure to be found useful and necessary. If the Church develops a large number of community centers, both at home and abroad, where physical, medical, recreational, social and educational work will be carried on as well as distinctly spiritual work, a large staff of trained workers will need to be employed. If week-day Bible instruction for school children is to be greatly extended by the co-operation of the churches, tens of thousands of trained Bible teachers will be needed. For the bulk of this new work, ordained ministers will probably not be required, but consecrated laymen and women who are willing in a spirit of sacrifice to devote their lives to building the Kingdom of Christ.

Where and how shall all this host of new leaders be found?

1. Many of them must be led out of positions they now occupy in business or other work. When the war came it led to all sorts of readjustments in order that the nation's needs might be met. Thousands of recent college graduates and other well-educated younger men and women should now be confronted with the Church's need of leaders, and should be led to offer their services to help organize and direct a comprehensive campaign for Christianizing America and the world.

The Interchurch World Movement is asking that a meeting of such young men and women be arranged in every county seat in America, in connection with the county conventions to be held throughout the nation in February, March and April. It is hoped in this way to discover thousands of well educated men and women, who will be available in the near future to meet emergency needs at home and abroad.

2. Many thousands of these needed leaders of the future are now students in the colleges, universities and professional schools. To get the case clearly and strongly before this large and promising group, a series of meetings is being planned for about 500 of the leading institutions of America during February, March and April. It will require 315 speakers to give an average of one month each to carry through this series of meetings among students. It is especially hoped that all pastors and parents who have young men and women from their churches or homes in attendance at these institutions will cooperate by prayer, conference and correspondence in getting them to face this new call of the Church.

3. As most of our present church leaders received their first strong impulse to give their lives to such work in their teens, it seems imperative that the young people of high school age and younger throughout the nation should also be cultivated in some broad and challenging way. Pastors, parents, Sunday school and young people's leaders have here one of their greatest opportunities and responsibilities.

Following state conventions of all Protestant ministers to be held in all states during January and February, it is being arranged to hold a county convention in each county in America—some three thousand of them—during February, March and April. In connection with each of these county conventions, it has been decided to hold some special meetings for young people—high school students especially—to lay before them the wonderful opportunities for the investment of life in the varied work of the Church. If each of these county conventions reaches an average of 500 young people the total number confronted with the call in this way should be at least one million and a half. But, in addition to this, it is most earnestly hoped that the same call will be made in every Sunday school, young people's society and church in America February 29, when many millions of young people may be faced with the specific needs of the Church for employed leaders and workers. February 29 is to be observed as a nation-wide Life Enlistment Day by the various churches. February 29 falls on the Lord's day only once in forty years. We should now plan so thoroughly that before another forty years go by the message of Christ shall have been carried to all people on the planet.

There never has been a time when the whole world was so open as it is now to Christian truth. Part of this preparation has come as the result of one hundred years of successful modern missionary work. The strain and suffering of the war has still further prepared the hearts of multitudes to respond to the call of God. "When Thy judgments are in the earth," said Isaiah, the prophet, "the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." Isaiah 26:9. In these last years God has been running His plowshare of judgment across the minds and hearts of whole nations, races and continents. This should be regarded by the Church as providential preparation for the greatest seed-sowing of truth that the world has ever known.

It is impossible to switch a motionless engine, but one which is moving already may be easily directed. This is one reason why the world today is so readily influenced by new and often wild theories of government, economics and religion. Three-quarters of humanity is already in motion. From Vladivostok to Petrograd, from Shanghai to Constantinople, from Cairo to the Cape, people are groping for new life, new leadership. India's veins are tingling with the wine of nationalism. China has destroyed the foundations of her government and is trying to build a new structure. The breakdown of Islam's political power has brought hunger and chaos to the leaderless Near East. Lhasa, the forbidden city, has asked a mission doctor to come in and establish a hospital. Kabul, where one stream is used for both water supply and sewer, is becoming interested in sanitation. Arabia is asking for railroads to the sacred cities of Mecca and Medina. The old world is gone and someone from the western nations will lead in the development of a new world. The only question is, shall this leadership be Christian?

Everywhere child races are assuming manhood. But only as this manhood is directed into channels of brotherhood will a permanent basis for peace be possible.

The type of moral and political leadership developed in these nations during the next decade will largely determine the trend of world history. And the problems of developing leadership which will advance rather than retard civilization are primarily spiritual problems. They are largely a matter of races and classes learning to live peaceably and helpfully together—a distinctly missionary problem. Missionaries are pioneers in establishing proper relationships between men of different races, classes and creeds. The secret of this is in the fact that they first get men into right relations with God.

Christ summarized all duty into two fundamental commandments. 1. Love God. 2. Love your fellowmen. When the perpendicular relationships are made right, the horizontal relationships will also be adjusted into harmony with Divine standards.

Every gift is wanted in Kingdom service. Sam Higginbottom learned how to farm scientifically and with his farming he is making an important contribution toward the feeding of hundreds of millions of people in India as well as their education and evangelization. He is the agricultural adviser to native princes and kings who can help mightily to make a new India.

Joseph Bailie, who began by planting trees, is now training government-appointed forestry students from eight of the provinces of China.

Fred Hope in Africa is demonstrating western methods of building, tailoring and farming to the natives of the Congo, and through his school is influencing a hundred and twenty thousand Bulus in the building up of civilization.

Two young men graduated in the same class at medical college. One located in a large American city and waited months for his first patient. The other went to Africa and within fifteen minutes after his boat landed was performing his first major operation.

In these days of turmoil the call for Christian leadership is even more insistent than it was when Higginbottom and Bailie began to make their mark on the new life of the Orient. The opportunity for leadership awaits every qualified man or woman who is willing to pay the price—the price of hard work, self-effacement, loneliness, and utter devotion to Christ and His Kingdom.

Do you say you are not fitted for leadership?

Moses, Livingstone, and Dwight L. Moody felt the same way.

But no one ever knows what God can do through him until he has given Him a chance. If we are ready to give "our utmost for the highest," the undreamed of and "impossible" will be accomplished through us.

Why I Am Glad to Be a Preacher

Six Prominent Ministers of the Day Set Forth Their Reasons

A Spokesman for God

HAPPY as I was in the business life which occupied the years of my early young manhood, it is a joy to go on record, after twenty-seven years of active pastoral experience, in relation to the infinitely greater joys of the life of the ministry.

The laws of men may well occupy great minds, but the laws of God are a loftier challenge. It is hard to name a more sacred service than ministry to the human body in all its lines of needed help and healing, but ministry to the human soul is a greater thing. Business life, especially in this day when the promotion of great enterprises and the problems of salesmanship have been reduced to a science, makes a vital appeal, but still the business of God with all its ramifications, moves thoughtful human life even more deeply. It is great to work for a local community's uplift in splendid lines of civic service. It is incomparably greater to work every hour in the light of the whole world's need. It is a big thing to be concerned deeply as to any group of people. It is a perfectly amazing thing to be constantly under the constraint of service for all peoples. It is a notable thing to build for long years of time. But what shall be said of a work that has eternal reaches! Such is the ministry and such were the thoughts that turned me from one line of work to another. Others have the same obligations and in their exalted souls they give large place to them. But they are not permitted, as is the minister, to cry out, "this one thing I do." They themselves, the more they grow in Christian graces, almost envy the man whose whole time may be given to the unfolding of the things of faith. Nothing that is said here involves the least disparagement of those who make their contribution through channels of expression other than the ministry. God needs them where they are. Such men constitute the great reserve. In unselfishness they uphold the hands of the heralds of the cross. But they themselves will agree with me that happy beyond all men is he who is permitted freedom of time and strength for daily and hourly toil in the absolutely basic realm of the human soul.

Spiritual motives should be first and foremost in impelling a man to choose the ministry. But these motives do not obscure the perfectly legitimate motive of human leadership. The preacher is asked to be a leader—a leader in service, a leader in friendship, a leader in practical counsel, a leader in inspirational effort of every type and a leader in the shepherding of souls. There is not a great cause that does not turn to him for advocacy. If he lives the life he should, he has the opportunities of a prophet on the one hand, and the call for the patience and tact and wisdom of a diplomat on the other. He is the manager of a great spiritual plant. He works with the boundless resources of God. All fields of research and life pay tribute to him. The great of the earth are his hearers. And if he stays within his own realm and is indeed a spokesman for God, high and low alike will be moved by his utterances. His exaltation is not in titles nor position nor wealth, but in his lowliness of service. Doors open to him that are closed to every other man, love is given that none other knows and joys are his that no other service in the earth yields. This is why I am glad to the depths of my soul that I am a minister of the gospel of Christ.

Des Moines, Iowa. CHARLES S. MEDBURY.

The Greatest of All Callings

The ministry, so some wise man has said, is the greatest of all callings, and the worst of all trades. If a man belongs there, called of God, and fitted in spirit for the task, there is no life, I think, so self-rewarding, so full of opportunity for vital service, so rich and fruitful in its human relationships, so full of challenge to a man's whole nature. For myself, if I had a thousand lives I should like in this generation to go into the ministry with every one of them. I glory in the life and work of a Christian teacher and preacher, and I have no ambition ever to be anything beside.

Because men must have religious faith, unable ever to think deeply without thinking religiously; because all the elemental factors of human life, work, love, joy, service, death, are truncated and incomplete until their spiritual interpretation comes, until divine horizons are around them and divine motives are within; because the wreckage of sin in individual and social life can never be repaired without the creative power of a vital spiritual life; because the high ideals of a better world for God to rear His children in can never be convincingly believed in nor effectively worked for without a reasonable and vigorous faith; because the one unshaken thing in all the shaken world today is the ideals and purpose and personality of Jesus Christ; because the churches which represent all this are only half adequate; crying for leadership, ready to welcome light and guidance, bravely trying to achieve an ideal task with unideal instruments; because it takes courage to be a true minister, fearlessness of the face of mortal clay, willingness to fight when necessary, unwillingness to compromise the truth ever; because with all the limitations, difficulties, handicaps, and hardships of the minister's life the opportunities are so great that even a whole man can never fill them—I am glad that it is my lot to try to be a Christian minister. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK.

Unlimited Opportunities

I am glad I am a minister:

1. Because of the unlimited opportunities which are afforded to help others in the name of Christ.

2. Because a preacher of the gospel can give his entire time and thought to the things which relate to religion and truth, and can sidetrack many of the individual and personal desires of life on the ground of his service to His master.

3. Because it helps a man over a great many littlenesses, as he has before him the great purpose and plan of redemption and his relation to it.

4. Because there are chances, regular and irregular, to testify of the love of Christ and the meaning of a genuine religion and relate this testimony to the needs of others.

5. Because his life is filled with problems, difficulties, hardships and misunderstandings, which throw him back upon Christ, who, when He was reviled, reviled not again: when He was misunderstood, just let it go.

6. Because there is an ever-growing realization that one cannot work in his strength, but must depend upon God to help him, and above all, one is glad because he is intimately associated in his life work with the one who, above all others, is his ideal and friend. JOHN TIMOTHY STONE.

Building a Better World

It was hard for me to decide to become a preacher, and for a long time I declared I would not be one. I have now been preaching for many years, and I have never seen the day on which I was sorry for my final choice. My joy increases with the years. I am glad I am a preacher because a preacher has the chance to do the thing which the world most needs to have done. He can unfold and enforce the principles of human life, and interpret the significance of the things which come to pass. A preacher is a teacher, and mankind is in sore need of moral instruction. Men are readily confused and easily discouraged, and they need continuous inspiration and guidance. Human strength is small, and the capacity for losing the way is boundless, and unless there are guides humanity is lost. The preacher is a guide. He throws light upon men's path. He braces the heart when the road is rough and steep, he kindles a fire when the world grows grim and cold. He is every man's friend. His ambition is to help. His supreme joy is doing good. He cannot make a fortune, but he can make many rich. He cannot shine in the papers, but he can cause many a heart to glow. He cannot do spectacular and thrilling things, but he can be useful. He can interpret God to men, and he can induce men to become reconciled to God.

I am glad I am a preacher because it gives me constant opportunity to develop the best that is in me. All my higher powers are called into vigorous exercise by the work I have to do. Every ounce of my strength is needed, and not a talent is allowed to remain unused. Preaching demands the forthputting of the energies of the entire man.

And then the preacher has daily opportunity of making a contribution toward the building of a better world. Everybody admits that we cannot get on with the world as it is, and millions are longing for a world which is happier and better. That is the supreme mission of the preacher—building a better world. He moulds human hearts by the words which he speaks; he transforms character and determines destiny by unfolding and glorifying the truth. God has a favorite Son, and that Son when on the earth was a preacher.

Related to Christ's Personal Program

There are many reasons "Why I am glad I am a minister." Some of them are incidental reasons, some of them are fundamental. I have been at it nearly forty years, and am glad that I have been a preacher during this lifetime, for these reasons, among others:

First, because I have and have had such a person as Jesus Christ to talk about, to preach, to introduce to men, to interpret to men, and to live with through this long ministry. The best thing that life has given me has been its personal fellowships. And the best of these fellowships has been my fellowship with the Master. I know of no other occupation in which I could have had such privileges as the ministry has offered me. Other men might find these possible in other professions. But for me they have come through the ministry, and I am glad.

Second, I am glad I am a minister and have been, because through these four decades, with their strain, perplexity, difficulty, discouragement and almost baffling confusion, I have never lost confidence in the gospel of Jesus Christ, or the preaching of that gospel to the world. To use Moffatt's fine translation, "I have not lost heart in it." And today, when every man's personal life is subject to unusual strain, and every man's relation to his own work tested as never before, I thank God devoutly that the value of the ministry of Jesus Christ seems sure and steadfast and unshakable.

Third, I am glad I am and have been a minister because being a minister I have had chance to be related to a part of Jesus Christ's personal program in the world and His total program for the world, in supreme measure. There have been no distractions. There have been no other interests to dispute with this. Life has not suffered division of interest or share of devotion. And for a life like mine, for a mind like mine, this has been of incalculable benefit.

Fourth, I suppose, after all, all the reasons head up into one. I am glad I am a minister because in my heart I believe that this has been the will of God concerning me. And it is something to be thankful for, that after forty years of it the will of God in this matter seems good and only good and that continually. BISHOP WILLIAM FRASER MCDOWELL.

A Growing Conscience

WHAT is more interesting than a boy? There came last year to our Southern Home in Atlanta, Georgia, a twelve-year-old boy. Motherless since six years of age, he had been neglected. Running the streets, uncontrolled and uncared for, he was vile-mouthed and immoral. But he had a winning smile that drew you to him. He needed not pity but help. I fell in love with him. I talked with him. I talked to him kindly, told him why he should be obedient and helpful in the home, and endeavored to arouse aspirations by ideals of future greatness and usefulness. Eight months later when I went into the home, I saw that the wood-work of the interior had been painted. He had done much of the work. I commended him and took notice of his appreciation. When no one was listening he whispered, "Mr. White, I have been good." Such a joy to know that his heart had been touched, and his conduct changed. And such a joy to know that the church through the National Benevolent Association, is saving many such boys and girls!

Is it not strange that the Christian Church has been so slow in reaching out the helping hand to such? We scan her history. It seems her conscience has been asleep, that it is just now waking up to the glory of this ministry. Until the work begun in 1886 by the National Benevolent Association, our only home was in Louisville, Kentucky, and was wholly supported by that state. For years the National Benevolent Association did very little and was given little consideration as an organization of the church. Even now where we care for hundreds, others care for thousands. We have been content to give some of our money to help support the homes of other churches, and of secret organizations, and the Christian Church often begs entrance, for even our own, into their institutions. Great honor is accorded them, and the Christian Church is robbed of her beauty, glory and power.

A lady of means, and a member of the Christian Church once said to me, "I love the Catholics because I have been in one of their hospitals and because I have seen what they are doing in a home in Nashville for aged men. When they come to this town asking for aid I have my daughter take them in her car and visit all in the community for funds for their work."

Money put into the homes of the Christian Church where the aged dependent are tenderly loved and cared for, and where little children are trained to be Christians would win for the church a place in the hearts of thousands. Little children would be saved from institutions where they are trained to be Catholics. Protestants cannot consistently condemn Catholic doctrines and send their children to Catholic institutions; nor put their money into such, for they are the life and power of the Catholic Church.

Our campaign in the south in the interests of our Orphans' Home in Atlanta, and our college at Auburn, Georgia, has proved to us that the church has a growing conscience along these lines. Possibly we have been dormant for the lack of opportunity. Our people are proving by their gifts that they see the need of an institution in the south that will be worthy the Christian Church, and that will have prestige among a people that will gladly respond to its call.

We believe the church to be the Lord himself, upon the earth; still loving the helpless children; still seeing the hidden possibilities wrapped up in their little souls; still ready to take them in His arms and bless them. The homes of the National Benevolent Association are the arms of our Lord.

The Grand Work of This Age

THE missionary field is, indeed, as broad and as long as the terraqueous globe. Every unconverted human being on this earth, capable of understanding and believing the gospel, is found in the missionary field. Hence the Lord Himself commanded his prime missionaries to traverse the whole world, and to preach the gospel to the whole human race.

But this commission is not given specially nor formally to any class of persons amongst us, but to the whole church. Every member of the church is embraced in this commission, properly interpreted. We must either go in person, or send by our own means those that can go, and will go, into fields of evangelical labor. We cannot ask any one to go on his own charges. We must all be fellow-helpers of the truth.

This is not a painful or onerous necessity. It is a blessing and an honor above all that time or earth affords, to have a part in the great work of saving men from ruin, and in bringing many sons to glory and blessedness, through Him who is the way, the truth, and the life eternal.

The missionary enterprise is, by universal concession, as well as by the oracles of God, the grand work of this age; the grand duty, privilege, and honor of the church of the 19th century. God has Himself, in His providence and moral government, opened up the way for us. He has given us learning, science, wealth, the arts of acquiring and communicating all knowledge of the conditions of the living world—of the Pagan nations, their languages, customs, rites and usages. He has given to us the oceans of the earth, with all its seas, lakes, rivers and harbors. He has, in the inventions, arts, and improvements of the age, almost annihilated distance, contracted time, annihilated the mountain barriers; and by our trade, our commerce, our arts and our science, we have, in his providence, arrested the attention and commanded the respect of all heathen lands, of all barbarous people, of all creeds and of all customs. Our national flag floats in every breeze; our nation and our language command the respect, and almost the homage, of all the nations and the peoples on earth. God, in his providence and moral government, has opened the way for us—a door which no man, nor nation of men, can shut. Have we not, then, as a people, a special call, a loud call, a Divine call, to harness ourselves for the work, the great work—the greatest work of man—the preaching of the gospel of eternal life to a world dead, spiritually dead, in trespasses and sins? And shall we lend to it a cold, a careless, an indifferent ear?—Alexander Campbell.

Interchurch World Movement

A Report of the World Survey Conference, Held in Atlantic City, January 7–9.

THE World Survey Conference in Atlantic City, January 7-9, was attended by 1,732 representative men and women from all parts of the United States and from forty-two religions. Disciples of Christ present numbered ninety-five, and came from seventeen states.

Thorough consideration was given to the surveys of fields and departments of work presented and to plans for the advancement of the movement. Four large commissions first took these matters under consideration and made reports, which were debated, revised and adopted by the conference. These commissions dealt with the program of the movement, its field work, its financial campaign and its budget of expenses.

The Board of Review, composed of the following eminent men and women, E. D. Burton, C. E. Burton, Mrs. F. S. Bennett, Hubert C. Herring, Alfred E. Marling, Alexander R. Nicol, F. W. Padelford, Cornelius H. Patton, Mrs. H. W. Peabody, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Robert E. Speer, James M. Speers, David W. Teachout, Charles R. Watson, spent two days and nights in December examining the plans of the movement and unanimously adopted the following statement written by Mr Rockefeller:

The Board of Review having had an opportunity to hear from the leaders of the Interchurch World Movement a summary of their plans, and to look over a statement of expenditures incurred and proposed, begs to report that in its judgment:

1. The plans are wisely and conservatively drawn and not more extensive than necessary in view of the stupendous and unparalleled undertaking contemplated.

2. The expenditures are carefully and judiciously planned, and though amounting to important sums, are relatively small when compared with the results in accomplishment, spiritual, educational and financial, which are justly to be anticipated.

3. Had the leaders, through lack of vision or fear of present criticism, dared less, and prepared a less adequate foundation, they would have subjected themselves eventually to far greater censure because of their failure to have constructed a foundation sufficiently broad and strong for the great structure which alone will be in any sense worthy of the United effort of so large an aggregation of the Christian people of the land.

When Professor Burton as chairman of the commission on the program of the Movement read the following preamble to the commission's report the conference rose spontaneously and unanimously in expression of its enthusiastic approval of the statement:

We desire, first of all, to express our belief in the providential character of the Interchurch World Movement. We gratefully note its origin, its growth, its widening areas of usefulness, and, above all, its spirit of devotion to the advancement of Christ's Kingdom throughout the world.

In spite of mistakes necessarily incident to inaugurating an unprecedented movement of so extensive a character, and in spite of the many unsolved problems and even perils that must yet be faced, we are confident that the movement is of God and that, under Divine guidance and with the Christian cooperation of the Protestant forces of America, errors will be corrected and difficulties overcome.

We are impressed by the response of the great organizations which have entered into this united endeavor to win the world for Christ. That 140 different boards representing 34 Protestant denominations, covering the entire range of Christian activity, should affiliate themselves for studying, planning and accomplishing their tasks, we consider to be one of the most glorious achievements in the history of the Church, the proper and inevitable response of God's people to the appalling needs of our age.

Since there is no other agency of the churches, as at present constituted, capable of understanding the task forced upon us by the present world situation and outlined by the Interchurch World Movement, this organization was called into being.

We believe the time is fully ripe for such unity of action on the part of united Protestantism.

The ideal of the whole Church facing the whole task appeals to us as scriptural and practicable.

Profoundly grateful for what God has already wrought in bringing the Movement to its present position of prominence, we cordially invite such Christian bodies as have not already taken favorable action, to cooperate in a movement which offers the promise of presenting a Church undivided in its purpose and plan to make Christ regnant throughout the nations.

Foremost in the Movement's program is a great, simultaneous evangelistic effort culminating on Easter Sunday as Decision Day, with campaigns for deepening prayer life, inculcating stewardship and enlisting young people for life service running parallel with the evangelistic preparations and the financial campaign following April 21 to May 2, for securing the funds needed for the current year as the first unit in a five-year program.

Why Not You?

THERE is a hollow in front of every man's shoulder where a sweet child's head should nestle. There are depths of tenderness in every man's nature which only the care of little children can develop. One's purposes must be nobler who feels a child's soft hand clasped confidingly in his own.

Where you go he will fearlessly attend, for to every child his real or foster father is something superman. A little girl phrased it the other day in this way, "Say, mamma, is papa a giant?" Who would not lead a better life knowing himself to have such pure confidence? Whose conduct would not be more circumspect when consciously privileged to train precious children for glorious manhood and womanhood—to fashion souls to enjoy two worlds?

Thousands of homeless children need sheltering care and thousands of childless men and women are missing life's richest experience, for verily, "A little child shall lead them." The Son of God says, "Whosoever receiveth one such little child in my name receiveth me." Why not you?

If your affairs are so arranged that you cannot do this yourself, would you not be greatly blessed by furnishing full support for a child in one of the homes of the National Benevolent Association? As the average stay of a child is only a few months, $100 annually will take one child each year out of poverty and place him in a good Christian home. Why not do it now?

The Boy Who Found His Mother

By ABRAM DURYEE

Abdul Lateef, eight years old, who lives at the Children's Shelter in Beirut, is as happy a little boy as one could find in all Syria, today.

That isn't saying a great deal, of course. Syria and the other lands of the Near East aren't the home of the happiest children in the world, since the Turkish outrages against the Armenians. Since the Near East Relief, the Red Cross, and other relief organizations began looking after these homeless, hungry boys and girls, however, they are less wretched than they used to be. But few of them have any hope of seeing their families, or any members of their families, again. When the Turks got through with the Armenians, there were no such things as families left in Syria.

Abdul, however, through a lucky accident, has just found his mother. This brings us back to the story of why he is such a happy boy.

Abdul came to the Children's Shelter in January, 1919. He had been picked up on the street delirious from fever induced by starvation. The Near East Relief worker who found him tried to discover from what place the boy had come. Abdul told him his name, but did not know where he had lived, or whether he had a family.

The little boy was brought to the Children's Shelter, which is conducted by Near East Relief in Beirut. Formerly it was a school for Mohammedan girls. The Turks took it over during the war. When the British Army drove them away, they left a scene of ruin behind them, windows broken out, furniture destroyed, even the trees uprooted. Nevertheless, it was as good as the other buildings of Beirut, and Near East Relief asked to have it for a Children's Shelter.

One day as Abdul stood leaning over the fence, peering wistfully down the street, and wondering what had become of his mother, whom he had remembered after he recovered from the fever, a little girl passed. She turned her head, and stared at him. Then she ran back.

"Abdul!" she cried. "It's Abdul Lateef!"

She told him that his mother had returned to their former home, and promised to send her at once to see her little son. The little girl departed running, and soon after Abdul's mother appeared.

"Abdul!" she cried. "My own little son!"

And that was how Abdul found his mother again. The Near East Relief Committee wishes that the hundreds and hundreds of other sorrowful youngsters of these lands might find their parents, also. But this is impossible, so America must play father and mother to them.

The Mother Half of the World

By MRS. W. A. MONTGOMERY

IN one respect all the great non-Christian faiths of the world have failed. That failure they share with all other teachers of religion in every country and in every age, save one. All the great technic faiths of the world do not know how to admit the mother of men to the spiritual parliament of man, and they never have known how.

There is just one Teacher who has looked at men and women with level eyes and summoned them all to stand with Him for the building of the Kingdom of God. It is not necessary to make any indictment. It is not necessary to give any specifications. The history of that failure is written in every language and in every sacred book that man has written save one.

Dr. Zwemer has spoken to us of the failure of the great prophet of Arabia to write a gospel for women. Any one who has seen those hundred of Moslem spires and minarets against the blue of the sky in Cairo and known that there was only one Moslem temple and mosque where women were either expected or permitted to worship God, knows that you are dealing with a faith that expatriates half of its world, and no one need to live long in India, and no one can read the holy books of India, and no one can listen to the great authorities, the Indian authorities, and not realize that the greatest failure of Hinduism is the degradation of its womanhood. I heard Ramabai say that the first time that she ever read from the Vedas she nearly fainted with awe; that she, an impure woman, should dare to read those sacred texts that are forbidden to women and outlaws with terrible forbiddings. And no one can live long in India and not realize that that great son of India was right when he said that child marriage and child motherhood and perpetual widowhood and seclusion were the roots of India's weakness. And all those failures are fastened on the women of India not by evil custom, but by the sanction of the strongest codes and the holy scriptures of the Hindu faith.

And Buddhism—Lord Buddha was asked whether a woman could tread that noble eight-fold path, and it is a noble path. He said, "No," that a woman's foot was too weak to tread that path and he held out to women through the writings of the Buddhist faith itself, one hope, that was that the women by austerity, by prayers, by offerings to the priests, might in some far distant turn of the great wheel of existence, come back as a man to earth and then be subject for salvation.

I am not going to go on. There is not one faith under heaven in which there is any hope for the social salvation of this world except Jesus. For here is the mother and the child. Where is the citadel of human life? Where is the hope of the future? Where is the most important place to guard in our far-flung battle lines? It is where a woman sits with her baby in her arms. Now look at Jesus.

Only one Teacher ever put one law of morality for men and women, and the world that we call Christian is just dimly beginning to see in the distance the law of Christ which shall yet triumph with free, beautiful, perfect homes by men and women who walk under one law of pure living before the Lord of life. And as Dr. Zwemer told you, there is only one Teacher who lets in the child—Jesus discovered childhood. When His disciples were disputing about who should be greatest, He reached and took a little child (Jesus never had to reach far to find a child) and said, "Except you turn and become like this little child you cannot enter my kingdom. Suffer little children to come to me and forbid them not," and in that word you have one of the most profoundly original, unforgettable sentences that dropped from the lips of our Lord, and in that sentence you have the Magna Charta of childhood. You can look through Greek literature, and you can count on the fingers of your two hands all the children that flit through its pages and they are simply interesting because they are attached to some adult. Froebel could not have lived in India or China or Japan or any country that hadn't been for centuries under the discipline of Jesus, and the kindergarten that goes around the world is His advance agent for a new world in which dwells righteousness.

Jesus discovered the spiritual capacity of woman. There is not a greater sentence in the New Testament than that one in the fourth chapter of John, when Jesus sits, wearied, by the side of the well that Jacob digged, and His disciples coming back, are surprised that he talks with a woman, and while they were gone, Jesus had told to that woman spiritual truths that He had not to that moment revealed to one of His followers.

God is spirit. "They that drink of this water that I shall give them shall never thirst. I that speak unto Thee am He." And Jesus, the morning of His resurrection, gave to women the first commission for the missionary message. In Jesus' law of marriage, in Jesus' foundation of the home, in Jesus' law of love, in Jesus' sharing of His gospel with men and women, in one great fellowship of humanity, we have the possibilities of building a new world and in no other teaching have we that possibility, for there is not spiritual dynamic enough, there is not spiritual democracy enough, there is not

Prayer at Des Moines Convention

Our Father, we thank Thee that Thou art here so near to us today, that Thou art nearer to us than our need of Thee, closer to us than our own sin and weakness. Oh, help us, we pray Thee, to feel Thy nearness and to yield ourselves, our wills, our lives to Thy glorifying and enriching ownership. Reveal to us, we pray Thee, in this first meeting, Thy glory in the face of Jesus Christ, Thy son. We thank Thee that He is living in the world today and in our hearts, that He is waiting to come with larger power and dearer fellowship into the possession and occupancy of our lives. And now we ask Thee, O Lord Jesus Christ, to take as a prayer what we have just been hearing. Whether by water, or by fire, oh, make us clean. Make us clean. Cleanse us now, at the beginning, from all unworthiness and selfishness of ambition and desire. Cleanse us from evil thought. Cleanse us from unfriendly interest, from racial prejudice, from all pride and wrong feeling. Cleanse us, Lord Jesus Christ, from everything that makes us unlike Thee, and unfit to be trusted as Thou wert trusted by the power and the joy of God. Quiet our hearts in these closing moments, that we may hear Thee at the door. "Behold I stand and knock. If any man will open the door I will come in and will sup with him and he with me." Bring us into this still and holy fellowship and speak to us this day and all these days, showing us Thy will for our lives and in us reveal Thyself as the strength and the power of Thy God and our God, Thy Father and our Father. We ask it in Thy name. Amen.

an appreciation of motherhood enough, in all the great religions of the world put together, to build that new foundation except Jesus builds it.

I wish, as we sit here tonight we could get a picture of the womanhood of the world, the womanhood of the world—that half of the world, that half of the world which has to do the greatest task, which has to do the one task without which all their other undertakings are futile, that half of the world—is the most ignorant and the most superstitious, and the least privileged—that half of the world, the mothers of men, three out of four of them who stand under God's sky tonight are illiterate. For even in Christian countries there are great sweeps of territory where the woman of the common people who reads in anything except the poorest, stumbling, unsatisfactory way, is exceptional, and when you step out from that diminishing light of Christ, into the disciplines of these other religions, it is the privileged woman only who is let out of that prison of illiteracy.

Men, men of the convention, remember that for milleniums, the mothers of men have been shut out of the kingdom of books; the mothers of men have been shut out of the free intercourse, the ennobling, enlightening, illuminating intercourse with those outside their own families. The mothers of men who must take for the first six years of its life every child that comes into this world have done their task without training. There is not a group of men, there is not a guild of men that does not know that it needs training to do its work well, but mothers from the time of the cave men till now, the mothers of men, have had to work without tools, have had to work without the training of the schools, have had to work shut out from temples, shut out from Bibles, shut out from spiritual fellowship because they were thought unworthy.

Women of the convention, it isn't an inspiring sight to see a man who in this land that Christ built and Christ set free and Christ ungirded, who does not believe in Christ, but what shall we say of the women who are careless and flippant and who with luxury-loving hands would tear down Christ's influence? There is not a girl that came through on a Pullman sleeper to this place that does not owe her safety to Jesus Christ. There is not a land under the shining sun where that would be possible, where Jesus Christ has not walked before it and made it safe. There is not a woman who steps into an elevator in a hotel, as American women do, who does not owe that advance of hers to Jesus Christ. It isn't for youth, it isn't for charm—there is youth and charm everywhere in the world—it is because the lover of mankind has set us free that we women walk as we walk and talk as we talk and live our lives as we live them. And I submit to you there isn't so unlovely a sight in the world as a Godless woman in a Christian country.

What are you going to do for these other sisters of ours who need schools and hospitals and friends, who need to give the training to them that they can take up the great work in their own land for the Son of God who died for men and women and little children, to make of this earth a home where God's children will find it a safe, blessed, beautiful place to be born?

The Student Volunteer Convention

Held at Des Moines, Iowa, December 31, 1919—January 4, 1920

THE Eighth International Student Volunteer Convention, which assembled in Des Moines, Iowa, on the closing day of the old year, was one of profound significance because of several elements which entered into it. The first, and to some the most striking thing, was the personnel of this gathering. There within the Coliseum were assembled 5,909 students and professors from more than 906 institutions. Nor was this all. In addition to the collegians there was an additional group of 949 student pastors, Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Association secretaries, furloughed missionaries, representatives of mission boards and speakers, a total registration of 6,858 delegates. In this tremendous gathering there were representatives of forty different nationalities.

The second great element was the purpose of the gathering. It is not an easy task, under the most effective handling of convention procedure, to weld so great a mass of vigorous young life into an effective spiritual unity within a period of five days. And yet the spirit of unity was present to a marked degree. Even the usual barriers between races were conspicuously absent. The purpose of the convention is daringly expressed in the watchword of the movement—"The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." Such a great purpose as this slogan implies gives evidence of the knowledge that the world needs more than anything else it is the gospel of Jesus Christ. Added to this was the new world situation, urgent and baffling in its problems. Never before did the need of the nations for an adequate solution of their difficulties seem greater, and never did it appear more plainly that such a solution must have a religious rootage. James I. Vance of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, said:

"If the broken world is to be mended, something more than the human power over nature will be needed. There must be a vision of spiritual values, passion for service, a cross on the hill-crest. When we can look into the face of Christ and see our fellowmen, then, and only then, will the world be mended."

The third element was the spirit of the convention. It must be remembered that not all of those present were student volunteers, although over two thousand of the delegates had definitely pledged themselves to become missionaries of the Cross. The others were leaders in college life, with a large variety of interests, and probably many of them were unacquainted with the great ideals of the movement. Yet all showed a most responsive appreciation of the great problems of the day, and a readiness to respond to the great challenges which were made. With each succeeding session came the feeling of a strong spiritual kinship which left its impress upon all. Near the close of the convention one of the students remarked: "I cannot conceive how anyone can be unchanged after such messages as these." The movement should receive fresh impetus as these thousands go back to their respective institutions and relate what they have seen and heard.

The presence of the very large group of students from foreign lands constituted an element in the convention at once picturesque, inspiring and truly significant. In no previous convention were foreign students present in such numbers and strength, and their addresses from the main platform and in section conferences were so vigorous in style and so clear in presentation that the wayfaring man could see plainly enough that the missionary task of the world is not solely the white man's burden.

An account of the convention would be incomplete without a glimpse into the history of the Student Volunteer Movement, which had its rise at Mount Hermon, Massachusetts, in the summer of 1886. Out of this gathering of students came a number of well established purposes, which have been held in prominence and steadfastly adhered to through all the years: (1) to awaken and maintain among all Christian students of the United States and Canada intelligent and active interest in foreign missions; (2) to enroll a sufficient number of properly qualified volunteers to meet the successive demands of the various Mission Boards of North America in their effort to give all living men the opportunity to know the Living Christ; (3) to help all such intending missionaries in preparing for their life work and to enlist their cooperation in developing the missionary life of the colleges and of the home churches; (4) to lay an equal burden of responsibility on all students who are to remain at home as ministers and lay workers, that they may actively promote the missionary enterprise by their intelligent advocacy, by their gifts and by their prayers.

This movement is a recruiting agency and summons students to a world-wide crusade. It is not, however, an organization to send missionaries nor does it assume the functions of a missionary-sending agency. It is unswervingly loyal to the churches. It exists primarily to serve the Foreign Missionary Societies of the North American Churches. It is a student movement. The field for which it has ever held itself responsible has been and is the universities, colleges, theological seminaries, medical schools, normal schools, advanced training schools; in short, all institutions of higher learning in the United States and Canada. The field embraces fully 1,000 institutions, which have in them today approximately 300,000 students.

The report of the Executive Committee of the Student Volunteer Movement, read by Dr. Mott on behalf of the committee, at one morning session, indicated that during the lifetime of the Movement—a generation of thirty-three years—8,140 student volunteers from North American institutions had reached the field, going out under sixty-six foreign missionary agencies; last year, in the student field of North America, 47,666 students in nearly 3,000 classes were engaged in the study of missionary subjects under trained leadership; and missionary giving in the colleges has risen from less than $5,000 a year to over $300,000. The most distinctive contributions of the Movement were set forth as (1) the Volunteer Declaration—"It is my purpose, if God permit, to become a foreign missionary;" (2) the solidarity which the movement has developed among its members and the members of kindred movements throughout the world; (3) the Watchword—"The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." Dr. Mott said of the Watchword:

"The history of the movement shows that there are great advantages in having such a Watchword as a commanding ideal. The fact that it is a startling phrase, calling for explanation, has arrested the attention of earnest men and stimulated their thought regarding Christ's great program for the evangelization. It constantly reminds men that the missionary problem is a living one—one which living men have to face on behalf of men now living. It is a stirring reminder that our plan must embrace the whole world and that we must act without delay."

The morning and evening sessions were devoted to a survey of the various non-Christian lands, and the needs which were peculiar to each. The speakers were chosen for their knowledge of the particular field, and all were deeply spiritual. Aside from the main sessions of the convention our afternoons were devoted to section conferences, the divisions on one day being by fields, on another day by types of mission work, such as educational, medical, evangelistic and agricultural; on the third by denominations, and on the fourth by men and by women students. On two afternoons the foreign students had sectional meetings of their own, gathered each time at first together and then separating for meetings by national or racial groups. Not least in importance and interest was the exhibit held in the auditorium, where the needs and the opportunity were presented in a graphic way.

The meeting of the Disciples of Christ was held at the University Christian Church, and was presided over by President McLean. The needs of the various fields occupied by the church were presented by missionaries and missionary leaders. The roll call revealed the fact that seventy colleges were present at this conference.

The convention as a whole placed an emphasis upon the power of educated leadership, which is too often absent from the programs of our church conventions. It is not the purpose of this article to discuss the indifference of any religious body toward the colleges which are maintained in its interests. It is essential that the source of leadership be considered. The following statement is quoted from an editorial which appeared in the Des Moines Tribune on the opening day of the session:

"Let us not miss the significance of the fact that it is collegians who are being entertained in Des Moines. That it is collegians who are going abroad to carry the message of good cheer to the less favored parts of the earth.

"When the war of might was on the military men went to the colleges to supply the training camps. Today, when the war of right is on, the training camps again look to the colleges. Why did the military camps go to the colleges? Why do the missionary leaders go to the colleges? The answer ought not be lost on a single American.

"The military camps went to the colleges because both physically and mentally college men were more alert, more quickly adaptable, could care for themselves better.

"The great religious leaders go to the colleges because spiritually college men and women are as much more alert as they are mentally and physically."

There have been eight conventions of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, beginning with that of Cleveland in 1891, and these conventions have "literally marked epochs in the missionary and religious life of the students of Canada and the United States." They have been unique in that the leaders of that first gathering have been the leaders in each successive convention. Remembering the long years of service which they have rendered, one is surprised to note the appearance of youth on the part of many and the freshness which characterizes every message. This is all the more remarkable as the leaders come forward not once, but many times, to voice the message of the hour. All have exemplified in their lives the challenge that he who would be the greatest must become the servant of all.

The Volunteer Movement at the end of thirty-three years is strong and vital and never more so. Although the passing of the years must mean a changing leadership, the great principles of the movement will perpetuate its worth. The recognition of prayer as the source of power and life, which was present in all the sessions, will keep its idealism true. It will grow because of the boldness of its purpose which confronts the students of the world and calls out their latent capacities and commands their supreme devotion. Such an enterprise as this has done more than any other one thing to make vivid and commanding the world-wide program of Christianity.

Shall "Young America" Preach?

By COLBY D. HALL

WHEN he was a little fellow he was a regular "Buster Brown," always in the midst of things doing; keen and snappy, with his talents fully appreciated by all the family. He smashed many things, among them the old adage that "children should be seen and not heard." Now he is "Young America," saturated with the great expectations of his family, nerved by the undaunted self-confidence of a high school career, and pitching like a young colt to get into these tremendous affairs of American life and show the old men how things should be run. Young America wants to put his life only where it will count in a big way in the big affairs of the big world.

And now that he—or his big brother—has had an actual physical part oversea, in a real world job, Young America is more than ever discontent to tie his life to anything that does not really and truly help to "turn the world upside down." Blessings on the young man. Why, indeed, should any youth seek or accept a soft place in this day of hard and manly tasks? He is right!

The work of preaching the gospel is one of those big, compelling, world-building tasks that should challenge the ambition and ability of Young America. If the youth in our churches has not so seen it, that is because we have not presented it to him in this light. It is time for repentance in this matter.

There has been too much tendency to consider the ministry as not only an unattractive and sacrificial life, but even as uninfluential. The preacher has been regarded as a man apart; a cloistered theologue in a day when theology is unpopular; an unproductive dreamer when success is measured by productive power. In the avalanche of criticism against the church these false charges are fostered. And no one catches them so quickly as "Young America."

To be sure, there have been types of preachers who were so priestly that they were not much preachers, depending on dignity and dress for distinction, and out of touch with life. There are some of them remaining. But this is not the typical preacher of today, and the tendency is altogether away from this type. Why burden the work of today with a conception that is dead?

The real preacher is the most influential man in society. His work is at the fountain of life. Frederick Lynch, in his book, "New Opportunities of the Ministry," says: "The influence of kings or statesmen or great warriors has been little compared with the transformation wrought in the world's history by these preachers of the Gospel and teachers of Christian ethics."

At the Roots of Things

A study of history will vindicate this position with reference to the past. And it is true with manifold emphasis in the present world crisis. The transforming process no longer moves at the rate of the ox cart; it sails with the speed of the airship and wireless. So is the influence of the preacher multiplied.

World peace waits on the preaching of the Gospel.—right now. The barbarism we whipped in Europe was anti-Christian at heart. The Oriental nations are imperialistic and must be Christianized or become a peril. Africa swings between Mohammed and Christ and will decide in this generation. Unless the heathen nations are made fit for brotherhood by the gospel, before they are made efficient for fighting by civilization, they will become a danger more horrible than the Huns. All the statesmanship of the earth cannot prevent a future clash unless these nations are evangelized.

The success of the League of Nations depends on the preachers. That league has been constructed as a wonderful body: but into it yet must be breathed the breath of life. There is no breath—no spirit—that can function through that body except the spirit of brotherhood. And there is no way to get that spirit into the nations that have it not, other than by the preaching of the Gospel.

Industrial peace, in America and beyond, depends on the preaching of the gospel. The long oppressed people of all lands are seething in menacing rebellion; even America must face seriously the possibility of a class war. Political expedient may postpone, but only a Christian program can prevent a serious catastrophe, and construct a permanent, satisfactory program. It was nothing less than the idealism of a Christian statesman, reared in a preacher's home, that was able to light the peoples out of the darkness of the world war; nothing less than the much preaching of that same Christian idealism will lead America to inward peace. Industrial rest and justice can come only through the planting of the gospel in the hearts of labor and capital alike.

The preacher, after all, is the fundamental statesman. The reconstruction of national and international life by statesmen always waits on the regeneration of the individual and social ideals by the preacher. The statesman keeps his ear to the ground. He must do it. Why? That he may hear the verdict of the people and enact it. He can lead a little, but not far, beyond the average sentiment of the people. So the statesman of today can make the best nation out of the material he has today. It is the business of the preacher to make better citizens, higher ideals; so that the statesman of tomorrow may have better material out of which to construct a better world. Progress therefore moves by the measure of the preacher's work.

"Except the Lord build the house
They labor in vain who build it."

The New Age Welcomes the Preacher

Some timid souls have feared that because the church did not officially prevent or close the war the influence of statesman and soldier would eclipse the influence of the preacher. Some of us also feared that the pride in military glory would fasten upon us a permanent policy of universal military training. But, a week after the armistice, it was clear that America had no heart for militarism. And even this soon after the war it is just as clear that the whole world has awakened to a new appreciation for the power of idealism over materialism.

This is the age, therefore, for the leader whose whole task is based on the conception that "not by might nor by power, but by my spirit," is the world to be reconstructed. The old giant militarism lies chained in the dungeon of universal contempt; new-born liberty walks the upper air, intoxicated by its freshness, and blinded by the unaccustomed dazzle, and seeking for some one to lead. The new day is tired of materialism, and is shot through with idealism. It calls from the heart, for the prophet who can study to know the mind of God and interpret it to the groping people.

The new day calls for the preacher because it has tasted the joy of unselfishness. "The only nation trusted by all other nations is that one which poured out its millions of men and billions of treasure" with no selfish end to gain. If there is one outstanding hero today it is the man who dared to lead a peace-loving people into war, vowing they would receive no indemnity, no conquest, no remuneration, but only to make the world safe for democracy. Such unselfishness has melted the hearts of the world. The blackest crime today is self-seeking, and the badge of the world's hero is service. Such an age welcomes the true preacher of that One who first taught and most completely lived this ideal.

Every Church Must Have Its Timothy

If the power of the preacher were better known there would be more boys in the churches aspiring to preach. Oh, pastors, as you believe that God's program is the solvent of the world's troubles, put on that program in your community with such zeal and bigness that the boys will burn to be ministers instead of millionaires. You business men, as you know now that force is helpless before the power of truth, that building ideals is a bigger task than piling wealth, teach your boys that a life of service is not only happier, but more useful to the world; and see that a due portion of them give themselves to this foundation work of preaching.

You parents, who gladly yielded your sons and treasure to stem the tide of barbarism in an emergency, go pray that your sons may give their lives to the only work that can complete this task, by planting the gospel so that emergencies like this may not come again.

You churches, whose walls bear proudly the stars of your service flags for boys who risked their lives, go make you another service roll for your sons who will invest their lives in the fundamental task of world reconstruction. "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers into His harvest."

Yes! Call Young America to preach. The task will engage his greatest powers, the career will reward him with the greatest wealth of the enduring kind.

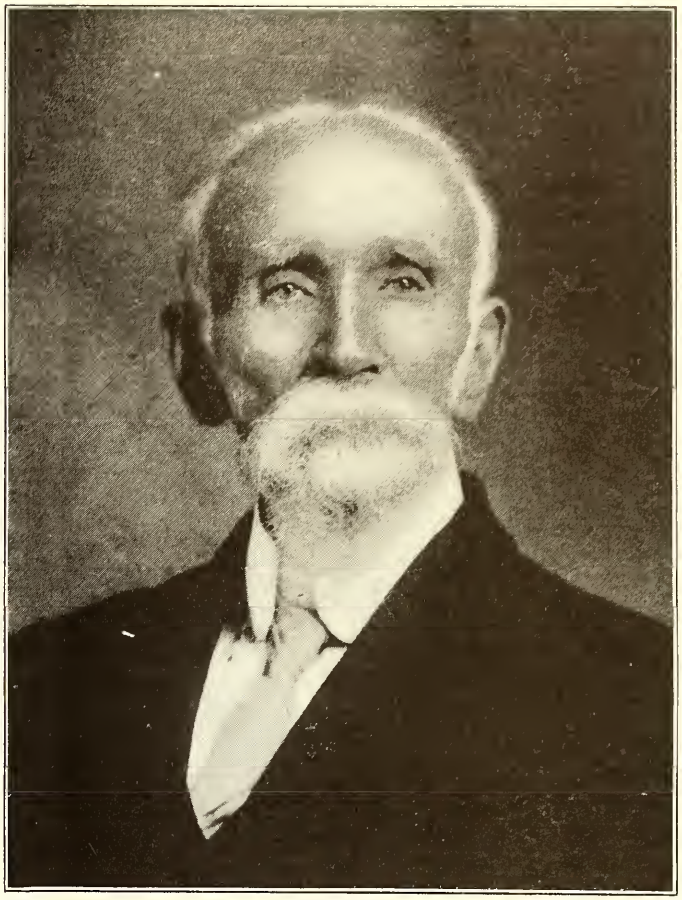
James W. Lanham

JAMES W. LANHAM, true Disciple of Christ, minister of the gospel, author, teacher, friend to man, was laid to rest December second in God's Halfacre at Manville, Jefferson county, Indiana, on a hillock back of the church where he ministered sixty-three years—in sight of his home, which, also eighty-seven years ten months before was the place of his birth. Mr. Lanham was stricken while attending the International Convention in Cincinnati. He was cared for at the Methodist hospital, rallied sufficiently to be taken home, lived a few weeks in which to greet his friends and comfort his loved ones, and fell to sleep December first.

The funeral services were largely attended. John W. Moody, minister at Madison, President W. A. Millis of Hanover College, and the writer gave appreciation of his life and strength to his friends.

Beginning his higher education at Hanover College, he carried his searchings after truth all the years. His public utterances were always well received, while his book of sermons attest to his literary ability and logical power. To the end he held his keen mind; some even claiming that his last sermons three months ago were the best they had heard from him.

His ministry to the churches at Manville, Salem, Shelby,



Madison, Edinburg, Lexington, and Indianapolis (this last while serving in the legislature) was productive of untold good.

In these days when so many of our ministers are seeking other vocations it is refreshing to dwell on the long ministry closed here. At considerable sacrifice of place and prestige this preacher of righteousness refused offers of preferment time and again, but the denial was worth while as indicated by the widespread and genuine sorrow caused by his last call. Without children in the flesh, he was father in the gospel to thousands. There is not a home for scores of miles in all directions but that he had entered as joy bearer and sorrow sharer. His homes were legion. His Master's words were fulfilled in him: "There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife or lands, for my sake and the gospel's, but he shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses and brethren, and sisters, and mothers and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life."

True reflection in him of his loved hills about him and the rippling stream that flowed by his door, his faith was steadfast and his hope serene. We met on the train going to Cincinnati. Picking up the thread of former discussions the question was asked: "What is your pet heresy now?" "Ah! in these present days it is, 'I believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the Living God.'" A friend calling near the end said: "We can't spare you." "Spare me! You don't spare me; there will be but a cloud between."

For several years the name of James W. Lanham has been among the most honored on the roll of the Board of Ministerial Relief. What the brotherhood did for him in this way was an honor to the veteran and a credit to the church.

Our Army Chaplains in the Great War

By JASPER T. MOSES

(Formerly Assistant Secretary of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches)

THE Church has reason to be proud of the men who represented her in caring for the spiritual welfare of the soldiers in the great war. Both with the A. E. F. and in the training camps at home, strong, kindly men of God were ever at hand to speak the needed word of exhortation or of comfort to our lads in khaki and, as opportunity was afforded, to bring to them the message of religion.

Full statistical information regarding the work of the chaplains in the army is not yet available. For the War Department, the Statistics Branch of the General Staff reports that of the 1,263 chaplains who went overseas, probably two-thirds of whom saw actual fighting, there were eleven killed in action or died of wounds soon after. Search through the official records of the department shows that about forty were wounded and recovered, while eighteen died from other causes, by disease or accident, making a total unofficial casualty list of approximately seventy. The rate per thousand of battle deaths for the chaplains of 8.7 is only slightly lower than the ratio of 10.3 for all the field officers of the A. E. F., and this is in spite of the fact that a chaplain bears no arms and going into action is not required of him. The battle death rate for enlisted men overseas was 21.9 per thousand and for all officers of the A. E. F., 26.5.

Many chaplains went far beyond their routine military duties, being constantly with their men in the front line trenches and even going over the top when advances into enemy territory were made. Several chaplains are known to have taken the place of other officers killed or disabled in action and to have led groups of enlisted men, and in some cases to have operated machine guns to protect wounded men under their charge and, by so doing, to have successfully routed the enemy. This, however, was in no wise expected of them, the usual place for chaplains during action being with the aid and dressing stations or at the field hospitals with the dying, duties less dashing and romantic than "going over the top," but none the less vitally necessary to the welfare of the men whom they were set to serve and certainly not devoid of danger. It was here the minister's vocation made him invaluable, though many venturesome spirits could not resist the call of "no man's land." Indeed, the records show the case of one chaplain to whom the fighting end of the job made such appeal that he was, in military parlance, "transferred to the line," exchanging his cross for an officer's bars. Several clergymen, notably those who had previous military training, served through the war as line officers.

The number of chaplains cited for conspicuous bravery and receiving decorations from our own government and from our allies is very large. Instances of new citations are constantly coming to light, a few of the men having received repeated decorations from our government, which is far less generous in this form of recognition than are the military departments of most European nations. More than forty individual chaplains have been cited, several of them more than once. Records of the War Department show reports from the commanding officers of these chaplains praising in the highest terms their helpfulness and efficiency in maintaining the morale of the troops.

An example of the military language in which their deeds are mentioned is the following posthumous award of the distinguished service cross to Chaplain Charles D. Priest: "For extraordinary heroism in action near Les Huit Chemins, France, September 20, 1918. He disregarded personal danger by going six hundred yards beyond the front lines and, with the aid of a soldier, carried back a wounded man to shelter." Another chaplain, more fortunate in escaping with slight wounds, was a former missionary to Mexico. O. J. Cohee, who received the distinguished service cross "for extraordinary heroism in action near Rombercourt, France, November 1-2, 1918. He worked untiringly under constant artillery fire for two days in charge of the stretcher bearers, personally assisting and carrying wounded men to safety."

There were many types of men represented in the chaplaincy; among them were such honored leaders of the Church as Bishop Charles H. Brent, Senior Headquarters Chaplain of the A. E. F., who went into the army direct from his Protestant Episcopal diocese and whose splendid executive ability soon won for him the direction of the activities of all of the chaplains in France. Another man who has rendered distinguished service is Major John T. Axton, chaplain of the port of embarkation, Hoboken, New Jersey, a Congregationalist veteran of the regular army service, whose one consolation for his failure to see overseas duty is the wonderful opportunity that has been his to work out the problems and direct the activities of the chaplains incident to the sailing and to the return of the millions of men who passed through the great harbor of New York and the camps contiguous thereto, with the splendid welfare activities developed under his charge. Major Axton had also direction of all the welfare workers on the home-bound transports during the return of the A. E. F.

Along with these occasional veterans of the service and with those more conspicuous in church life were hundreds of young men from their first pastorates or just out of college and seminary, who rose to the occasion and made up the rank and file of the American army chaplains in foreign service. It is of interest to recall that the Young Men's Christian Association, with splendid initiative, went ahead immediately upon the proclaiming of our entry into the war to recruit its personnel for foreign service. While military red tape was being unwound finally to allow the enlisting of chaplains, the "Y" secured the pick of the mature ministry and the experienced laymen of the American churches for its overseas secretaries.

The great mass of the younger ministers, men of military age, who enlisted as chaplains, speedily adjusted themselves to the new and exacting duties of a calling which had few precedents, but whose obligations knew no limits. We have had pictured to us in graphic stories and in cartoon the bewilderment of the average doughboy in the unfamiliar surroundings of military life. But who has written the epic tale of the young parson, thrust into uniform, to wrestle with the unfamiliar exactions of military etiquette, working out his own salvation and winning for himself an honored place in the economy of an organization that has no mercy for incompetents and small praise even for respectable mediocrity.

The war was no Sunday school picnic. The young theologue in O. D. must have had some decided misgivings as he first edged into the group at the officers' mess wondering whether he would be taken in by the self-important young shavetails and the cynical older officers who eyed the silver cross on his collar and wondered how on earth a parson was going to fit into their scheme of things. But adjustments were soon made and most of the fledgling "padres" made good, not only with the officers, but with the enlisted men, not all of whom by any means were of that "hard-boiled" type which adorns the pages of recent war fiction.

The Disciples of Christ furnished an even hundred chaplains for the army. All but thirty-three of these had been discharged by September 1, 1919, and probably not a third of these remain now. Besides Chaplain Priest, already mentioned, who died from wounds received in action, two other of our chaplains were wounded, Miles E. Hoon, on November 1, 1918, and Harry F. MacLane on September 29, October 7 and November 1, 1918, the three entries on the casualty list indicating that Chaplain MacLane had a persistent habit of keeping close to the fireworks.

Three distinguished service crosses were awarded to our "fighting parsons." The posthumous award to Charles D. Priest was recorded in General Orders for March 11, 1919. O. J. Cohee was cited in General Orders for March 8, 1919, and Captain Winfred E. Robb, for bravery in the campaign on the River Ourq, was cited November 11, 1919.

A search of the records in the office of the adjutant-General, made by Edward B. Bagby, of the Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains of the Disciples of Christ, revealed the following names of chaplains reported as especially commended by their commanding officers: Joel R. Benjamin, "A fine chaplain"; Claude M. Finnell, William L. Fisher, Charles Henry Frick, Fernando H. Groom, Percy M. Kendall, "Gives evidence of marked ability and adaptability"; Edward E. Lane, Robert C. Lehmon, "An interested worker for welfare"; James Henry McCallum, "Excellent man"; Edward S. Priest, "Has done very efficient work, always pleasing and congenial"; Harvey F. Risse, Walter Lee Thompson, Frank B. Ward, "Excellent chaplain"; Gladstone H. Youell.

The recruiting of the two thousand or more chaplains needed for the war emergency in the American army was no easy task. It was made possible on the part of the Protestant churches by the splendid work of the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, constituted by the Federal Council and the General War-Time Commission of the Churches. Through its office at Washington over seven thousand applications were investigated and about one-third of this number were recommended to the War Department, which granted more than one thousand commissions to chaplains from the Protestant bodies thus represented. Legislation to increase the number of chaplains in the army was secured through the efforts of the committee in arousing the public sentiment that brought the necessary pressure to bear upon Congress. The committee also was influential in the matter of securing the establishment of a training school for chaplains which did such splendid work at Camp Zachary Taylor. The same idea was carried out also by Bishop Brent in his training school for the overseas chaplains in France.

Our own representatives on the General Committee were Edward B. Bagby and George A. Miller of Washington and Peter Ainslie of Baltimore. It was largely through their co-operation with the General Committee that the Disciples had for the first time a full proportionate representation of chaplains.

The experience of the American Expeditionary Force has demonstrated beyond a question that the corps organization for the chaplains makes for the efficiency of the service. General Pershing has testified to this in his statement that "under the efficient leadership of Bishop Brent and his assistants a strong organization was developed which assured the most effective individual effort, and also the proper correlation of the work of all." It is now proposed to carry out this same idea, giving the chaplains who are to serve our new army a form of organization which will promote the efficiency of their work and have some central, authoritative body responsible for their welfare. We cannot afford to appoint a man to the spiritual oversight of our soldiers and then cut him adrift to shift for himself. In the corps, with its directing body, the chaplains in isolated posts will be kept in frequent touch with experienced men who will inspect and criticise their work and make helpful suggestions. They will be brought together in occasional schools of methods and in every way the welfare of the service will be promoted through expert advice and management. Our churches should follow up the action of the Cincinnati convention and insist upon it that the bill now before Congress, providing for a chaplains' corps, be passed at the present session.

There is no wealth but life; Life, including all the powers of love, of joy, and of admiration. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings; that man is richest who, having perfected the functions of his own life to the utmost, has also the widest helpful influence, both personal and by means of his possessions, over the lives of others.—John Ruskin.

Little Journeys in the Land of Tomorrow

By DR. PAUL STEVENSON

A TRIP through China, although devoid of many of the thrills of former pioneer days, is still filled with countless items of interest. Like a pilgrim setting out on a long anticipated pilgrimage to a sacred shrine, I was recently able to make an excursion into the interior of this great country, where I saw for the first time that particular part of the country that is to be our future home and the scene of our humble life's work for the Master. Twice before had I attempted to start out on my journey to Luchowfu. Once my plans were interrupted by the ever existing uncertainty of travel which characterizes China in these days of transition from stability of the old empire to the still hoped for republic, and I was compelled to give way to a local quarrel between some of the irresponsible generals whose armies are in reality but bands of brigands, plundering and pillaging the country and making the roads impassable for travelers. A few weeks later I was compelled to abandon my plans for a second time, this time because of the arrival of the plague in Nanking. For months we had been praying that the plague that was ravaging the country to the north of us would not come nigh unto our city, but at last it came. Fortunately the warmer weather rendered the disease more or less self-limiting by the time it arrived in Nanking and after a few weeks of strict watchfulness and isolation of contact cases, we escaped with a relatively small number of deaths. At last with no plague to prevent my leaving the city and with only the faintest rumors of a band of brigands still operating in the country two or three days ahead, I started on my way.

One of the outstanding features of interest on a trip of any considerable length in China is the variety of conveyances used in the different stages of the journey. Early one morning I loaded myself and my baggage into a large antiquated and dilapidated foreign carriage drawn by a diminutive white Chinese pony. This is the acme of Nanking style. If I had been riding down Fifth avenue in a Packard limousine I could not, comparatively speaking, have been more in style or relative comfort. The fact that this same carriage might a few minutes before have been the means of hauling a dead donkey to the butcher was not allowed to bother me any more than the fact that the last human occupant might have had smallpox, which is so prevalent at this time of the year. Why worry? Contrary to expectation and custom, all four wheels and the bottom of my carriage remained in their respective places until we reached the end of the four-mile journey to the boat landing, and with great relief I got out and stretched before boarding the steamer for Wuhu.

The Yangtze river at Nanking is broad and deep, and the steamers that ply back and forth are large and comfortable. Ocean steamers can navigate to Wuhu and load with rice, or even on to Hankow, where some of the largest iron and steel mills of the world are located. Although not as long, the Yangtze on account of its width and depth gives the impression of being greater than our own Mississippi.

The transition from my dilapidated carriage to the Japanese steamer that I found waiting at the dock was as from the ridiculous to the sublime. The style and comfort of my late equipage had been only relative; this of the steamer was indeed real. Inasmuch as I was to be on the boat but a few hours I had taken Chinese passage at a great saving of money but a considerable expenditure of nervous energy. Here I was for the first time alone among these celestials with their heathenish language. I had been in language school for several months; had even been told that I already spoke Chinese like a native (of Illinois), but this strange talk around me seemed to be the original confusion of tongues. As breakfast time drew near I thought that of the two alternatives, one of eating a breakfast of Chinese food, Chinese style, ordered in Chinese, and the other, starving until I arrived in Wuhu in the afternoon, I could do the latter with more success. It is hard to reason with hunger and I soon found my natural fear of the possible results of poorly cooked food as well as my unnatural but acquired professional respect for trematodes, cestodes, entameba hystolytica and the like slowly giving way to the desire for food. It was while casting about in my mind and trying to decide between sea slugs, eels, duck's duodenums, and ancient (hundred day) eggs that I suddenly became aware of a foreign face looking out of the door of one of the cabins. Seeing me and evidently appreciating my difficulty, the owner of this face stepped out and with a fraternal spirit that binds all foreigners together in this far-off land, invited me to share the breakfast that he and his wife were about to eat in their cabin. Would I accept? As I look back now upon the incident it seems to me that I did. My surprise and pleasure were beyond words when this couple introduced themselves as Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Plopper of our own mission. I had expected to spend the night at their home in Wuhu, but did not dream of meeting them on the boat. In their company the hours passed quickly and before we realized it the late afternoon found us in Wuhu.

Wuhu is one of the richest cities in the Yangtze valley. Its great wealth has also made it one of the most wicked cities in all China. It is not my intention to describe in detail the work in this place of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Paul, the Ploppers, Miss Dale and Miss Gray as they handle the school, evangelistic, and women's work respectively. Suffice it to say that as I passed through the reading room, which was filled to capacity by the very finest young men, and looked into the classrooms in which night school classes were in session at the time of our visit, and sat in the prayer meeting room, which was comfortably filled with clean Christian men in spite of the bad, rainy night, I could not but express my conviction that of all our stations that I had so far seen this was certainly one of the most efficient and gave very definite evidence of tangible results in the execution of our Master's great commission. I left Wuhu with an inward assurance of the ultimate victory that is to be our Lord's among this great awakening people.

It rained all night. A rather prosaic and commonplace occurrence unless you happened to be planning a trip inland on a dirty little houseboat, wet and foul even on a nice, bright day. Very early the next morning I went down to the river, anxious to see for the first time one of these towboats that are destined to become a very familiar mode of travel to this young medical missionary. Even though I had risen before daylight and it was barely light at the time that I arrived, still I found the boat crowded beyond description. The whole boat seemed to be one mass of humanity, swarming on it and over it like bees on their hive. In spite of the strong protest of my olfactory nerve I climbed on and edged my way along a narrow ledge that served as a deck. Finally arriving at a designated place, I turned around and backed down into a dark hole that had been pointed out to me as my "stateroom." The only opening into the place in which I found myself was the hole through which I had entered, and that was immediately and completely obstructed by many Chinese heads and twice as many eyes, all bulging with curiosity to see this "foreigner" at close range. As my eyes were slowly becoming accustomed to the subdued light, and my nose to the unsubdued smells, I began to make a survey of my cabin.

The room was practically a cube, about six or eight feet on a side. Approximately two-thirds of the room was below the level of the deck outside. The only standing room was in a very narrow space between the two wide shelves that projected from either side and served as bunks. I thought at first that it was a rather uninteresting interior. I was soon to discover, however, the hidden possibilities of the place. The first discovery that greeted my exploring eyes was a series of little streamlets of water merrily trickling down through the ceiling. As I moved from place to place in order to interfere as little as possible with the merry trickling of these streamlets, I discovered quite accidentally that the floor was composed of movable boards, thus forming an easy and rapid means of exit from the cabin into the space below. The ease with which I made this last discovery quite surprised me, and, although the sudden and unexpected nature of my descent precluded a very careful scrutiny of the space below my cabin floor, I nevertheless made a mental note of the fact that the mud and water covering the bottom of the boat reached to about two inches over my left shoe-top. These interesting observations, all made in such rapid succession and with no effort at all on my part, emphasized the oft-repeated statement that life in China is anything but dull.

Having returned to my cabin, I selected the shelf upon which the least water was dripping at the time. I spread out my bedding and prepared to make myself as comfortable as possible, and at the same time hold myself in readiness to make new discoveries. First, I tried to read. For some reason or other I was unable to concentrate my mind, so I soon gave it up and took out the small portable typewriter that I happened to have along. For the same reason I soon gave up typewriting. I finally attributed the cause of my failures to the audience before me. So irresistibly did they attract and hold my attention, that I soon gave up all else and just sat looking at the faces at my little door.

From the first, the Chinese people either repel or attract you. Long ago I noticed that the foreigners in China either really loved the Chinese and enjoyed the life among them, or despised them and endured for a season their necessary contact with them. Happily it seems that foreigners of the latter type are greatly in the minority, although unfortunately there is to be found among them here and there a missionary. As I sat and studied the faces at my little door I was compelled to acknowledge an unusually strong attraction for them, an attraction that continues to grow as my days among them increase.

Looking into a Chinese face might be likened to peering into a great jungle or thicket, alive with interest, filled with surprises at every turn, inviting and alluring you into its very depths, and yet defying and successfully baffling your efforts to thoroughly conquer and explore. The puzzle with which you begin is the puzzle with which you end. That is one reason that I never tire of the study of the Chinese face. The first thing that impresses you about the Chinese face is how different it really is from your preconceived idea concerning it. The two words, "slant eyes," to most people epitomize their conception of the Chinese people, and yet I have seen very, very few eyes among them that slant any more than do our own. The typical Chinese eye differs from ours in that it is not set as deeply in its socket and therefore is much more prominent. One only has to try to fit glasses to their eyes to have this difference brought to his attention. But the thing that impressed itself upon my mind about their eyes on this trip as it had never done before was the fact that practically three out of every four were infected and many blind. Although warned by statistics, I have never yet been able to face calmly the startling prevalence of diseased eyes in this country. The fact that the correction of this and other conditions among the masses must wait upon the slow process of education and the adoption of a higher plane of existence would be most discouraging if visible though slow progress were not seen in this direction. The blindness of these eyes is but an indication of the deeper blindness in the minds as well as the souls of this great people. The Master once said, "If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness?" In China it is the inner light that is dark; and how great is that darkness? How long are they yet to wait for that Life that shall be their Light?

Passing from the physical features you find even more of interest in the expressions on the Chinese face. There are two dominant impressions that have been made upon me as I have time and time again studied their facial expressions. In the first place, one does not have to study these faces very long to understand the oft-repeated statement that the Chinese are a contented people. The beggar women in their tubs, rowing out to the side of the boat whenever we stop, and pushing their baskets on the ends of long bamboo poles up into your face, are contented and smiling in spite of the rags, sores, filth and the other regalia of their calling. The rustics huddled together on the flat roof above me are singing and gambling with utter abandon, though unsheltered from the drizzling rain. The men and boys walking the tow-path on the dike, pulling the heavily loaded rice boats down to Wuhu are jovial and joking, content with their lot as beasts of burden. The rich man in his silks, scrambling out of his cabin next to mine and stopping five or ten minutes, adds his face to those already at my little door. He gazes with the same open, childish gaze, though I imagine that I can see a carefully veiled expression of condescension and tolerance toward all things foreign, but above all, every face seems to be a contented face, and it is this contentment, stoically enduring famine, pestilence and floods, indifferent to new or easier ways, suspicious of any instrument or method that does not have the sanction of centuries of usage, that constitutes one of the greatest obstacles to progress among the masses.

The second characteristic that finds almost universal reflection in the Chinese face is that of childishness. Their curious, all inclusive gaze and their intense interest in the most minute detail of my clothes and luggage, the absolute wonder with which they watched me open up a small portable typewriter and cover sheets of paper with strange looking characters, their amusement and laughter at my strange method of eating my still stranger food, their freely voiced arguments and speculations concerning me and my things, all emphasize the childishness of these people. And what is true of these people individually is also true of them collectively. The Chinese nation of today is a childish nation. When one stops to consider that China was an old nation and possessed a mature civilization at the time when our own ancestors were living in caves, killing the wild beasts with clubs, and then eating them raw because they knew not how to cook their food, he finds himself speculating as to whether this might not be China's second rather than her first childhood. Some less optimistic do indeed consider it so, and there are many of little faith and still smaller vision who imagine that we are now witnessing the last feeble pulsations of the life of a great nation, dying of senility. But to him who seeks to look through the Master's eyes, and who is willing to contemplate the potentialities of lives in contact with the living God, this very childishness is the basis of great hope for the new nation that is yet to be. The childishness of the China of today is nature's promise of a stronger, steadier, and wiser China of tomorrow.

So engrossed had I become in the contemplation of the faces at my little door that the second day had passed almost before I knew it. In spite of the constant rain, I had crawled out of my cabin several times to get a glimpse of the country through which we were passing. A beautiful country! Up over the dikes on either side spread miles and miles of fertile rice fields. At intervals along the bank were small villages, often built around an old imperial granary where the tribute grain used to be stored. Along late in the afternoon the flat river plain gave way to hills among which our stream wound and wound like a silver ribbon. These hills are merely the foothills of quite a little range of mountains that makes this particular part of the country noted for its beauty. The rain had stopped, and a weak, apologizing sun had crept out. Little by little the hills began to rise higher and higher as if to catch the last rays of the setting sun, and in a little while darkness had quickly settled over a scene the equal of which I could not remember, not even in my own native land.

We were scheduled to arrive in Chaohsien a little after dark. From here on my mode of travel would be uncertain. A small sailboat, taking anywhere from a day and a half to seven days, a chair carried by four men and taking about two days, a horse, a wheelbarrow, or my own legs—all these were possibilities. My present abode became now a stateroom, indeed, in comparison to the uncertainties of a strange Chinese city. In this city lived a medical missionary to whom I had written, but I had not been able to give him the exact date of my visit and I hardly expected him to meet me. All sorts of doubts arose in my mind. Further, it came to my mind that this was the first day that I had passed entirely out of sound of the English language. I began to long for the sound of an English word. Several months before I had laughed at a sign over a door which said, "We speak English, and can understand American," and now I began to yearn for someone who could understand my "American." As soon as we had made the landing, however, all my doubts were dispelled by a foreign face with a hearty smile of welcome, a welcome that only one who lives in an inland station knows how to give and only one who is traveling through a strange country knows how to appreciate. A good supper and a hot bath were adequate preliminaries to a sound sleep and even the wildest of my tired dreams did not warn me of the events of the next two days.

The bridges of China are most remarkable. They have stood for centuries, held not by cement, for there is none used in their construction, but merely by the skill with which the stones were shaped and placed one upon another.

How Can the Church Reach the Lumberjack?

By E. BIGELOW THOMPSON

(Mr. Thompson, now identified with the Interchurch World Movement, has worked in the most primitive lumber camps and lived the rough life he describes.)

DESPITE his bearish habits—and surroundings—the jack has a religion. Those who have traveled through the northern forests know his hospitality—the meal and the bed overnight and no questions asked. They know, too, that this man of the forest simply does not understand the ways of the city man, nor the city religion. Really, he is just a lusty youngster. His romping at night in the bunkhouse is horseplay similar to the pranks of the boy released from restraint in recess at school.

The Interchurch survey reveals living conditions in the woods and logging camps and all data on the well-being of the man who signs up for the winter. It also includes information on the jack's employer. Its most important phase is to put the finger on the religious pulse of the jack, to find out what he believes, what his spiritual needs are.

The lumber districts have been divided into three areas, Pacific, South Central, and South Atlantic. In the Pacific section are included the states of Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, and Montana; the South Central section covers Southeast Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, and the South Atlantic takes in Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, and North and South Carolina. From these areas the lumber industry, in a normal year, turns out more than forty billion board feet of lumber.

The task of the Interchurch surveyor is not an easy one. By his nature and life in the woods the jack is a solitary chap, slow to mix with "outsiders." Labor troubles in recent months have made him suspicious. Experiences in the little towns on the fringe of the woods have made him distrustful of his city brother. The Church, to date, has meant little in his life and now that he has joined organizations which really are exploiting him, he has an added suspicion of any organization or institution which promises "uplift."

Like the man of the Western plains, he is a silent man; he does not ask questions of his bunkmate. Many of the men are listed on the pay sheets only by a first name. Hence the jack is difficult of approach for information.

But there's a romance in the woods. Follow the surveyor on a trip. He makes his way into the forest. It is supper time, really late afternoon. With the camp foreman he enters the cook shack, a one-room, dingy log hut. The table napery is oilcloth, scarred by slips of knife and fork. There enters with much noise of feet a chain of men, big men, whose eyes look down, not ahead. They take places at the table.

Then comes a surprise. There is no conversation other than, "Pass me that," "Gimme some beans," and similar demands. The surveyor learns here, often after he has been pointedly told so by the cook, long knife in hand, that "one comes to the table to eat, not talk." He eats what is set before him in tins.

Dinner bolted—and remarkable are the feats some of these men perform with fork and knife—the men troop noisily to the bunkhouses and light pipes. Should the surveyor penetrate this cabin he may literally be overcome by the absence of fresh air. The men seem to get all the air they want working outdoors by day. They avoid it by night. The churchman's nose would tell him, too, that the men smoke "men's" tobacco, and scores of damp socks hanging on wires stretched from the rafters add to the stench.

Day after day this routine holds. The men work, eat, sleep—a drear existence, punctuated by trips to towns on the edge of the forest. It is to learn how the Church can make this life less drear that the Interchurch survey is being made. Many of the reports coming from the logging camps are appeals that touch the heart. There is a great deal to be done by the Church in this field and these men can be reached.

In some places an effort is being made to give them some form of entertainment for the long evenings, to give them books, to have men go into the woods and tell them of right living.

But here comes the point which makes the survey so difficult. There is a standing prejudice against ministers. The remarks of the jacks on ministers they have met are classics of picturesque expression. When visiting pastors were suggested in several camps there was an instant suspicion that this was only one more trick to get a dollar from the jack.

From another camp came a voice supporting the pastor. This jack was most outspoken in his sympathy for the men who come into the woods to serve the lumbermen, especially on the average ministerial salary.

One Oregon jack welcomed the coming of a local church for a rather unusual reason. "We are glad the church is coming here," he said. "There's a bootlegger around that we can't find. We think the church will be able to."

The surveyor will have to feel his way among the jacks. He will have to take into consideration this boy-mentality in the man-body. He will have to understand how these big rough men can play "Hawkie fly in, Birdie fly out" Saturday nights in the bunkhouse and revel in a winter dance on the rough board floor. The dancers at these gatherings wear their calked shoes and those selected to be "ladies" are made charming by their hats of wool stockings with a sprig of pine trimming, wind-tanned faces and heavy beards notwithstanding.

He will have to understand, too, that the jack likes to argue and that when he does read a paper, often weeks old, he remembers what he reads. All these things must be taken into consideration before recommendations can be made.

But with this army of workers in the United States, quite out of touch with the Church, something must be done, to spread the Word in these camps.

This make-up of the jack, his remoteness from the outside world, gives him what is necessarily a simple and uncomplicated religious sense. There's not one of them, Swede, Dane, Russian, Pole, Latin or Irishman, who has lived since boyhood in the woods, who doesn't have a bit of the fear in him which characterized the early nature worshiper; in many, the admiration and the mental calmness which comes from living close to big things and the silence of the forest.

The work the missionaries have done in India exceeds in importance all that has been done by the British government in India since its commencement. I ask myself what has been the most potent influence which has been working among the people since annexation fifty-four years ago? And to that question I feel there is but one answer—Christianity, as set forth in the lives and teachings of the missionaries.—Sir William Hunter.

The Imminent Demand of the Churches upon the Colleges and Universities of North America

By DR. JAMES ENDICOTT, Toronto, Canada

(Delivered at the Student Volunteer Convention, Des Moines, Iowa)

THE Church of God has always made great demands upon the youth and always will make great demands upon believing youth. We can say at least this morning, with regard to Canada, that the Canadian churches, after our wonderful and unexpected experience in this war, are facing the future with the settled purpose that we will not limit in any single particular our claims upon the life service of the young women and the young men of our country because of any sacrifices which have been made in the war.

We are going forward to the future with an absolutely unlimited program. We believe that it is our business and our right to assume our fair proportion of all the burdens which now rest upon universal Christianity. We believe, moreover, that this is a day of special obligation for Anglo-Saxon Christendom. We believe that in the days to come, please God, there may arise great multitudes of students, say in Russia or in China, or in Japan or in Africa, to lead the great movements of God in the after days. But we think we see very clearly today, that if there is to be an advance in the immediate future, the men and women who are to lead the advance must necessarily come mainly from the Anglo-Saxon Christian churches. It is not that we believe that we are better than other men, but we believe that there has been a providence shaping our ends and bringing us to this day of tremendous crisis in the world, and that if we fail, then we shall look in vain to any other part of the earth for the kind of men and women who can do the work which the world so sorely needs to have done today.

Now, we are not under any delusions with regard to our strength in Canada, but we believe this, that any estimates we may have made in the past are altogether too low, that there are resources of character, of mind, of body; resources of courage, of faith, of vision, which have not yet been drawn upon. I say then we are going into the future with the expectation of speaking home to the consciences of the living men in our universities and colleges especially, and asking them that they will go forward to the great work which the churches desire to do. But in any event, no matter how large the contribution, no matter how we shall speak home to the consciences of the young men of today, we shall not ask of them any more than the Church fifty years ago asked of her sons and daughters in that great land of Canada.

Canada shows us on a large scale in many ways the romance of building up a great and noble world order. If you take out the work of the churches in Canada, you impoverish in a peculiar sense her history, for, in brief, this is the story: It goes back to those heroic days when men from France wended their way up in the old sailing ships, up the great St. Lawrence river. When the adventurers, the fur traders, the voyagers came, side by side with them, and often in advance of them, but always ready to take their share with them, came those heroic sons of the old Roman Catholic Church of Europe.

They have given us a great heritage. They have set us an example of heroism, of courage, of life devotion. And in later years, what a wonderful picture we have up there, that vast land in those days only fifty years ago, great forces with their corduroy roads, with their log cabins, poor people, with church unendowed, with a church without universities, with a church without churches, a great scattered people coming out from the old lands, bringing their faith, but not the organization, not the institutions by which that faith could be established, and it is a wonderful story, what the old heroes of the Canadian churches have done, how the saddle-back riders went forth as flaming heralds of a great gospel. They had no doubts in their hearts. A great faith, a great pity, a great purpose, my friends.

It was my privilege, some thirty years ago to go out to the far western plains, and there I saw the bones of the buffalo still scattered over those plains, and I had the inestimable privilege of meeting the old order of pioneer, men who could fire a rifle with deadly accuracy, who had brought down scores and hundreds of buffalo, but who had never shot an Indian, men who had loved the Indians, who had taken up their abode among them, men who were there establishing Christianity on virgin soil. I think of some of these men that I have met, of one man for example, in those days when Christianity was not taken for granted.

(We hear much in these days of Canada as a sober and a moderately righteous nation, but these things have not come by accident. They have been won for us. They have been fought for.)

When he got off the train, a body of cowboys and gamblers were the first to speak to him, and they said, "We understand what you have come for. We give you forty-eight hours to get out of the city." They wanted a few hundred square miles where the Ten Commandments didn't obtain, and that man stood there under the clear sky, without a church, without any support of organized Christianity, and in the name of God he spoke to them. Ah! What a gentle heart he had, and a fist like a sledge. Oh, bless you, he could bring down an ox, that man, and this is what he said in his quiet, gentle way of speaking: "Gentlemen, my church, the Presbyterian church of Canada,"—he was a Highlander—"has sent me here to establish the Christian church, and on Sunday morning next, here where I am standing, we will have a service, and I invite you to come." Oh, he never left the place, and he established the gospel. And then one day the prize boxer of the town, who ran the saloon, came along, and he was driving along in his buggy and he said, "Mr. McKillam, what is this I hear you have been saying about me?" And he said, "Archie, what did ye hear?" He said, "I hear that you said that my place was the gate of Hell."

"And, Archie, isn't it true?"

He said, "If it wasn't for your coat, I would get out of my rig and give you a thrashing." "Archie, don't let the coat trouble you, I will take it off."

Ah, my friends, by such men as these we live today in Canada by the faith and the love and the endurance and the fighting qualities of the saints of God. That is why today we have men ride across our plains, and wherever they go they have established churches, built schools, put up universities, great seats of learning. We haven't drawn a cent in many, many years from Europe, and we never come down here with a collection plate, this great hunting ground of the distressed.

We have our pioneers today right up into the Arctic Circle, camping out there on the Hudson Bay. We have them going up to Labrador. We have them going up the Pacific Coast, and wherever they go they never retreat. They hold the ground for the Kingdom of God. So then, young men of Canada, and you young men of the United States, take my word for it, that if you will investigate, you will find that heroism has not been waiting until now to be discovered, or to be manifested. You have a big job ahead of you, if you live up to the glorious conditions which great and good men and women have set us in other days.

I have another reason for thinking that we shall not call upon our youth in vain in Canada. I am not going to speak of the war as such. I am not going to speak of what happened in France and Flanders, but there are things which have happened in Canada five years ago, and they lasted no longer—the things I am thinking about—than this one convention will last. What a wonderful thing happened up in Canada, a religious thing! Now mark it. Don't forget this, that up to five years ago, we Canadian folk had no Valley Forge in our history. We had no Gettysburg in our history. I wonder, I wonder if there are any pilgrim souls here belonging to the United States who still go back to those old places to kindle afresh in your hearts something like lofty and religious patriotism. Well, I confess myself, my friends, a pilgrim at your shrines. I shall never forget the days I have spent on these old battlefields of yours and mine. Down there where my countrymen got a taste of what was coming to them, I remember the day I spent down at Saratoga. I came away with a bullet, not in me, gentlemen, but safely in the pocket. But I shall never forget, and I wonder if you all go there. In a sense you have no right here until you go to those places. The vision of that empty niche, for example, where a good man might have been remembered had he not been a traitor later.

I think of the day I spent at Valley Forge. I think of my ride down by old Boston, where Paul Revere rode on that wonderful night. I have lit my lamp too at your shrines and stood uncovered before the old Liberty Bell in Philadelphia. But up to five years ago, we Canadian people had no similar experiences in our history. You say we had Quebec. That is true but Quebec did not belong to us except by inheritance. We were spectators, in a sense, of that. Quebec! Why we always link that name up with Trafalgar and Egypt and the Battle of the Nile, and a few things like that, when France and old England were fighting out on that colossal scale the drama of the mighty centuries.

No, that didn't really belong to us, but a day came five years ago which will never be sufficiently appreciated, which will never be even understood by a man who is irreligious. I know there were men who came from the swine troughs at the call of the mother land. I know there were men haunted with bad pasts who said, "Let us go at least and endeavor to make amends for a misspent life," but the thing that I am thinking about is the thing that happened in our pulpits and in our parsonages and manses. Oh, you young men, can you imagine what happened there? Because it came upon us all of a sudden, like a bolt out of the blue, and this is what happened: Fathers stood with their sons, not thinking of victory, not thinking of extending the empire—we had nothing of that in our system, we hadn't anything of that in our hearts. We did not believe in the supposed evil plans of Germany even. We were a simple folk. But this is what we did, instinctively. A great light seemed to smite the consciences of our people, and we for hours and hours watched the bulletins for fear, if you please, that Edward Gray would make a mistake, that England would fail, that she lacked courage, that she would not enter that wide open pathway to honor. And then what happened? Oh, my friends, I am not talking about the pool rooms, but the churches. How our young men's classes walked out! There was no draft, no compulsion, and in hundreds of square miles, this is the thing to notice, that there were hundreds of parsonages with not a single young man left in them, hundreds of square miles where that was the rule. Our churches emptied themselves. Our parsonages emptied themselves; the sons of our foreign missionaries same forward; our universities emptied themselves.

That is the story that comes to me today as I think of the future. If we could do these things (and thank God we did them), if in that spirit, the soul of Canada leaped to its great task, walked out into her Gethsemane and did the things she knew she ought to do, what is the need of wondering whether we can get men to work in the days that are to be?

Ah, this is the feeling that we have today, that we are not to ask exemption because we have made great sacrifices. No, I say to you young men, if you were a little orphan today, where would you go to be mothered? Would you go to a woman with a poodle dog in her arms? Would you go to the mother with one or two little children? I would not. I would seek me out a mother with ten children. I would go to the mother who was distracted and burdened and weighed down, for one little extra orphan will not make much difference to her big heart. The worst thing you can do for England today is to let her off. The worst thing you can say to England today is, "You are weary, you are tired, you have made great sacrifices." That is not the road of the Kingdom, and we are not going to take that road, please God, in Canada. It was not when Christ was rich that he saved the world, but he became poor that we, through his poverty, might be made rich.

And so, young men and women of my beloved land, and of this great Republic, make no mistake. You in the United States, with your larger responsibilities of manhood, with your greater numbers and your greater wealth, there is a great need for you to meet, but wherever you go, please God, you shall find the Canadians all about you doing their share too.

The Best Seller

The American Bible Society reports the biggest year in history for the Bible.

In 1918 over 35,000,000 Bibles were sold and distributed in the United States and the 1919 circulation will exceed that number.

A Bible can be bought for 25 cents. We know no better bargain. In its three or four thousandth year it is still the most popular book.

When we were a boy we lived in a house with a wonderful old attic in which were stored old toys and old books and old letters. And though we had explored the place time and again, we were always surprising ourself by finding some forgotten thing. So that the old attic seemed always new to us.

Thus, the other day a friend of ours, wandering through his Bible, discovered a rich treasure of wisdom in Ecclesiastes. Like the boy, searching among the treasures of the old attic, he had overlooked it in previous explorations.

Suppose you treat yourself to a chapter of Ecclesiastes before you go to bed tonight. It's greatly worth your while. —Des Moines News.

Efficiency in the Care of Dependent Children

THE present age is requiring efficiency in almost every line of human activity. In the business world, the leading organizations are holding themselves rigidly to a standard of efficiency in every department. The spirit of the age has not neglected the charitable societies. We have reached the day in this work when experts are called in from the outside to study the methods, the expenditures, the results of charitable organizations, in order to determine the educational, social, moral and economic value to the community.

The human contact being a very vital part of the successful method, the observer, in studying the institution and organization, looks particularly to see that it is present and judges of the efficiency accordingly. The critical scientific method is the one that should prevail. While the emotions should be engaged in all charitable work, it is decidedly unfair and unwise to inaugurate or carry it on in an emotional way. It is no longer considered unkind to question the efficiency of a charitable institution. Every institution should set for itself a certain standard whereby it may be judged and by following which it may attain to the highest degree of efficiency in its chosen work. No institution should be without a fixed idea and should know just what it wants to accomplish. If the organization is caring for children, it must determine what classes and ages of children are to be selected and how that particular group should be cared for. The object of the organization having been determined there should be an adequacy of means for the accomplishment of the desired results.

Granting that the organization has selected as its beneficiaries dependent normal children, what is the special element in life which these children need? Because they are normal, their chief needs would seem to be a home and a school. Opinions as to the best methods to satisfy the needs vary. In this work of conserving the child, the adjusting of any good system to fit the needs of the child, not the survival of a particular system should be considered. It is a difficult problem to develop individuality when the population of an institution numbers into the hundreds. This difficulty has been met by the establishing of a cottage system. The smaller institutions on the congregational plan are the ones to which we must appeal to give the children in their care that freedom of thought, of expression and action which is essential to childhood. Having accepted a child as one's ward nothing must be left undone to assure it a happy and better directed life than it would have received in its old environment. There should be a standard of efficiency for material equipment as follows:

(a) At least 350 cubic feet of space should be allotted to each child for dormitories. All beds should be single. Not more than fifteen to a dormitory.

(b) Proper bathing facilities should be installed and children should have their clothing changed each day, or as often as is necessary.

(c) All children should have individual brushes, combs, towels, wash cloths, and tooth brushes.

A standard of efficiency in the selection of beneficiaries. It is always wise to conserve the interest of the family group when possible. One method by which this can be done is by introducing vocational training and giving the parents employment in the institution with their children. In cases where it is judged best to separate the child from the parent, financial contributions should be made by the parents for the care of their children. Parents should not be assisted in escaping the material responsibility of their children.

Adequate records must be kept. One of the first things to learn when considering an application is whether other charitable agencies are or have been dealing with the family. This information can be either secured directly from the applicant or through a central registration bureau. Full reports should be obtained at once from any other agency knowing the family. This makes reinvestigation unnecessary or very simple.

Legal residence of the applicant is an important factor. Each locality should be held legally responsible for its own dependents and families should not be encouraged to migrate for the purpose of finding easy charitable support.

The institution must have the exact age of each child; the date of birth, in order to comply with the laws governing school attendance and factory employment. Apart

Young America in Action

Under the careful Christian supervision of the Church homes the children lead a happy life. What a contrast to the group on the opposite page.

"Please Play Just One More Piece"

from the legal side, the institution that fails to observe birthdays is losing an opportunity to strengthen the personal touch between the management and the children. In an institution which I have in mind each child looks forward to the celebration of its birthday.

When a child is admitted to an institution a medical examination should be most thorough. Even then no child should be admitted to the family circle without having spent ten days in the detention annex under observation. I have in mind an institution that takes the temperature of each child before starting them out to school in the morning.

How should records be kept? The better plan is the vertical filing system with a folder or envelope for each child. On the printed history card, preferably eight by eleven inches in size, should be answered the more important questions about the applicant. All additional information, reports of visits, letters received, copies of letters sent, medical examinations, school reports, etc., should be kept on the back of this card. It is conceded that in small institutions, the alphabetical method of filing is probably the better. Every institution should keep a careful physical record of each child. If any are found to be under weight for their age they should receive special attention and special diet. In addition to the daily visit of the doctor in charge, children should have the services of oculists, dentists and neurologists.

The aim of every institution is that each child should grow up to be a part of the peaceful and industrial community. The institution is fortunate when located within the district covered by the public schools where the children should attend. Institutional children need to be better equipped than the average boy and girl. Their various activities should be directed with a view of determining in what particular direction each child might best be developed. This auxiliary training may be provided in most satisfactory way in many lines by volunteer workers of the various churches, especially if the institution is located in the city. The workers all conduct embroidery classes, fancy work and plain sewing classes for girls.

It is possible to interest friends in a community in the social life of the institution and obtain their services in conducting and directing work. For example, several young ladies from the various Sunday school classes are selected each month to act as hostesses at the birthday parties. They bring in outside interests and in this way the children form new acquaintances and gain the knowledge of conducting themselves properly when among other people. Vacations spent in family homes are most helpful in the development of the child. This can be done through co-operation of the various churches in the county, the pastor together with his corps of assistants in each community being responsible for the homes selected for the children. Sometimes a representative from the institution may visit in the same county during the stay of the children. The best homes are always open to the children and many times the winning personality of the child secures for it a permanent home. The trinity of happy, useful childhood is food, play and work. Indoor play rooms should be provided with plenty of toys and games for amusement during inclement weather. Outdoor apparatus is necessary to physical development and should be provided.

Any system of education which neglects any part of the fourfold nature of a child's education is incomplete. Religious instruction should be as clear and intelligent to the child as instruction in any particular study of the school curriculum. The most modern way of teaching today is teaching objectively and correlatively; mechanically memorizing the truths of the Scriptures amounts to little. It is when these truths are applied to some act or incident in the life of the child that they ought to be memorized. Then the task becomes a pleasure, and the knowledge a part of the child himself. There is nothing more important in institutional life than the moral development of the people employed in the institution. If the employes are in sympathy with the ideas of the institution much can be accomplished in training children. But, above all other tasks, this is one that especially needs trained and capable men and women. There must be a native endowment of gifts aside from a liberal education to fit one for such work. If your duty to the child has been faithfully and conscientiously discharged, no criticism can be made of institutions for the rearing and education of the child without the proper parental care.

How Long till Christian Union?

By H. C. ARMSTRONG

THE movement for the unity of the church goes steadily and irresistibly forward. The World Conference on Faith and Order is now in sight. Arrangements are made for a preliminary meeting at Geneva, Switzerland, August next. The Federal Council of Churches has just completed the most constructive year in its history and is stronger and greater than ever. Its Commission on Interchurch Federations, City and State, has organized some fifteen city federations during the year and now has federations with employed executives in nearly forty cities. It is most gratifying to note that of these secretaries nearly a dozen are Disciples. The Interchurch World Movement is developing daily with really wonderful rapidity and efficiency. Now comes the report from Australia of the launching of an Interchurch World Movement there. All of these movements and the vigor with which they are progressing indicate what "tides are running in the hearts of men."

Nevertheless those who advocate and work for Christian union have necessarily to think in terms of long programs and permanent financial foundations. Christian union is a consummation not to be realized in a day. We who live now will be like those worthy men and women of faith named in the eleventh of Hebrews and of whom it is written:

"These all died in the faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar."

So will it be with us. Christian unity is certain. It is God's purpose. It is the will of Christ. But like "the promises" it is "afar." We "greet" it by faith. In the words of Thomas Campbell:

"It is our consolation, in the meantime, that the desired event, as certain as it will be happy and glorious, admits of no dispute, however we may hesitate or differ about the proper methods of promoting it."

Preparation must be made for long years of testimony and labor. Provision must be made for the next generation to take up the task where we lay it down.

To this end larger permanent endowments must be created to provide for an uninterrupted program for the promotion of this supreme cause through the years. Educational and benevolent movements of many kinds are now being made possible and are being carried forward by great permanent financial foundations. Certain of these movements are thus enabled to undertake and carry on vast and thorough programs of research and service which would be wholly impossible without the security and sufficiency of means afforded by permanent funds. The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity faces its stupendous task with no permanent funds whatever. Certain other religious movements which have for their purpose the publication and distribution of books and papers for the promotion of distinctive religious tenets which divide Christians have large endowments, but as yet no movement which has for its aim the distribution of literature and the carrying on of endeavors for the uniting of Christians has been provided for in this permanent and adequate way. Here the Disciples have the opportunity "to blaze a new trail." The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity should begin at once to build up an adequate permanent financial foundation. For the next five years $25,000 a year, at least, should be given for this purpose, in addition to the amount needed for the current prosecution of the work. This cause is absolutely supreme. The salvation of a lost and ruined world waits on it. Christians should give for it as conscientiously and earnestly as Jesus prayed for it.

The vast magnitude and vital importance of this task must not be underestimated. Nor must the mistake be made of supposing that union is "about to appear." A little while ago a contributor to one of the weekly journals made the statement that within the next two or three years some kind of union is sure to come. Possibly so, but the indications of the present time are quite to the contrary. Indeed there is nothing to indicate that real union is likely to come within the next twenty or thirty years. Doubtless there will be unions of kindred Christian bodies, between which the differences are not great. It ought to be expected that "denominational families" should be getting together in "family reunions," thus paving the way for the greater reunion of all. Indeed such unions should be fostered and encouraged. But great labors are to be wrought and great sacrifices are to be made before the great union comes. Literally millions of dollars will have to be raised and expended and literally thousands of consecrated lives will have to be invested in programs of education and cooperation if there is ever to be any real Christian union. The walls of denominationalism are deep and strong. The divisions of the church are of long standing and have to do with things exceedingly precious. Sectarianism has become second nature in all of us. The habit of separation has become so thoroughly wrought into our religious consciousness that it is now a normal religious instinct. Nothing less than the total re-education of all Christendom in every phase of religious faith and conduct will avail to remove the barriers and bring us together. Education, much more re-education, is a long, patient and costly program.

A recent writer was looking in the right direction when he said, "Christian unity cannot be forced through, nor fought through. It must be thought through." This is a true word indeed, but perhaps a truer word is that spoken by a minister at the Ohio Convention at Akron in comment on this statement. His comment was that Christian unity is not so much to be "thought through" as "worked through." That is by working together we may in time come together. This is indeed the one hopeful aspect of the whole problem at this time. We are learning to work together and there is so much for us to do together that we all have ample opportunity to make our contribution to the program of "working Christian union through."

Now of all this the point is that Christian union is a tremendous task requiring stupendous labors and stupendous sums of money. It is the supreme issue, and exceedingly urgent. It demands large permanent financial foundations as well as large volumes of current contributions. Moreover the principle holds in this as in every great cause that those who believe most and care most will have to give most and work most. And belief and faith are measured by gift and labor. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The Disciples of Christ believe fundamentally in the necessity and possibility of Christian union. They of all peoples are committed to it. For a hundred years the passion for it has characterized their whole life. It is but right and fair therefore, that the Disciples of all people should undertake most, give and sacrifice most for it now. The amount apportioned to this work through the united budget this year is $20,108.59. To fall below this amount would be nothing less than tragedy in this critical hour of the world's life. Certainly God expects every Disciple and every congregation to give, work, and pray for the union of the broken Church, "that the world may believe," and "believing, have life in His name."

A Missionary at Seventy

FRANK BAIRD, though more than three score and ten, is a missionary to China. "Uncle Frank" has been a lifelong Disciple of Christ. He has always been deeply interested in the extension of the Kingdom of Christ to the ends of the earth. In his old age he found himself dependent upon his daughter, Mrs. Edwin Marx. Mrs. Marx and her husband were deeply interested in foreign missions. The Foreign Society was in great need of a man and his wife for China. The young people were willing to go, but there was the question of a home and the care of the aged father. Uncle Frank's heart responded to the cry of need from the Celestial Empire. He volunteered to go to one of our homes for the aged that these strong young people might go as their own and his representatives with the gospel to those who "lie in darkness." Arrangements were soon made for a home for the aged father in our Home for the Aged at Jacksonville, Illinois. His children are now in China. That he has the true missionary spirit is clearly evidenced by the following letter written to S. J. Corey:

"My dear brother: I want to acknowledge receipt of the Call of China, and I appreciate it very much. I thought it was pretty hard to give up my daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Marx, but since they have got over in China and are so well pleased with their work and I have such a good home I am very well satisfied. We have a good home here with forty-three members, but we need more room. I think lots of the officers and the matron; don't see how the brethren could do better. My health has been poor since I had a stroke of paralysis and I am very thankful for the home. Excuse me for taking your valuable time with this, and that God will bless your good work is my prayer."

The First Lord's Day in March

ABOUT a thousand churches make the Every Member Canvass and give for self-support and education and missions every week in the year. It is confidently believed that some time in the future every church in our fellowship will adopt this method of financing its share of the work of the Kingdom. But it may be a dozen years or more before that time comes.

Until that time does come it will be necessary for the churches to observe the first Lord's day in March as the time for the offering for foreign missions. Forty-one years ago the churches were asked to observe the day for this purpose, and for forty-one years they have made their offerings for Foreign Missions on this day. Sermons were preached, prayer was offered, and offerings were made. Millions of dollars were given for Foreign Missions on the first Lord's day in March. As a result the day has a place in the thought of the people somewhat as Christmas, as Easter, and as Thanksgiving have a place in the thought of the nation.

The churches that do not make the Every Member Canvass and do not give for missions on the first day of every week, should by all means continue to observe the first Lord's day in March as Foreign Missionary day. Otherwise there is grave danger that they will not give at any time in the year, and that would be a loss to them and to the missionary cause. The one task that our Lord assigned His disciples was that of preaching the gospel to the whole creation. They were to be His witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. His gracious word of promise was that He would be with them till the consummation of the age, provided they obeyed His parting command. No congregation of believers can afford to miss the blessing He has promised to those who give as they have been prospered to carry the gospel into the regions beyond. What is more, the Society needs and must have the offerings of the churches if it is to maintain and enlarge the work entrusted to it.

As illustrative of the fact that there is danger of omitting entirely to take the offering if it is not taken on the first Lord's day in March, let this fact be considered: Last year there was a falling off in the number of contributing churches of 258, as compared with the year before. Unquestionably the main reason for this falling was that these churches had not made the Every Member Canvass, and did not observe the first Lord's day in March as they had done in previous years. It may be that these churches intended to adopt the Budget and Every Member Canvass plan, but for one reason or another failed to do so. Not only so, but they did not observe the day appointed and, as a consequence, they gave nothing.

Whether the Every Member Canvass has been made or not, and whether the churches are giving every week for Missions as they give for self-support or not, the first Lord's day in March should be observed for educational purposes. The day affords an unrivaled opportunity for emphasizing the Evangelization of the World. To be sure, this cause is to be kept before the people in the pews throughout the entire year. There must be line upon line, line upon line, precept upon precept, precept upon precept, here a little, and there a little. One sermon a year on the subject will not suffice. But while the duty of Christians to give the gospel to the Christless nations is to be kept before them continually, special emphasis can be laid on the duty on this day. Because the people have been accustomed to hear of Foreign Missions in connection with the first Lord's day in March, they will expect that the songs, the prayers, and the sermons of the day will have to do with the spreading of the gospel in all lands. The missionary instruction of the year may reach a climax on this day. Those who have pledged and are giving regularly need to have their pure minds stirred up by way of remembrance. Those who have recently been added to the number of the saved need to be instructed and enlisted. Those who are not members but who are interested in the work of the church will welcome an opportunity to give.

In every church of the brotherhood the missionary cause should be presented and stressed on the first Lord's day in March, and all present should be told that it is their privilege to make special offerings to assist in giving the gospel of the glory of the blessed God to all creation under heaven for the obedience of faith.

Miss Winona Wilkinson, Miss Della Legg, Miss Lillian Collins, Miss Laura Lynn Major. Missionaries sent to China under the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

I am convinced that there never has been such a responsibility laid on the churches generally and upon the various missionary movements as at the present time. The task that will confront these bodies, especially during the period following the war, will be a tremendous one, but I am convinced that they will welcome it rather as an opportunity, and that every effort will be made not merely to sustain the record of past years, but to meet the crying need of today.—Sir Robert Borden.

"We never saw it on this fashion." Mark 2:1-5.

The year nineteen hundred and nineteen closed one hundred years of history of medical missions, "Christianity in Action," as this great work has been called.

We should not forget, however, that the first great medical missionary was the Son of God Himself, whom the Father sent into the world of men to be the healer for both their souls and bodies, as the incident of our lesson so fully reveals. This miracle of healing is one that impresses itself even from childhood on our minds because of the difficulties surmounted in getting the sick man into the presence of Jesus. Not long before, in this same city of Capernaum, He had passed a busy Sabbath day, "healing many after the sun did set," and no doubt many others had been anxiously awaiting His return. So when "it was noised that He was in the house" the crowds began to gather until there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door.

We can appreciate Mark's graphic picture of the crowd, and we all know how hopeless it is to push one's way through a mass of human beings even without any handicap of burdens. So, we can understand the feeling of despair which must have seized upon the group of four as they approached the place where Jesus was, bearing upon a pallet a man too sorely stricken by disease to walk.

After a hurried consultation upon "ways and means" the determined men uncovered the roof where Jesus was and, after they had broken it up, they let down the bed upon which their friend lay into the very presence of the Great Physician himself. This expression of their faith was to Jesus a miracle and its appeal brought swift response in His heart of infinite compassion and love.

Seeing through the disease, He recognized that the first great need of the man was the forgiveness of his sins, and that was His first gift of healing. Then in answer to the criticism and contention of some of the crowd he added the further demonstration of his right and power to forgive sins in the healing of the poor, helpless body before Him.

Today, through incredible hardships our missionaries are taking the gospel of Christ to the far land of Tibet. Through the ministry of healing our medical missionaries are breaking through the sin and superstition of this "roof of the world," and bringing men and women into the presence of the love and mercy and forgiving power of Jesus.

The story is told of an old Chinese woman who had been healed by the medical missionary in the city to which she had walked long miles from her country home. On her return she was asked by a Christian teacher if she knew of the one true God. "No," she replied, "but I know the doctor at the Christian hospital."

"As the Father hath sent me, so send I you."

"Give of thy sons to bear the message glorious,
Give of thy wealth to speed them on their way.
Pour out thy soul for them in prayer victorious,
And all thou spendest Jesus will repay."

Facts for the Busy Woman

"THE Tibetan women were to us an especial object of interest, conspicuous in their long, bright colored dresses fastened around the waist by green or red sashes, their clumsy top-boots and their elaborate head dress. The hair was done up in a number of small plaits which hung down and were fastened together with wide strips of gay colored cloth, or by a heavy band of pasteboard or felt covered with silver ornaments, shells and beads, and on top of it all was a hat with white fur brim and red tassels hanging from the pointed crown. From the ears were pendent great rings, to which were attached strings of beads hanging in loops across the breast. The Chinese women with no hats, their black hair shining with linseed water, their common blue dresses and deformed feet, were not nearly so attractive as their neighbors, the Tibetans."

"The Tibetans themselves having no medical science worthy the name, the treatment given by the native doctors generally means an increase of agony to the sufferer. For headache large sticking plasters are applied to the patient's head and forehead; for rheumatics often a needle is buried in the arm or shoulder; a tooth is extracted by tying a rope to it and jerking it out, sometimes bringing out a part of the jaw at the same time; a sufferer with stomachache may be subjected to a good pounding or to the application of a piece of wick soaked in burning butter grease; or if medicine is to be taken internally it will consist probably of a piece of paper on which a prayer is written, rolled up into a form of a pellet, and if this fails to produce the desired effect another pellet is administered, composed of the bones of some pious priest."

"Although the natives appear to have great faith in the native doctors, yet they were quick to bestow their patronage upon us. Among the common ailments we were called upon to treat were diphtheria, rheumatism, dyspepsia, besides many forms of skin and eye disease. One morning a woman brought to us her husband, who was suffering from diphtheria, and asked us to give him medicine. After explaining that the disease was very fatal, and that her husband was so ill that he would probably die, adding that we would not be responsible if he did, we gave him what treatment we could including some medicine to be taken at home. The next morning his wife came to announce that he could not take the medicine. I then offered to go to the house, proposing to clear away some of the membrane and relieve the sufferer, but on our arrival we found that the lama had pasted a notice on the door forbidding anyone to enter the house because, he said a devil had taken possession of the house. We were obliged to turn away and our hearts were saddened to hear two days later that the man and also one of his little children had died."

"When peace had been declared, Mr. Rijnhart, to the consternation of both Tibetans and Chinese, went to the Mohammedan quarters at Topa to treat the Mohammedan wounded. It had been understood that because we had helped the Chinese and Tibetan soldiers, therefore we shared their hatred of their enemies and could not possibly have a kind thought for them. When they saw that the missionary was just as kind and tender to the Mohammedans as to themselves, they were utterly amazed. The law of Christian kindness and mercy even for one's enemies was vividly brought to their attention, and some, as they pondered the lesson, thought again of the colored Bible pictures on the wall of our house in Lusar—the picture of the Good Samaritan. There they had learned the lesson in story—the missionary had translated it into action."

"The work of Christian Missions is hindered by antagonizing the non-Christian peoples through dogmatic assertion of doctrines and the failure of the Christian missionary to recognize and rejoice in the great underlying truths of all religions. Only as he appreciated the light, however dim, that gleams amid the darkness and superstition of the heathen systems, can he hope to turn men's eyes to Him who is the Sun of Righteousness and the Light of the World."

"Tea is the most important item in Tibetan culinary art, and any one who can make it to suit the fastidious is indeed clever. The tea used is the brick tea, made of the coarse leaves and small twigs of the tea plant in China, pressed into bricks bound around by basket work and sent up to the Tibetan border on the backs of coolies, and then into the interior of Tibet on the backs of oxen. There are three principal grades and the best grade goes in very large quantities to Lhassa."

Dr. Loftis, upon nearing Tibet, wrote: "Near the little stream a short distance below the miserable huts is a solitary grave. It bears the single inscription on the marble slab: 'William Soutter, Missionary to the Tibetans, died November, 1898.' This is also repeated in Chinese and Tibetan. The grave is built up with sod and stones, three or four feet high. The grave looks pathetic in its loneliness, and in this dreary wilderness. It tells the final chapter of a life given to the Master's cause in Tibet. In company with another he was taken sick with fever while en route from Batang. They stopped in a miserable, dirty, filthy, gloomy Tibetan house where his life at last ebbed out. I visited the house, and am not surprised that a sick man died there. The lone companion buried his friend as best he could, and went on his way. I could not help feeling a sense of loneliness and sadness come over me as I stood by this lonely grave. It is one of the outposts of the conquering army of our Master, and marks the resting place of one of His pioneers. All honor to those who perish in attempting to clear the way that others may follow them, to lay the foundation for others to build upon."

"Today is a great feast day with the Tibetans. So Mrs. Shelton's Tibetan woman invited us out to see them a while. We went across the river to a tent among many, half hidden among the trees and bushes. There were six Tibetan women, dressed in their holiday clothes. Their hair hung down their backs in long black braids, tipped at the end with tassels of silk and gold. They wore gowns, the necks of which were profusely decorated with red, blue, green and yellow bands. The waist was usually a bright red. They wore long, coarse, blue skirts; aprons of woollen cloth, brown, red and black trimmed with a kind of gold cloth, were also worn. Gaily colored, heavy cloth Tibetan boots completed the costume. Long silver earrings and braeelets were worn in the way of jewelry, also rings and neck clasps. We were seated on rugs and cushions, at a low table about twelve inches high. Buttered tea and parched wheat were brought to us, and we indulged mildly, remembering that microbes do not readily succumb to the temperature obtained by boiling water at this altitude. A leatherheaded drum hung in the tent door. A servant beat this and clanged cymbals at the same time, while the women danced for us. It was an odd step, and the hands and body were peculiarly graceful as they kept motion to the time of the music."

"Another interesting thing today was the visit of the Da Kagi, the chief ambassador to Pekin from Nepal. This small country was conquered some one hundred and thirty years ago by the Chinese, and now they force them to carry tribute to the emperor every twelve years or so. The journey by sea and rail could be done in a very short time, but the long march across the Chinese dominion is to treat them as captives, impress them with the littleness of their own country and the vastness of China. The last ambassador made the journey in seven years, and lost one-half of his men on the way. So far only one of his retinue of fifty Nepanlese have died in this the third year."

"A week in Batang and still getting on fine. Everything quiet. My Tibetan landlady has been on a drunk, and been trying to talk Chinese. A fellow who evidently had an ax to grind came around today with a horse which he wanted to give Dr. Shelton to let him join the church. He was told that we didn't do business that way, and he went away sorrowing. One of our patients is a fellow with tuberculosis, who has come twenty-four days' journey for treatment. Poor fellow, I fear he won't get much medicine that can do him any good."

"Last night I was called to a case of opium suicide. I took my hypodermie and small electric battery, and went. It was a Tibetan who had been drinking and his mother was also drunk. They had raised some kind of a row, and he had taken opium. She was crying when I got there, and he was apparently unconscious. The battery soon caused him to cry "quit." Apomorphine brought out the opium, and when I left him two hours later he was a sicker and sadder man, and doubtless wiser. The old lady did some fancy kotowing to me for my work. This morning the fellow was up, sober and repentant. Another life saved by my being here."

"I am also reminded of a poor little slave boy who came to the dispensary last Monday or Tuesday. He complained of his back hurting him, saying he had been beaten by his master, but there did not seem to be anything serious the matter. Still I cannot forget the appealing look which seemed to mean approaching danger. I called the little fellow back as he went down the steps, and gave him a Sunday school card. I never saw him again. That was Tuesday; Saturday he was dead; smallpox. He lived just opposite my door. My heavenly Father, can it not be that that picture brought some message to him in his last hours? Some thought that was comforting! O God, help me before it is too late to be instrumental in saving some of these struggling souls who are sinking into a hopeless death, while we are helpless except in Thine own strength."

"The tomb of Dr. Loftis is built on the main road leading to Lhassa, a few steps to the side, and all passing may read in English, Tibetan and Chinese."

"Tibet is the highest country in the world, comprising tablelands averaging over 16,500 feet above the sea, the valleys being 12,000 to 17,400 feet, and peaks at 20,000 to 24,600 feet, and the passes at 16,000 to 19,000 feet. It is bounded on the north by Turkestan, on the east by China, on the west by Kashmir and Ladak, and on the south by India, Nepal and Bhutan. It has an average of over 1,000,000 square miles and an estimated population of about 3,000,000, being very sparsely inhabited."

"The principal cereals raised are barley and buckwheat, wheat in small quantities, and a little oats. A few localities in the extreme southern portions of the country, and around Lhassa possibly, are said to produce a non-glutinous variety of rice. A variety of mountain bamboo is found in southern parts of eastern Tibet, and is much used for basket work."

"Tibet produces a large number of medicinal plants much prized by the medical profession in China and Mongolia. Rhubarb is also found in great quantities in eastern Tibet and Amdo. It is largely exported for European use, but does not appear to be used medicinally in the country."

"The trees most commonly found are the plane, poplar, maple, walnut, oak. Some valuable plants are obtained in the mountains of south and southwestern Tibet, yielding the exeellent yellow and red eolors used to dye the native cloths."

"Among the domesticated animals are to be found the horse, mule, donkey, cattle, sheep and goats, dogs, fowls and pigs, ducks and geese. Probably no country in the world, excepting perhaps inner Africa, so abounds in wild animals as the cold altitudes of the northern plateau."

Meal Time at the Adana Orphanage

Many of these little Armenian refugees are enjoying their first square meal in many months because of the offerings from American Bible Schools.

The Offering for Relief in Bible Lands

ON the first Sunday in February our Bible schools are urged to make generous offerings for the relief of the destitute Christians living in the lands of the Bible. There is something peculiarly fitting in urging such an offering among the Disciples of Christ. It is only necessary to read Acts 11:29, to find Scriptural precedent. "And the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren that dwelt in Judea." It is hoped that every school will respond.

Our first offerings for Relief in the Near East were made on the Christmas Sundays during the war. Because this was begun as a war measure, the American Committee sent a Sunday School Commission to Western Asia last winter charged with the double responsibility of finding out whether previous offerings had been worthily administered, and whether subsequent offerings would be needed.

It was my privilege to serve upon this commission which for four months traveled through almost all sections of the Turkish Empire, visiting hundreds of places made sacred by the early happenings in Bible times and by the later happenings during this awful war. Suffice it to say that every man of the eighteen Sunday school leaders who composed this commission was most thoroughly convinced of the wise administration of the meager offerings which had been made by American Sunday schools and the entire party came home determined that we would use our utmost endeavors to secure for this cause this winter the largest offering ever made for any charitable purpose.

The Armenian Christian refugees at the time of our visit were just returning from their long and cruel exile in the deserts. Scantily clad in filthy rags, with diseased and starved bodies, these poor souls were returning in a most fearful condition. Families had been scattered never more to be reunited. Hundreds of thousands had been mercilessly slaughtered or left to die on the sands of the deserts. Worse than death had been the experience of the majority of the women and older girls.

We talked by means of our interpreters with hundreds of these survivors. We heard their heart-breaking stories and saw at first hand their mutilated bodies. We witnessed some sad reunions and were present when others had their fears verified regarding those from whom they had been separated in their wanderings. We saw the orphan children by the tens of thousands pleading for food and shelter. Their outstretched hands and longing eyes were turned in piteous appeal toward us as the representatives of America's Sunday schools. Their strange tongues, when interpreted to us, made known their urgent need. Again and again was the eleventh chapter of Hebrews retold to us by those who had thus so recently experienced its catalogue of sorrows.

Our Bible schools should make the most generous offerings possible on the first Sunday in February or the very earliest date thereafter. This appeal will not continue indefinitely, but it is most urgent now. All the good work of the past will be lost if we slacken this year. The Turks tried to murder the whole Christian nation of Armenia. A faithful remnant has been saved, but they are utterly helpless and will perish this winter from exposure and hunger if we fail them. Give them a chance to get back into their homes. Make the offering a big one, for even the two million dollar offering of last winter could not go far among these million poor and needy. It was less than a dollar a person. How many of us could think of existing through the cold months of winter on less than one dollar?

They suffered in Christ's name in the very land in which He lived. It was always possible for them to escape if they would but deny the Christ and accept Mohammed as the prophet of God. They were true to their Lord and ours. Their very faith challenges us to be true to Him and in His name to come to their ministry.

Supplies for assisting in the raising of a worthy offering may be had for the asking. But regardless of supplies, by proper preparation and prayer, let every school make a worthy offering on February the first and send it promptly to Near East Relief, Number One Madison Avenue, New York City. It may be sent payable to me, 108 Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, if preferred.

ROBERT M. HOPKINS.

State Homes for Children Under Fire

DR. FLORENCE SHERBURNE recently startled a company of social workers gathered in Topeka, Kansas, by announcing that there were 5,000 homeless children in the state homes of Kansas. She said that in many of these homes the children were not given sufficient food, that their quarters were rat infested, that in some institutions the children were forced to kneel on cold floors and go to bed hungry in punishment for offences. Dr. Sherburne criticised the legislature for failure to appropriate sufficient funds for the care of the homeless children of the state. The fact that state institutions are subject to political influence, are under the control of politicians, disqualifies them for proper service to dependent children. Nine times out of ten the people in charge of such institutions are appointed as a reward for party service rendered, not for any qualification they have for moulding a child's character. Often state institutions are victims of party quarrels. The one thing that the dependent child needs above everything else—love—is usually lacking in the state institution. The only institution that can properly care for a child deprived of parental affection is the Church of Christ.

The Place of the Church in the Movement for World Prohibition

IN looking beyond the borders of our beloved land, and surveying the need of a world for prohibition, it might be helpful to refresh our minds by recounting the part played by the Church in achieving prohibition in the United States. To the mind of the writer the annals of the activities of the Church furnish no more heartening record than the pages now closing which tell of the victory of Christ and His Church in America over the liquorites.

To completely trace from the beginning the struggle which has gone on between the agencies of the Church and the liquor forces would require a volume of large dimensions. This cannot be done here, nor is it necessary, but each should visualize some of the outstanding steps in the struggle.

In America the movement for prohibition arose during the early part of the 19th century. The objective in those days was total abstinence from the use of distilled spirits. The effort began in pledge signing. Among the first temperance society was one organized at Saratoga, New York, in 1808. Then the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance organized in 1813, and the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance was founded in Boston in 1826. These organizations grew and "the movement made rapid progress mainly under the influence of the Church."

By 1833 there were 6,000 local societies distributed among several states with a total membership of one million. Let it be repeated that this campaign was against distilled spirits, and the crest of this wave was reached about 1845 to 1851. At this time the leaders of the movement began to differ as to the objectives of the movement, some insisting that total abstinence of all drinks having any percentage of alcohol should be the standard for the individual, others insisting that less effort should be made at moral suasion and more for political action. This dissension in the ranks dissipated enthusiasm and the movement subsided and was lost sight of in the problems before the people with reference to slavery. Soon the Civil war came on and the exigencies for money in 1862 caused the government to levy upon the liquor traffic. This made the liquor traffic a matter for political action, as many did not believe in receiving money from such an agency of corruption. So soon after the war, as the result of a call sent out by the Good Templars, the Prohibition Party was organized in Chicago, September 1, 1869. In the selection of delegates to this convention all churches and sunday schools were requested to send delegates, and the immediate call for the convention was signed, among others, by sixteen pastors.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union arose directly out of the desire for prohibition on the part of woman Sunday school workers, and began to take definite form at the sessions of the National Sunday School Assembly at Chautauqua Lake, New York, August, 1874. There was another organization whose early history begins in the winter of 1887 and 1888 at Oberlin, Ohio, and whose beginning was due to the efforts of Dr. Howard H. Russell, pastor of a church at Berea, Ohio. This effort culminated in 1895 in the organization of the American Anti-saloon League.

My purpose in reviewing briefly the early beginnings of these three outstanding temperance and prohibition organizations has been to impress the fact that they were conceived in the desire of the church, and were directed in their early policies almost wholly by church leaders. A careful scrutiny of a century's history, as it relates itself to the temperance movement, reveals the fact that the church has furnished very largely both the passion and the direction in this movement which has been the subject matter of social reform for the past one hundred years. World prohibition is God's task, to be accomplished through His agency, the Church; hence she should commit herself to it. He has blessed His servants in this beloved land of ours by crowning their efforts with success.

For the realization of this blessed hope a great responsibility rests upon us, a responsibility which we are able to bear if we carry it in the fear of God and in the love of those beyond. What a blessing the church has secured for America. What joy has come to many a hearthstone. How little boys and girls poorly clothed and poorly fed have been blessed. How crushed women have had the burdens taken from their bowed bodies. What resources of food have been conserved to feed the hungry; of money to finance useful tasks in industry.

All this has happened that the church, the angel of light, might move to the task beyond. The church is the pillar and ground of the truth. It cannot be held responsible for wrong governmental action unless the church fails as a moral agent to swing the full force of her constituency back of a great moral issue, and by so doing sets back the time when the government will take a stand which is in harmony with the Kingdom of God. The church is an agency of light and persuasion. Those that sit in darkness need to see the light. If the church fails to turn on the light in the issues involved in moral warfare she is derelict in her plain duty.

Some one asks "What can the church do among the different governments to bring prohibition into the world?" Your writer answers "Two things." First, we should see that the church constituency built up through the mission stations have an intelligent grasp of the truth involved in the struggle against alcoholism. This means that some one conversant with the scriptural, scientific, and political truths involved in this struggle must go among these people and in a purposeful way turn on the light. America's success has justified the wisdom of sending such leaders into the world who are capable of carrying on the temperance work.

Second. In many countries today the church needs representatives to do the thing Paul did before Felix, "To reason of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." We cannot wait until a majority of the non-Christian world has been converted to Christianity. Representatives of this greediest institution on earth are seeking advantage among the rulers of the nations. They are seeking to profit by the ignorance of these people as to the real nature of their nefarious business.

Shall the messenger of Christ "come late"? The Disciples of Christ ought to have fifteen or twenty men in as many nations telling the rulers and chief men of those lands of the blessings of prohibition in America, and warning them of the snares of those who lie in wait to debauch them. When we do this we are preparing the way for the day when the Kingdom of God can come into power.

Church Work in Border Towns

THE Gulf Coast District No. 10 is all missionary territory. The towns that are a little farther away from the border have more Americans, hence more members of the evangelical churches. These wield enough influence to make more desirable social and religious customs. As District Evangelist I have visited the following fields. At Mercedes we have some members and there is a good opening to organize a church soon. Missions need some special attention to put them in shape to locate a pastor. We expect to visit them again the first of October. A. R. Adams is doing aggressive work at McAllen, and work on their church building will be started at once. Their old building has already been sold to the Lutherans. At Donna, L. C. Swan is doing just the kind of work that is needed and we may expect soon to hear of decided forward steps. Harlingen has had half-time preaching, sharing with Donna the services of L. C. Swan, and they have made steady progress. John C. Myrick, the attorney-preacher, lives at Harlingen, and has done a great deal for the cause in other parts of the valley as well as his home field. Under the efficient care of D. G. Wagner, San Benito has grown rapidly and is still prospering, with prospect of many more people that are soon to come from the north.

The conditions are different at Brownsville, it being right on the border. It is practically a "foreign mission field." With a population of 17,000, only about 3,000 are Americans, the rest being Mexican or Spanish. There are only about 1,000 non-Catholic persons.

Our greatest hope of success is through immigration. There can be but few if any places in the United States with equal promise of future development. Well-informed people from California say this valley is ahead of the states on the Pacific Coast for citrus fruits, and the climate is more healthful. The other products that can be produced in two or three crops a year are a real encouragement for people to settle on these small farms. The deep river channel recently assured to Point Isabelle will give better freight rates and improve the markets for the entire valley. Large tracts have recently been taken by agents who will bring settlers from the North. This in turn will lead to additional commercial and industrial enterprises. The incomers will help to Americanize, and also bring those of the evangelical churches in larger numbers. We must provide a home for those of the New Testament Church, evangelize to win others to Christ, and we surely believe encouraging success will come to the entire district, even including Brownsville. Christian Woman's Board of Missions

Up-to-Date Questions and Answers

1. Is the united budget the budget of the United Christian Missionary Society?

No. The united budget was the plan for cooperation of all the societies and boards that began with the budget for 1918-1919. The same plan applies for 1919-1920.

2. Where do we send the funds for the different societies?

Remit all funds to the same treasurers of local organizations and the same headquarters as formerly.

3. What does the united budget include?

It includes ten causes. It includes all funds for the American Christian Missionary Society, Foreign Christian Missionary Society Christian Woman's Board of Missions (except state dues), Church Extension, Ministerial Relief, National Benevolent Association for Promotion of Christian Unity, Board of Education and State Missionary Societies.

4. When will we begin to send funds to the United Christian Missionary Society?

Probably not before the end of this missionary year. Certainly all money included in the united budget of $3,000,000 for 1919-1920 is to go to the different society headquarters.

5. When will there be a budget for the United Christian Missionary Society?

The first budget of the United Christian Missionary Society will be a part of the Interchurch World Movement.

6. What will be included in the budget of the Disciples of Christ in the Interchurch World Movement?

Everything outside of the local church.

7. Will there be budgets for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Foreign Christian Missionary Society, etc., in the Interchurch World Movement?

No. There will be just two parts to the budget in the Interchurch World Movement—the budget of the United Christian Missionary Society and the budget of the Board of Education.

8. What will the budget of the United Christian Missionary Society include?

A certain proportion for foreign missions, for home missions, for ministerial pension and relief, for religious education (which includes the Sunday school work) and a certain portion for benevolence.

9. If there are only two parts to the budget in the Interchurch World Movement, namely, that of the United Christian Missionary Society and Board of Education, where will the state societies be included?

The budgets of the state organizations, both the state missionary society and the state Christian Woman's Board of Missions, will be included under home missions in the amount for the United Missionary Society.

10. When will the canvass for the Interchurch World Movement be made?

It is planned to make this canvass the last of April in order that we may unite in a simultaneous campaign. It will be the missionary budget for 1920-1921 that will be pledged at that time and does not at all affect this year's plans in the united budget.

The new platform book of missionary stories for the Sunday school is now ready, compiled by Miss Lucy King DeMoss and entitled "The Flag with Five Colors." Send for it at once and, if you do not have missionary instruction in your Sunday school, present the material to your pastor and Sunday school superintendent and urge its use for the next six months. Cooperate in every way possible.

Woman's Missionary Societies

Perhaps among your New Year's resolutions there was one that you would "Win a new member" for the Woman's Missionary Society. If so, now is the time to put it into practice. Every woman should count it her duty as well as a privilege to bring at least one new woman into the work before the close of the missionary year. Officers and Division Leaders should press forward with the Continuous Calling Campaign. Greater plans are being made and more literature published than ever before, in the interest of organized missionary work for women, young women, and children in our churches.

As plans for the new United Christian Missionary Society are being perfected and programs of work outlined, the need for more Woman's Missionary Societies in the local churches and more members in those already organized is imperative.

The topics suggested for the first six months of 1920 are exceedingly interesting and instructive. With the splendid new leaflets on the medical work in different fields to be studied and the material found in WORLD CALL, there need be no excuse for not having interesting programs each month. Much time and thought should always be given to preparation for the monthly meeting, and especially so if the average attendance in the local society is less than forty per cent of its membership.

Societies that do not have a copy of the Manual should order at once a set of Manual leaflets. They are excerpts from the Manual and will aid very materially in the development of the local society.

During the spring months a Missionary School should be held in each church, or if there are two or more societies in the same town or community, they could spend a day together, studying the fields and forms of work being carried on. Order the leaflet, "Look on the Fields," for the Missionary School.

Efficiency Institutes should be attended by every officer and as many of the members as possible. District and County Conventions will be a great stimulus to a society that has a good representation in attendance.

All who have accepted leadership will need to spend much time in conference and preparation, if they are to render efficient, valuable service to the local church as well as to the great world task.

Young Woman's Missionary Circles

The Circle Department is busy at work these days. Reports of new organizations continue to come in and letters from all over the country indicate interest and enthusiasm in the work.

Circles which desire to do hand work may write to headquarters for detailed information about pieces that are needed.

A circle in Washington, D. C., recently sent a Christmas box of pictures, papers, etc., to some of our missionaries on the Congo for use in the school of little African tots. Kindergarten equipment is often needed on the fields. A gift of this nature would always be acceptable if any circle is seeking something special to do.

Circles at Louisville, Somerset, Frankfort and Cynthiana, Kentucky, gave a shower of needed articles to the dormitory at Morehead, Kentucky, recently.

The circles of Dayton, Ohio, and Duluth, Minnesota, gave annual Christmas gifts to Morehead and Hazel Green.

Fourteen circles have decided to direct their funds toward scholarship support. Are there not others who wish to join them?

The Triangle Clubs are assuming their new place in the Circle Department with enthusiasm. They are planning to give $2,500 in 1920 to remodel and equip the home into which our twenty-five girls of the Mexican Orphanage have gone in Aguascalientes, Mexico. This is to be their own distinctive work and is surely a gift worthy of them.

The new program published distinctively for the Triangle Clubs appeared the first of the year. It is entitled "China by Airplane," and is a "flight" to our various stations in China, lasting from January until June. Clubs which have not yet secured this new material should do so at once as it is the only program provided for them.

Two new plays for Triangle Clubs are just in! They are both splendid little presentations about China and nothing could be finer than for a club to give one of these while actually studying about this interesting country. One is entitled "Sun-Shi-Ning" and is about a Chinese boy and the changes that came in his home and among other people because he got interested in a mission school. It has speaking parts for boys and girls both. Its cost is five cents. The other is, "How Chinese Children Learn the Jesus Doctrine." Its parts are taken by eight girls. Price, five cents. These plays are both short and so good that every Triangle Club ought to give one. Send for a copy and see how interesting it is!

Work Among the Depressed Classes

I MADE a short trip into the Savatal District, where we have several families of Christians. I am glad to say I can give a most favorable and encouraging report from the work and workers out there. We are widening out and trying to link up our work with that of Mungeli. I had the pleasure of baptizing three on this trip, and if the rains will hold off for a few days I will baptize three more at least, who are ready in other villages.

We hear and read of the dark stories of heathenism in lands like China and Africa. As dark as some of these have been painted I think I have never heard or read of anything to compare with conditions here in this land where the law for thousands of years has been "the survival of the fittest." Dense ignorance and superstition are as prevalent here among the lower castes as they could be anywhere. Great numbers subsist on the bodies of dead animals; it matters not of what disease they may have died. I once saw a little girl eat raw carrion, and she was dead of cholera in a few hours. This dead flesh is sometimes not found until it is in a putrid condition. I baptized seventeen in a village not long ago, and the men smelled so you could scarcely sit near them. I am glad to report that no carrion has since been allowed in the village. The people are all happy, and one or two more families are ready for baptism. I have since eaten rice prepared by these people, and it seemed clean. The religion and customs of the higher castes are such that any meritorious work is just as heinous to them as any immoral act or cruel deed is to us. This statement is hard to understand without some understanding of their religion, but it is nevertheless the case. Another thing that makes it difficult for the low caste man is the prevalent belief among high caste men that had not this low being incurred the special wrath of the gods for some former sin, he would not have been born in such a low estate; hence anyone who attempts to lift him up or help him is working against the gods and runs the risk of being born into that very same caste in his next birth. A building fell in one of our mission stations, and several workmen were caught under the fallen wall. One of our missionaries was the only person who would attempt to free them until force was brought to bear on those who stood looking on.

Yesterday, as it was pouring rain, an elderly man and middle-aged woman came up to my veranda. The man had a dirty black rag thrown over his head and a strip of cloth six inches wide tied to a string that ran around his waist. The cloth was pulled up quite tight and tied behind. The woman was a little better dressed, but very ragged. Their story was a long one, but one that we hear very often. Before telling me what they wanted they lay prostrate on the ground and pushed their foreheads into the mud. I told them to get up and tell me what they wanted, as I was only a man like themselves. They called me "great king." In their younger days they were quite well-to-do farmers. Now in their old age, owing to the oppression of the headman of the village, they had lost their home and all their property, and had been turned out to starve. There is a law here that after three years of neglecting to pay taxes, the property falls into the hands of the headman of the village. It is the Indian habit to wait as long as possible to pay a debt. The third year their crop may fail, or the one animal they are saving for this very purpose gets sick and dies, after being given something on the sly by this same scheming headman of the village, who has always been encouraging the poor man that he could wait another year. And when the third year comes something either naturally happens, or is caused to happen. When the third year passes, if there is not a minor son, there is no law that can procure the land again. This may not be known to the ignorant villager, and he may not find it out until his son has become of age. Well, this poor old fellow's papers showed that the malagazar (headman of a village) had been scheming for the past twelve years to procure this land, and had finally succeeded. I told the old man that there was no hope of regaining his land. He possessed papers to show that almost all that could have been realized from the farm for the past twelve years had been paid out in exorbitant interest to the malagazar. This is not a rare case, but one in thousands. We have taken these people in. They have two little girls and are worth saving.

This poorer class among whom we work have but little sense of morality, and are almost, if not totally, devoid of spirituality. The most of them have the minds of children about eight years of age, consequently we have to reach them through some physical channel. If asked at what time any event happened they always point to the direction of the sun at the time of the happening. Like most Orientals they do almost everything backwards. It is interesting to see how dexterously they use their toes. For example, the knife is held firmly with the toes and feet when cutting their meat. In making rude country shoes they sit down and use their feet and toes as a vise.

We are now starting a Christian loan association to help those who are heavily in debt, loaning at a very low rate of interest through the church. In this manner we are able to keep many from falling into the hands of money-lenders, who take such high interest as an anna or two on the rupee to be compounded monthly. As there are only sixteen annas in a rupee, you can readily figure out the high rate of interest. For keeping these people from being turned out of their homes and lending money at low interest, we are being accused of engaging in secular work instead of evangelistic.

The money-lenders ridicule us and say we are reaching only the scum. We do not try to produce any arguments, but pray and trust that our religion will speak for itself in a few short generations. By the transforming power of redeeming love these babes and sucklings will teach the wise and prudent high caste men not to worship idols of wood and stone, which make them so much like the objects they worship. I wish we had some good Christian lawyers that could take the part of these poor moneyless creatures, and give them justice. As it is, the poor, ignorant things can do nothing in court. No one will go on the witness stand for them for fear of being beaten by the malagazar, who can get all of the false witnesses he desires. They are as helpless as animals, and yet they are deeply human. They love their children and relatives as much as we, and sometimes apparently more. When relatives meet after a long absence there is much wailing and a great profusion of tears.

Missionary Education Movement Definitely Identified with Interchurch World Movement

ANNOUNCEMENT has now been made of the completion of the transfer to the Interchurch World Movement of North America of the Missionary Education Movement, the latter becoming the Missionary Education Department of the Interchurch World Movement, with Dr. Miles B. Fisher, formerly Secretary of Missionary Education for the Congregational Educational Society, as director.

The Board of Managers of the Missionary Education Movement last April went on record as approving "the desire and purpose of the Interchurch World Movement of North America to take over as a unit the work and organization of the Missionary Education Movement at the proper time." At the same time it was made clear that during the period of organization of the Interchurch World Movement the Missionary Education Movement should continue its work without charge.

This program was followed. On May 14 last it was voted that the Missionary Education Movement should definitely become a part of the Interchurch World Movement. Since then the transfer has been accomplished smoothly and without interference with the work of the former organization.

In joining forces with the larger organization it is felt that the Missionary Education Movement is taking a logical step in its development. In a sense it has been the prototype of the Interchurch World Movement, for it has been actively practicing the principles of interdenominational cooperation for the past seventeen years. It was founded in 1902 as the Young People's Missionary Education Movement, by the missionary boards of the principal denominations, and its board of managers has ever since been composed of the representatives—over twenty in number—of various denominations.

Latterly, as the Missionary Education Movement—for it enlarged its scope in 1911, so as to appeal to adults as well as to young people—it has furnished service to no less than 77 different missionary boards in the United States and Canada.

Its activities have included the planning and publishing of graded textbooks on mission study for young people adolescents and adults, besides other interdenominational literature and the holding of summer conferences and conducting of leaders' training institutes, which have been largely attended by potential church leaders who come for training in the conduct of their own mission study classes.

In addition, the Missionary Education Movement has distributed lantern slide lectures on topics connected with mission study, has conducted a department of mission entertainment which has involved the provision of hundreds of costumes drawn from all quarters of the globe, has made a large collection of curios for exhibition at missionary meetings, and has produced numerous maps, charts and posters illustrating the missionary enterprise. It has also conducted Everyland, a boys' and girls' magazine.

All of these various activities it is proposed to continue and intensify under the new form of organization. Certain phases of the work have been transferred to corresponding departments in the Interchurch World Movement. The large collection of lantern slides, for instance, goes to increase the scope and usefulness of the Interchurch Lantern Slide Department, while the costume and curios will form part of the resources of the Interchurch Exhibits Department. The publication of Everyland is taken over by the Periodical Department of the Interchurch Movement and it will be enlarged and conducted on the same lines as before. In the main, however, relieved only of the conduct of the accessory features mentioned, the Missionary Education Movement will continue, on becoming a department of the Interchurch Movement, to function as a unit, retaining its own editorial, publishing and distributing organization.

The Missionary Education Movement by careful and efficient management has reached a point at which it is a self-supporting organization, doing a business of $100,000 a year and selling its publications at exactly cost price.

Progress at Nantungchow

MISS Lillie Abbott, who went to China under the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, in the fall of 1918, has finished her first year of language study in Nanking, and is teaching in the boys' school in Nantungchow, the joint station of the Foreign Society and the Woman's Board. She has written of her enjoyment of the work. She says: "The school opened with twenty-four boys, and the number Mr. Lee wanted was twenty-five. Now that people know that a foreigner is teaching the English, he is being urged to admit others. As yet, I have not learned much about the families of the boys, but there is one interesting case I know of. Two of the boys come from a family where the father has four wives, so they have the same father but different mothers. Every one of the boys in the school is from a heathen family. Mr. Lee is talking to them about God and preparing them for real chapel services later in the year. The boys now attend Sunday school and church. It does me good to see them on Sunday in their uniforms.

"The other day when I was late to school I took a 'ricksha, although as a rule, I walk the mile and a half. Of course you know how narrow the streets are and how few foreigners live in Tungchow. To my horror, as I rode down the crowded street, the 'ricksha coolie called out in no gentle tone, 'Get out of the way, the foreign devil is coming.' I have been so called several times since my arrival, but have never had it announced in such a public way. Needless to say the people got out of the way and I reached school on time.

"Many of the people are getting used to seeing me pass every day, and are willing to make friends. I cannot understand their talk much yet, but I can understand their smiles and invitations to come in and drink tea, and gradually I shall come to understand what they say."

William Woods College

THE visit of W. D. Macklin of China to the girls of William Woods will long be remembered by many of the teachers and students. He spoke several times at chapel and held informal conferences in which he answered numerous questions regarding the mission fields of China. His visit and that of Stephen J. Corey will do much to win student volunteers for the foreign fields.

The new conservatory of music building was formally opened Tuesday evening, December 2. It is specially constructed, soundproof throughout, and one of the most satisfactory plants of its kind in the west. Every one of its twenty-six practice rooms and five teachers' studies contains a new Nuder grand piano. With such equipment great work in music ought to be accomplished.

Educated Indians Hear

LEADING Hindus and Mohammedans who were consulted said that it could not be done and some of the missionaries were doubtful about it, yet the Jubbulpore Missionary Union went right ahead and made plans for a series of lectures in English on Christianity for educated Indians. Mr. Stanley Jones, an able evangelist, was secured and the meetings were well advertised. Leading Hindu and Moslem gentlemen were persuaded to preside at the meetings and lists of the subjects and chairmen were distributed throughout the city.

Mr. Jones gave five lectures on such subjects as "What Is Christianity?" "Who Is Jesus Christ?" "The Meaning of Christ's Death," and he did it without making any attack upon the religion of those present. He simply preached Christ and Him crucified in a very clear and earnest way. His fairness won the hearts of most of those present the first night, so the hall was filled at each lecture with eager and earnest listeners, who had lost all fear that some one was trying to put something over on them. It had been announced beforehand that there would be no discussion or debating, but at the close of each lecture there was an opportunity for questions. Each evening they asked questions until the chairman stopped them and the questions kept getting more and more spiritual. Even the smart young Moslem who came the first night with a long written list of objections and quibbles finally began to show a serious interest in what was said.

One night the chairman was a retired lawyer, the head of the Mohammedan community. When he got up to make the closing remarks he said something like this: "We all thank the learned lecturer for his interesting exposition of Christianity. The time for quarreling about religion is past. We Moslems give Jesus Christ almost as high a place as do the Christians and we consider Him one of the greatest of the prophets. Of course, every man thinks his own religion the best, but we cannot think it right that a good God should condemn to hell all who do not belong to our little religious group." Strange words for a Moslem. Another evening the Hindu gentleman who held the chair closed the meeting with these words: "The learned lecturer will soon go from our midst, but I hope you will all remember what he has said. I am a Hindu and proud of it, but I have been a lifelong student of Christianity and it has helped me. If it had not been for Christianity my life would have been far different. I would advise you all to study the Christian Scriptures because of the good it will do you and because it will help you to understand the English people with whom we are so intimately associated and to appreciate their great literature which is full of references to the Bible."

After the last lecture thirty-five men signed cards expressing a desire to take up a course of Bible study. Many of these men had heard the real claims of Christianity for the first time and they showed that it had appealed to them. Throughout the meetings there was a growing feeling of fellowship between Christians and non-Christians and every man seemed to gain a more kindly attitude towards his neighbor. All of those who signed cards are being interviewed and asked whether they wish to study alone or with a teacher. Those who wish a teacher will be gathered into classes or will study privately with one of the missionaries.

These meetings have been a revelation to the Christian workers here. Similar results and often greater have been attained in all parts of India wherever the Christ has been fairly presented to the educated classes. For some time the work among low caste people has been growing and has developed into a mass movement in many places. There are now many indications that the way of approach to the intellectual leaders is open. We need more and better equipped workers at once to take advantage of this great opportunity.

Henry W. Oliver

Honor to Whom Honor

A NOTABLE memorial, and one that other families would do well to emulate, has been established by the children of the late Henry W. and Margaret Oliver. On the suggestion of Mrs. Margaret B. Evans and Mrs. Mary F. Holbrook, the two daughters, Mrs. Henry W. Oliver, Jr., Mrs. James B. Oliver, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, David B. Oliver, and United States Senator George T. Oliver, joined them in giving $18,000 to the Board of Ministerial Relief, as a Named Fund in the Permanent Fund of the Board. A minister and wife in whom they were especially interested were named as the first beneficiaries.

The Olivers came to America in 1834 and made their home in Pittsburg, where their children have attained distinction. At once they united with the church on the bank of the Allegheny river under the leadership of Samuel Church. Years before they had taken their stand on the Bible alone, he having been reared in the Anglican Church and she in the Presbyterian. When eighteen years of age she traveled twenty miles to hear Alexander Carson of Tubbermore, County Derry, and to be baptized by this reformer who anticipated the Campbells by several years.

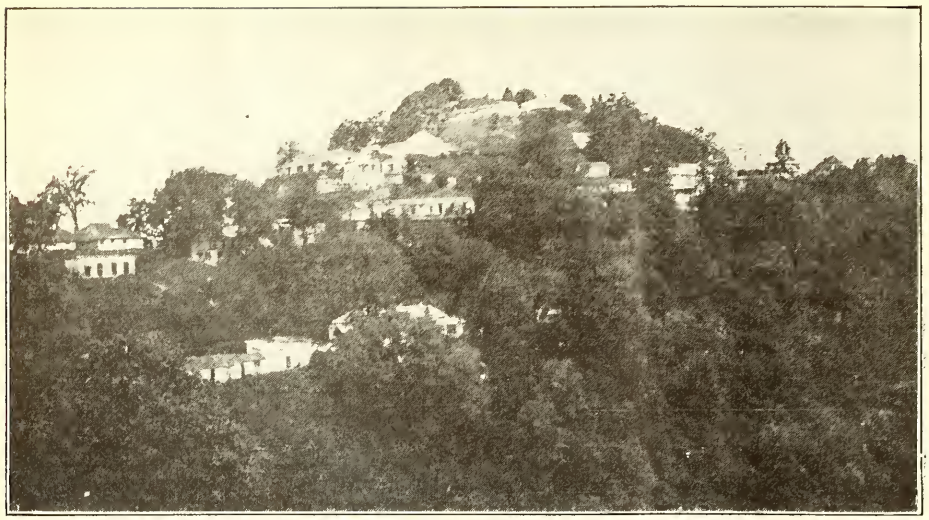
Their loyalty was steadfast and lifelong. After they had helped to build up what is now the First Church, North Side (Allegheny), through change of residence they bore a leading part in the organization of the Hazelwood and East End Churches. Mrs. Oliver survived her husband and was especially interested in the Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society under the presidency of her countryman, Robert S. Latimer, whose grandfather had been baptized by Alexander Carson in 1804. She was also deeply concerned in the organization of the Board of Ministerial Relief. "Her children rise up and call her blessed."

Plan Great Drive for Christian Workers

THE Life Work Department of the Interchurch World Movement, which is endeavoring to co-ordinate all evangelical agencies having to do with the discovering, enlisting and training of the employed workers, required for the Christian program at home and abroad, plans countrywide activities for the first quarter of 1920.

At a meeting of the advisory committee of the department, with Dr. J. Campbell White director, recently, plans were laid to hold 2,500 county conferences, besides a series of meetings for high school students. Between January 15 and April 15 it is also hoped to hold interdenominational student conferences in 500 or more colleges and sometime between January 1 and May 1 there will be a number of conferences for men who have been out of college two to five years. More detailed plans will be announced later.

All denominations report an almost critical need of the right sort of human material. Hundreds of thousands of devoted and capable young men and women must be enlisted in Christian work in the next five years. The Interchurch surveys will show quite accurately the exact numbers needed, but it is already known that the need is extraordinary.



The Highest Mountain in Landour

The Hills of God

"Unto the hills will I lift mine eyes,
The tale of the Book is told:
And unto the hills I will haste to arise
Even as they of old:
And the strength of the hills is given me,
And a far-flung vision is granted me:
And I rest in the quiet enfolding me
When unto the hills I arise.

Down from the hills I soon must go,
Back to the world again:
Down from the hills I hasten to go
To the task of the day again:
For the strength I have is given of God,
And the vision I caught is a vision of God:
And I walk with my hand in the hand of God
As down from the hills I go.

—Margaret Deiter.

Through many years and at heavy cost we have learned the wisdom as well as the justice and grace of conserving the strength of our missionaries. So we not only call them home on furlough every seven years, but send some of them each year to the hills in midsummer—those of China to Kuling, those of India to Landour.

The Win One Campaign

By Jesse M. Bader

EVERYONE who attended the great Cincinnati convention could not help but be deeply impressed with the evangelistic note that was sounded in almost every address of every session. The brethren seemed to feel that it was the need of the hour and that some way should be found for our churches to move forward together upon some worthy program that would put the whole brotherhood behind an evangelistic campaign in a united way. Among the various recommendations that were offered in the convention along the lines of evangelism there came a set of recommendations before the International Convention session which were considered and passed unanimously. These recommendations provided for a Win One Campaign, to begin six weeks before Easter and to culminate on Easter Sunday. The campaign was put in charge of the American Christian Missionary Society. They were instructed to employ a man to direct this campaign throughout the whole brotherhood. The goal set was for 100,000 new members added to our churches by letter, statement, and primary obedience, during the six weeks. This goal is not quite ten per cent of our membership and, considering the evangelistic passion and zeal of our people, and also considering the significant time of the year the campaign is held, the number should be in excess of 100,000.

This plan is not new and untried, neither is it an experiment. The Kansas State Christian Missionary Society has used the plan each year at the Easter time since 1916, and has averaged over 2,000 additions to the Kansas churches each year. In some instances a regular evangelist was called in to hold a meeting, which is in perfect accord with the plan, but the large per cent of the churches and pastors used home forces and organized the church as outlined in the plan. In the Sunflower State the campaign has proven to be a source of spiritual life and power to the churches. Hundreds who never had the great joy of leading another to Christ, learned how through the personal work classes, and succeeded in winning others, which always brings its reward of joy and blessing. All the ministers, evangelists, and members of this state believe in and are continuing in this glorious work each year.

Christ preached by the shores of the sea and the mountain sides. He preached in the open country, in private homes and public places of worship. He spoke to the individual with the same enthusiasm as to the multitude. He speaks to the fishermen and says, "Follow me and I will make you fishers of men, and straightway they leave their nets and followed Him." He comes upon Matthew at the seat of custom and said, "Follow me," and Matthew obeys. The Savior holds a midnight conversation with Nicodemus and explains to him that "ye must be born again." Again we see this Master soul winner holding conversation with the Samaritan woman at the well. She finds the Messiah and goes back to her city and her message is, "Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did." The apostles were quick to follow Him in His example. Andrew finds Christ and immediately finds his brother, Simon Peter, who is used of the Holy Spirit later to preach the Pentecostal sermon, which resulted in its 3,000 converts. Christ finds Paul and Paul with Silas converts the Philippian jailer: Paul talks to the women at the riverside and Lydia and her household become Christians. Peter talks in the home of Cornelius and wins the entire household for Christ. Philip becomes a personal worker and wins the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ. Stephen witnesses for Christ, is stoned to death, after which the disciples are scattered through persecution and "they therefore that were scattered abroad went about preaching the word." These incidents just related are not all the precedents in the New Testament by any means to show Christians of today their relationship and obligation to the unsaved. The evangelism of the New Testament was a passion for souls on the part of the whole church. The "won immediately began to win one," then another and another until the church grew in a marvelous and an amazing way.

As we read our New Testament with open minds and hearts and understand anew the passion for soul winning as its story is told we wonder if we as a people have been going back far enough in our teaching and practice of this divine task. Our evangelists have been and are godly, sincere, earnest and true men, and beyond the question of a doubt they have been responsible to a great degree for the growth of the Disciples of Christ.

But too long our people have depended too much upon the evangelist and the pastor to do the "soul winning" that each church member should do and is obligated to do in the divine plan of the gospel. This world will never be evangelized by the pastors and the evangelists working alone. It is a most lamentable fact that there are literally thousands of our elders and deacons, not to say anything about the balance of our laymen, who have never personally won another individual to Christ.

"Must I go and, empty handed,
Must I meet my Savior so;
Not one soul with which to greet Him,
Must I empty handed go?"

The church will move out into the "Win One Campaign" as her ministers move, for he is ever the key man in all leadership of the church life. If there is to be a consuming passion for this movement in the pew it must be in the pulpit first. Each minister among us should begin now to plan his personal workers classes where the workers are trained carefully and prayerfully in this lost art. It's not only a lost art, but when a Christian is in the business of personal work it becomes the finest of fine arts. The life insurance companies train their men in the art of their business. The agent is trained to study his prospect. He goes to them one by one, telling them of the certainty of death and the uncertainty of life; the wisdom of preparedness and the folly of procrastination. But few men seek the life insurance agent though they realize the value of insurance. So it is that few men seek the Christ who are not first sought by some one who knows the Christ, and is trying to follow His example. If then it is so necessary today in the business world in all lines to know the facts of the business men represent and then to know the customer to whom the man goes, how much more necessary it is for the Christian to intelligently and worthily represent his firm and to understand the individual whom he is anxious to interest, and to lead to Christ.

After the Christian workers are trained and even during their training the prospect lists should be prepared and each worker assigned the names of those prospects they can best win. Prayer lists should be made and carried daily and each name remembered before the throne in earnest petition.

Every organization among us should be interested in this movement for all will be affected and benefited by it. Our national officers on all our boards can give the campaign a good word, urging it upon the churches as they go in and out among our brethren. The state missionary societies will be glad to throw their best plans and efforts by states into the movement, to strengthen our churches both spiritually and numerically. The evangelists, we hope, will arrange to put forth their greatest efforts to hold the best meetings of their ministry. The "Win One" organization lends itself in the very nature of the plan to great meetings. Every pastor with his whole church, using his Bible school forces, his Christian Endeavor young people, his elders and deacons, will throw himself into the leadership of the Christlike ministry with a new passion. The writer has used the plan for five years as a pastor, and his appreciation of the worth and influence on the church is of inestimable value. The last "Win One" held on Easter resulted in 75 additions to the church Easter Sunday and 100 in the entire six weeks with just the home forces.

This great movement of soul winning must be immersed in prayer. John Eliot, the missionary to the Indians, said, "Prayer and pain through faith in Jesus Christ will do anything." Prayer will set our hearts on fire and we shall be filled with a mighty desire to save the unsaved. Prov. 2:30, "He that winneth souls is wise."

Kansas City, Missouri.

The question of assimilation, largely a question of contact between the newcomer and the native-born population, is primarily a matter of distribution. Crime, pauperism, disease, the standard of living, education—all to a greater or less extent depend upon distribution. No practical program for the treatment of immigrants which is not calculated directly to improve distribution, can hope for any considerable measure of success. —Fairchild.

If immigration to the United States were stopped one of two things would happen in Europe: Either a voluntary remedying of political, religious and economic evils, or else those countries would soon be confronted by revolutions springing from this unrest of the people.

Our School at Morehead

EARLY in January Professor W. O. Lappin, principal of our Morehead Mountain School, wrote us of the increased attendance after the Christmas holidays, as follows:

"We have four boys in each room in Withers Hall. One more enrolled this evening and there are many more to come. I will prepare two small storerooms, which have never been used for students. These two rooms will make space for four more boys. We have room for five more girls at Hodson Hall by making full use of the sleeping porch, and there are seven girls wanting room tomorrow. In enrolling new students this last half I have had them all come through the office and have questioned as to their chances for an education without us, and find that they must come here or get no schooling at all this year. All state normal schools are full, and it begins to look like we are more than full. Our schoolrooms are crowded until the primary grades can only come half a day at a time, and Miss Hart had seventy-four in her room last Saturday. I have two or three more for her today. She has 7th and 8th grades except three subjects, which Miss Whitenack carries in the normal. We are going to do the best we can. I shall always be grateful to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for giving me a problem like this to work on, but if we go on trying to supply this need until the state steps in we must have equipment. I have set an age limit this last half of fourteen years and have turned many away. I never did a thing in my life which came so nearly breaking my heart as to turn young people away who are seeking an education, and who are willing to occupy a cold room both day and night to secure it. This school is held in high esteem by all. I am surprised each day by the amount of prestige the school has and the width of territory over which it is known. All that I have written but makes our work the more interesting, but you can see the sad features. Last year, at this time, the enrollment was 235. Now it is 285. They closed last year with a total of 313, which was an increase of 78 from January to the close of school. It is a safe guess that we will have no less increase this year, as more people are going to school. This increase is made up almost entirely of teachers preparing for the spring examination."

The Centenary of Medical Missions

THE Committee of Reference and Counsel of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America has appointed a special committee of one hundred to arrange a suitable celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of medical missions.

In 1819 Rev. John Scudder, M. D., sailed for India and began his work as a medical missionary. Fifty years later, in January, 1870, Clara Swaim, M. D., went to India to begin medical work for women and children. We celebrate therefore a jubilee as well as a centennial.

The celebration will not take the form of a drive or a campaign, but will be educational. Interesting items and articles will appear in the press and an attractive program has been arranged for union meetings which it is hoped may be held throughout the country during the latter part of March. The complete program may be obtained after February first from Mr. F. P. Turner, 25 Madison avenue, New York City. It will include valuable historical material arranged by Mrs. Caroline Atwater Mason, a telling interview with C. H. Patton, D. D., who has just returned from the Orient, a capital dramatic presentation, "The Doctor's Dilemma," by Mrs. E. C. Cronk, and an appeal to young men and women for service, by Helen Barrett Montgomery, with other interesting features.

The First Quarter Century

THIS is the twenty-fifth year of the Board of Ministerial Relief. This gracious ministry has grown from nothing to a large and increasingly greater place in the affections of the churches. Indications are that before long the aged ministers and missionaries with their loved ones will have a real place of comfort and satisfaction in the fellowship of their brethren.

At a recent meeting the maximum monthly payment was increased from $30 to $40. This one action will cost $5,000 during the year. The rising costs have made it imperative. The maximum of $30 was begun in April of 1913, when the amount per quarter was made the amount for the monthly payment. It took courage to make such a radical change. We have faith to believe the churches will supply the support for our aged veterans when they know the condition.

The early returns from the White Gifts service at Christmas are very encouraging. Many schools which before gave only a nominal offering are sending amounts up to $50. There are twenty-five schools in the first reports that have reached the $100 mark and more, some going as high as $300. Many successful services were held. Many schools are sending in descriptions and some include photographs.

Among the cities, Indianapolis has given the best support so far received. Five of the schools have gone up to and over the $100 mark, totaling $700. The receipts from schools already equals the whole of last year while the entire receipts for the quarter show a gain of 100 per cent over the same period last year.

The First Anniversary Pension Campaign seeks to push the enrollment up to 500. Every eligible minister and missionary should at once take the necessary steps to enroll. Good things are ahead for the Pension System; now is the time to get ready for them.

A Ward of the Brotherhood—Through the Board of Ministerial Relief

WHEN this daughter of Missouri and Kentucky was a baby her father was accidentally killed in the Texas church for which he was preaching. He and his twin brother followed their father in the ministry, were educated in the College of the Bible at Lexington and had given twelve years of fruitful service when he was killed.

The widowed mother has had a long, hard struggle which could not have come to the happy issue that is now in sight without the monthly pension paid by the Board of Ministerial Relief.

High school has been finished now and a college course is being undertaken. By the mother's redoubled effort, the daughter's working between study hours and the Board's increasing its payments it seems possible to carry this through.

In a fine letter expressive of her reverence for the memory of her father and grandfather and her appreciation of the brotherhood's unfailing fellowship, she says:

"I am very enthusiastic over the idea of being a university student and have almost lost my appetite as the day for my departure draws near. I know that I am undertaking something that is most serious and without my trust in Him who has power over everything I would fear the result."

What nobler work can we do than to cherish such children—and there are a number more under the Board's care—and where can we get larger dividends on our Lord's money that He has entrusted to us?

A Pastor's Call for a Tubercular Sanitarium

DEAR Brother Mohorter—I have just returned from a visit to a woman who has tuberculosis. She is a young married woman of perhaps twenty-five years, with a boy of eight. Her husband works as a barber, which necessitates his being away from home the greater part of the time and she is left to receive callers alone and care for the house, which deprives her of the absolute rest and quiet that her case demands.

They have been in Albuquerque with the view of getting her in a sanitarium, but found that they could not pay the $35 that was demanded.

She is discouraged and the doctor says that she cannot possibly recover unless conditions are changed so that her mind can be at rest.

What is to be done? She is too young to be left to die, she does not want to die, and made me promise that I would find out from the doctor just what she must do to live.

That is the tragedy that we see here—they come here for a new lease on life, but there is no place to care for them—many live, but some die and what have we done more than others?

I think that we need not put our ear to the ground to hear this call; it is loud and insistent and if not heard sometime we may hear that I was sick and ye visited me not.

Victory for Oldest Church of the Disciples of Christ in Washington

J. T. ESHELMAN, of Tacoma, Washington, is authority for the statement that the First Church of Christ of Sumner is the oldest continuous organization of our brotherhood in the state, dating back to the days of the old Oregon Territory.

The first unit of the present building was erected some forty-five years ago. It was a typical church building for its day; a long, narrow, high-ceiled room, with a tall steeple in front. Some twelve or fifteen years ago enlargement became necessary to meet the needs of the growing community, and wings were added to either side of the auditorium, just about doubling the seating capacity. A baptistery and robing rooms were also added.

When this good year of our Lord, 1919, was just in its infancy it became quite apparent to almost every one that enlargement was again necessary. So after much planning it was decided to raise the building and put a basement beneath it, since we did not have enough vacant ground for as much room as was thought necessary.

The task would have been too much for the Sumner brethren, had they had to carry the entire burden alone. But thanks to the Board of Church Extension for a loan of $2,250 from the general fund, they now have perhaps the nicest appearing and best equipped working plant of any church organization in the community.

THOMAS N. PLUNKETT.

All Honor to Church Extension

IN 1877 a few disciples moved to New Sharon, Iowa. They called J. K. Cornell to visit them that with their cooperation, if possible, a Church of Christ might be established in this city. Success attended every effort. G. T. Carpenter of Oskaloosa was called to assist in the work. After the morning service it was found that twenty-six persons were ready to enter into such an organization. That was the beginning. The church was homeless. Halls, Presbyterian and Baptist churches were in turn rented. That proved very unsatisfactory, but was continued for a number of years.

In 1889 the church purchased a building from the Universalist society. This was repaired and refurnished, making a comfortable place of worship for many years. The church grew and prospered. This made necessary the enlargement of their house of worship in 1900. For a period of fifteen years the work of the church was carried on with varied degrees of success, sometimes full of energy and pushing on for larger things in the Kingdom of God, sometimes discouraged as the membership changed or conditions became unfavorable.

In 1915, because of the giving way of the foundation of the old church it became necessary to put the building on a new foundation. Here trouble began. The building fell into the basement before the walls were completed. The church became discouraged, disheartened and a division of forces followed. Still the work of rebuilding went on. The building was so far completed that the church could have the use of the auditorium.

Pay day came and all available funds were exhausted. The tide had turned somewhat against the church. Some were ready to give up and let the building be taken over by other parties.

A. M. Haggard, state secretary, came and brought cheer to the lagging forces. Seeing the helplessness of the church, also the determination of the workers, he intervened in their behalf and obtained the needed aid from the Church Extension Board. This revived their drooping spirits and with united forces they will yet come out victorious. Thanks to Church Extension.

1. It is an expression of brotherhood.

2. The strong are bearing the burdens of the weak.

3. It houses the church, the church lifts up the Christ as the Savior of men.

4. The terms of the loan are not grievous and under normal conditions are easily met.

5. It enables the church to provide better equipment, which means larger service and greater gains for the cause of Christ.

6. It is the agent of the brotherhood, keeping the funds committed to it as a sacred trust, never losing but ever using the same for the glory of God.

Church Extension is ever helping the weaker churches to solve their problems in church construction. A. B. CORNELL.

The Newspaper Puts a Question to the Church

IN the present social conflict the Christian Church has a clear duty to perform, says the New York Herald.

It considers the crisis "entirely a matter of ideas," and declares both radical and reactionary "seem to incline toward force as a remedy, which is an ominous symptom." It continues:

"Two great agencies operate continuously to shape the minds of the people—the school and the Church. If both function adequately, public thinking should be sound.

"The Church especially has to do with determining men's attitude toward one another. . . . Many persons are listening for some clear, constructive word from her.

"Far be it from a secular newspaper to tell the Church what she should do. Nevertheless, we venture to point out that in Russia, amid analogous conditions, the Church proved voiceless and impotent, the instrument of a discredited system, and so became herself discredited by the people—though we by no means regard as identical the Russian Church's loss of leadership and her profanation at the hands of impious Bolsheviks. Clearly the Christian Church in America, in all of its denominations, must stand for something greater than partisanship. Proclamation of the eternal verities is her mission. Therein she should be a real social solvent, a softener of acerbities, an interpreter of brotherhood and a steadfast champion of sheer justice.

"Which may sound simple; but is the Church equal to it? That question strikes deeper than all pending ecclesiastical problems, such as interchurch federation and organic church union, the raising of vast sums for religious endowments, and the whole collection of questions which commonly engage the thought of assembled churchmen. Is the Church equal to the day's crisis?"

Christian Music Gains Great Favor in Orient

THE use of Christian hymns is causing a revolution in the music of the Orient, according to reports received from American missionaries. Fantastic eastern ideas of orchestration are giving place to the strains of "Rock of Ages" and "Onward, Christian Soldiers." Christian hymns are sung and even played by Orientals who are not Christianized. Missionaries say it is always easy to draw a crowd with a baby organ, no matter how antagonistic the members may be toward the Christian faith.

Growing popularity of Occidental hymns is found in Japan, China and India. The recent coronation procession of a maharajah marched to the stirring strains of American gospel hymns played by the potentate's brass band. Christian music is said to have reached its highest development in Burmah, where Baptist converts among the natives have been trained for the past century in vocal and instrumental work.

An Englishman traveling in the foothills of Burmah, during the Burmese robber wars, told of sighting the torchlight flares of a large crowd of natives. He and his companions were preparing for an attack, when they heard the familiar strains of "Lead, Kindly Light," coming from the natives, who turned out to be Burmese Christians.

Healthy, Happy Childhood at the Child Saving Institute, Omaha

The Child Saving Institute

THE Child Saving Institute held the annual election of the Association last night at eight o'clock in the Child Saving Institute Building. We were pleased to have Dr. McClanahan with us. He had been seriously ill for five months, and had a number of operations performed. We had about given up hope of his being with us any more, but he seems to have recovered and feels so happy over his recovery that he will be a better help in the future than in the past. He seems to think that the institute is that place where he has been so long, that it is his pet place for service.

The meeting was a very harmonious one. There were three new persons added: Mrs. George Bushman, Mr. F. D. Wead, and Mr. Robertson of this city. It appears that the persons added will be active members.

After the annual meeting of the Association and the election of the Board of Trustees, immediately the members of the board met as provided in the Articles of Incorporation, and chose the same officers as were elected last year. I felt that as my duties were not as strenuous in behalf of the county as I supposed they would be, and as the riot situation is clearing up nicely, that I would accept the presidency for another year.

We seem to have a very competent matron in Mrs. Carlson. I wish that you might visit the institute and see how beautifully it has been repaired and decorated and what a nice stone wall we have now in front of it with steps leading up to the building.

Judge Slabaugh's Verdict

I believe that in our list of benevolent institutions you will find none that is doing a better work for the orphan and homeless child than the Child Saving Institute of Omaha; none that has a corps of officers and assistants who have a deeper desire to serve the interest and welfare of their wards; none that has a more harmonious board; none whose work and results prove greater efficiency of service; none where the whole community feels it is better served; none where there is a more capable field superintendent; none where the rate of mortality is lower; none where the work stands higher in the estimation of national experts in such work. The spirit of the age and the spirit of our brotherhood is working in harmony with all good people, and we are endeavoring to illustrate that spirit here and are succeeding, and all the more credit is due our brotherhood if it is able under the circumstances as we find them here to do such splendid service. And I can say that results here are due to the harmonious cooperation of all good Christian people who have but one object in view, and that is to care for God's orphans and little ones.

Items of Interest from the Havens Home

I HAVE just received the following letter from Mr. G. H. Cowdery of Geneva, Ohio: "I am writing in behalf of Mrs. Bruner, a sister in the church, who is about 73 years old and almost blind, yet able to sew a little. She is of a cheerful disposition and very appreciative. Is there a chance for her to make or find a home with you? The writer is an elder in the Church of Christ here and was well acquainted with Mrs. Haven, who was formerly Mrs. G. W. Bennett of Geneva, Ohio. Kindly mail me an application blank."

One of many who look to the Church for support

After making my three-minute talk at the Cincinnati Convention, when the benediction was pronounced, a man came to see me and said, "I may have to come to Havens Home some time; when you get ready to build your new old people's home let me know and I will give $1,000. He lunched with Mr. Hertzog and me and I mentioned the church work here and he said, "I'll give you $50 to help with a meeting."

I have sent out over 700 empty fruit jars, which have been asked for and will be filled with fruit and returned. There were 10 barrels of empty jars. These were cleaned, new rubbers put on them and each one carefully wrapped in paper and packed. One church in Iowa asked for 100 jars. Canton, Pennsylvania, is sending potatoes, apples, onions and other things. They are also sending canned fruit.

R. A. BURRISS.

A Cry of Need from Cleveland

YOUR letter reached me some days ago and I have been slow because I was worn out. I have more help now, and trust in a short time I will feel a little more rested, and perhaps be a little more my old self.

You asked about the bed sheets. We would certainly like to have more, and will send you the dimensions. The small beds require sheets 36 inches wide and 68 inches long; the larger beds, 58 inches wide and 83 inches long.

Then when it comes to towels, we do not use roller towels. We would like at least 100 yards, which would give us two apiece for each child in the home. We could make use of 30 tablecloths, two yards and a half long. Two hundred yards of scrim for curtains. At least 100 yards of unbleached muslin for bed pads. About 100 yards of gingham in pieces ranging from 12 to 15 yards. Add anything more to this list you think of. We are always pleased to receive anything for the children.

The Pool of Pathariya

OUT in the midst of flat fields, and away from any good road, lies the outstation of Bhulan, and two miles beyond that, Pathariya. Bhulan is now a most hopeful place, but those of us who were here in its beginning can well remember how discouraging it seemed. One rainy season Mr. Rioch and I had been wondering whether it should be kept open or not. The whole country from here (Mungeli, India) to Bhulan, fourteen miles of it, was one broad field of marsh and flood, and it was almost impossible to get there. During Mr. Rioch's vacation in the hills, however, I had persuaded the Tahasildar, who had become friendly through our medical ministrations, to help us in securing a school site. He called in the head man of the village, and the land was secured. This is the only thing that persuaded us to keep the station open. Well it is that we did, for a few sturdy converts were won soon after, and now that section is one of our most hopeful fields.

Just before returning home on my furlough in 1912 I rode out with Mr. Grainger to see this place which held so much of hope. As my work does not lie in that direction, and because my hospital work keeps me in the station most of the time, I had never seen Bhulan from that day. But, early yesterday morning I struck the old Bhulan trail once more. There were some people wanting baptism, and Mr. Saum had a bad ankle which prevented his going. I started a little after sunrise, and reached home after sunset, and I can well say "there was morning and there was evening, a full day."

The road is a country one, with paths through the fields in places, but the horse could get along without any great trouble. A rather cold breeze swept from rain clouds hanging in the north, and the peepul trees sounded like cataracts as the wind rushed through and shook them. I worked through fields of waving wheat, now in head. I tried to imagine what its rustling was like, and finally gave it up, realizing that it was like nothing in the world but wheat. The flax blossoms were as blue as Friga's eyes, and the fields of lintels were a beautiful green, with little pink blossoms hidden away here and there, and the dal plants, with a medley of green pods and yellow blossoms, were like forests of diminutive trees. A part of the road lies amid small sand and gravel hillocks and ridges, through which a river flows. These hillocks remind one of those imaginative chromos of the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, and I could almost imagine robbers ready to spring out at any moment.

At 10:30 I reached Bhulan. School was in session, and bright-faced little boys and girls were learning to read and write and work out sums. Six years ago darkness and ignorance; today intelligence and light. Our mission plant there reminds one of a lighthouse, and our helpers and converts and the school children are the beacons which shine through the windows. It is true that some of them sputter and almost go out, but it is the only lighthouse there. From Bhulan we walked over to Pathariya. This is a place of importance, with police headquarters and a government school. The government has purchased and set apart a roadway from Mungeli to Pathariya, and some day it will be graded and graveled. It is a strategic center. We have over fifteen converts there, to say nothing of the Bhulan Christians. A dispensary there would be one of the wisest investments the mission could make.

The converts had been waiting for me at the home of a former convert, but having given up my coming, had left for home just before I arrived. We went right after them before their tracks were cold. We had a little meeting, then went to the pool, which has already been the baptismal scene of a number of converts. There was a house near by used for a cattle shed, and in this I changed my clothes—not the most desirable place, but a campaigner must make use of the things at hand.

It was high noon when the candidates and I stepped out into the water. Many spectators were there, some to grin in a deprecating way, others thoughtful and sympathetic. After the baptisms I was telling the converts that they were now shining lights and must show it by their conduct. Konda, a black-whiskered earlier convert, said, "Oh, yes, I will teach them." We are glad for his zeal, and will let him think he is doing the teaching, but will incidentally do a little ourselves! Sometimes the teaching bump becomes overdeveloped at the expense of the heeding bump.

We trudged back to Bhulan, my football toe giving me pain at every step, and I ate lunch about half-past one. I lay down on a bed and rested awhile, my saddle for a pillow, as I read. Then I visited with the Christians, and at three o'clock Tihari Masihdas and I started home. Tihari is one of our evangelists, and had gone out the day before to visit with and prepare the people. He has since been located in Bhulan-Pathariya.

The cold air of morning was gone, and the sun shone rather warmly. The wheat and lintel fields now had a half-harvest odor which had been distilled by the heat of the day. The sun sank lower and lower, and went down behind a line of trees along a distant road, a glory of red fire glowing under and through the branches and reaching up in the sky. Jackals began to call to each other. One was just a few yards away from us, and we could see all his contortions as he poured forth his creepy, blood-curdling yells, those yells which so work on one's feelings in the dead hours of night.

If you ask me why I take time to tell of the scenery along the way, I will say that it is part of the missionary's life, and woe is he for whom nature has no call. When one slowly rides fourteen miles in the morning, then slowly rides back again in the evening, he has no company but nature and his thoughts. Last evening nature was my company as usual, and my thoughts went back to the pool of Pathariya, and to the fact that I, a plain, simple man, am a builder of empire! Nations have conquered India and gone, and every vestige of their empire, save crumbling ruins, has gone with them. Buildings crumble and fall, canals choke up and dry away, and even codes and statutes are forgotten.

India is hard to change; but a force is now at work which will change her, the power of the Great Teacher, the true Guru, who works on the heart and not on externals. These little pools of water all over India, of which the Pool of Pathariya is one, are the scenes of the beginning of this transformation. The people are finding that not in long journeys, not in sacred rivers and places is heart ease and a new life impetus to be found, but rather in the streams and pools at hand where one may dedicate himself to Him who said, "Neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, shall ye worship, but the true worshiper shall worship the Father in Spirit and in Truth."

Are the Lumber Camps Neglected?

IN a county of the State of Washington not far from Centralia, where I. W. W.s recently directed a murderous fire into the Armistice Day parade of ex-service men, the Interchurch survey shows a population of 45,000, of whom three thousand are church members, with forty-four churches. But in sixty-four logging camps of the county, employing about five thousand men, fifty-six of the camps are entirely without religious instruction and some 500 children are also without the benefits of even a school.

Report of Life Call Committee

At the Congress held in Lexington last spring, the Executive Committee of the International Convention requested Z. T. Sweeney, as Chairman of the Administrative Committee of the International Convention, to appoint a committee who should make a study of the question of life service and enlistment of life and substance in the work of the Kingdom.

The chairman of the Administrative Committee accordingly appointed Allan B. Philputt of Indianapolis as chairman of this Life Service Committee. The members of the committee are as follows: W. C. Morrow, T. C. Howe, Hilton U. Brown, T. W. Grafton, C. G. Baker, Will E. Sweeney, John G. McGavran, A. L. Ward, D. L. Milligan, L. E. Brown, Joseph Keevil, Lee Tinsley, E. E. Moorman, Judge U. Z. Wiley, and Jabez Hall.

This large committee was divided into five sub-committees, to treat the general subject under five different aspects, as follows:

"The Importance of Inspiring Young Men with a Desire to Enter the Ministry." T. W. Grafton, chairman.

"The Importance of Inculcating a Passion for Service in the Foreign Field." John G. McGavran, chairman.

"The Importance of Service in the Home Field." L. E. Brown, chairman.

"The Importance of Cultivating the Spirit of Self-Denial on the Altar of Christ." E. E. Moorman, chairman.

"The Importance of Parents Educating Their Children for Citizenship in the Kingdom of God." W. C. Morrow, chairman.

The following is a digest of the reports of these several committees woven together, taking the subjects in the order named:

Importance of Inspiring Young Men with a Desire to Enter the Minitrsy

In the world crisis through which we are passing, the Church faces the greatest opportunity with inadequate forces. The failure of the Church to properly support those who serve it and the lure which attractive business offers has depleted the ministerial supply and hindered the cause of righteousness in this crucial hour. The gravest problem, therefore, that confronts the Church of God is that of inspiring her young men to enter the ministry and fit themselves for the leadership in this new day. This can never be accomplished through a lukewarm church or a worldly membership.

The first need is a revival in the church that will enkindle altar fires in the home and restore the church of the living God to its rightful place of prestige and power. If young men see that the church has a purpose and a program big enough to test their supreme effort and to command their unwavering loyalty, they will not shrink from her service at whatever cost.

The church on her part must assure the minister of a living salary if she expects to command the services of those who have ability and training to lead her to victory. It is no reflection on the sincerity of the young man, that he shrinks from a career that fails to secure for him and his family a decent living and protection against dependent old age, while those he serves are amassing fortunes. It is not to be wondered at, that when untrained labor is better paid than the man who invests time and money in training himself for efficient service in the greatest cause that ever engaged men, he should hesitate at the threshold, or turn aside to some more remunerative calling.

Then some measure should be employed to lengthen the tenure of office. The itinerate ministry may have served a purpose in the pioneer days, with its simple forms of life, but in the complex organization of society that confronts the minister today, he hesitates to enter a calling where most of his energy is wasted because forced to abandon fields before his plans have been brought to fruition, and before a worthy program can be carried to completion. When churches learn that the minister's value increases with the length of his term of service, and provide for his continuance through a term of years, the ministry will become attractive to those who have the talent to make it effective.

Finally the problem is one which the Christian College must help to solve. Altogether too often the young man finds the chill of intellectualism rather than the glow of Christian fervor in the college halls, and the half-formed purpose to give his life to religious work, with which he entered, is stifled, and he goes out to fill some already overcrowded profession. It should be the business of the Christian college to select out its choicest spirits and fill them with enthusiasm for the church and the ministry. This can only be done when a great Christian purpose and a Christian atmosphere pervade the college.

To meet the need of the hour and provide a ministry that will adequately equip the church with leadership for these coming days of responsibility, the Christian home, the church and the college must combine in holding before the young manhood of today the bigness of the task to which God calls them in the ministry, and assure them of the support and cooperation of those whom they serve. Let it come as the call of God from churches that are aglow with religious fervor, and they will respond and the kingdom will enter on a new era of triumph.

The Importance of Inculating a Passion for Service in the Foreign Field

The needs of the foreign mission field have been vastly increased as the result of the war. The movement toward open-mindedness, which has been growing rapidly for some years, has been wonderfully accelerated. New doors of opportunity have opened; but even more important than this, the harvest in the old fields has been ripening with great rapidity in the last five years. Formerly the missionary was almost the only influence among millions of people. Today the forces of social unrest, political revolution, and industrial anarchy have their native and even foreign missionaries everywhere. The missionary force must be greatly and quickly increased if the work of the past is to be conserved and the opportunity of today is to be seized.

There are three ways of augmenting the supply of missionaries which we wish to recommend to all Christian leaders.

In the first place every effort should be made to make parents realize that the missionary life is not a narrow life, that the calling is not a mean calling, and that the physical dangers and hardships are not intolerable. Parental ambition for their children, that they choose worth-while callings which promise influence and happiness, even honor and power, is not an unworthy ambition, and the life of a missionary does not mean deprivation of these things, nor does it mean sickness and premature death. The place of the ministry of foreign missions should be exalted in all church activities.

In the next place the appeal to young people to devote their lives to service should frankly challenge them to the performance of difficult and sometimes dangerous tasks, to lives of heroic endeavor, to fields of almost unlimited influence in which the missionary of tomorrow will play a part out of all proportion to that offered in the quieter home field. It should be made plain that in return for whatever sacrifice the life may call for its satisfaction and its actual growth in intellectual and moral power more than compensate.

Lastly we urge the churches and pastors to use every available means to increase reliable missionary information and suggest that every congregation arrange for the use of moving or stereopticon pictures of mission lands, for much more frequent visits of missionary and secretarial educators who are not connected with the financial development, and for Schools of Missions, for which adequate books and maps are provided and whose leaders are prepared, and which give vision to both parents and children. There are many other ways in which the recruiting of missionaries may be stimulated, but we submit the above as among the most outstanding and necessary, and the most likely to produce results.

Importance of Service in the Home Field

Our Home Land has helped solve one of the world's greatest perils and problems with a credit that has maintained the best traditions of the nation. It has lifted the hopes of humanity to its highest level. We ask the same careful and candid consideration of the world's religious problems.

America is the "Morning Star" of the New Day. Her ideals and institutions are those towards which the whole world is moving, "some with swifter, some with slower, but all with unresting feet"—the Fountain from which is to flow the stream that is to water the desert places of earth. We call our churches to the perils and problems that must be solved before we can be all that we ought to be among the peoples of the whole world.

To this end we ask your serious thought to the following matters:

First. The many millions of foreigners that have come to our shores, and will yet come as a menace unless we meet them with the hand of welcome, and turn their feet into the path of peace and safety as found in our ideals and institutions. To this end we will seek to be Big Brothers to them and teach them the true ideas of political and religious liberty.

Second. That the ever increasing trend of our people to the cities with their peculiar and increasing problems shall occupy a rightful place in the program of saving America for the world's sake.

Third. That the effort now being made in many places to re-establish and revitalize the decadent country churches that were once the source of supply for our town and county seat churches, receive encouragement. And whatever help can be given shall be extended to those who are seeking to make the rural church the center of the spiritual and social life of the community.

Fourth. That we shall not forget our debt to the "Brother in Black" in his slow, hard climb up the hill of life to a larger and better civilization after his long years of servitude. That we do more to lend to him the "Helping Hand"; that we shall encourage this race that has made such commendable progress and given demonstration of a patriotism second to none in the world's conflict.

Fifth. That we ask serious consideration of the plea of the Red Man in behalf of these wards of the nation who have demonstrated their ability and worth, to be included in the citizenship of this mighty nation.

Sixth. That we call our churches to the need and duty of appealing to their young men to consider the call of the church and world for more, and better equipped men for the ministry.

The Importance of Self-Denial on the Altar of Christ

The spirit of self-denial is the heart of the gospel. It is the life of Christ expressed among men and without it there can be no hope of evangelizing the world or bringing the Kingdom of God on earth. It is therefore of the utmost importance that greater emphasis be placed upon this fundamental in Bible class and from the pulpit, to the end that this vital part of the church's message may feed the roots of life and transform our attitude toward all the kingdom's enterprises.

This spirit should be encouraged by Christian parents in the home. Worldy and material success should be taught as secondary and inferior to service in Christ's name. By precept and example this should be held up before our children to the end that self-denial on the altar of Christ be considered the goal of life's ambition and the gift of self in life service the natural consecration of the youth of our homes.

Our hearts have been stirred during war days by the loyalty and consecration of our young men to a task which they deemed worthy the supreme sacrifice. Young men just entering professional careers and beginning the task of home building surrendered their selfish interests in these matters, and with utter abandon of self-denial upon the altar of their country gave themselves in a way to cause us to uncover and stand reverently before such devotion.

We need to present the call of Christ for enlistment in His service as a task equally worthy the devotion of our youth. To present the call of Christ as such a task we must feel it to be such a task. The time has passed when we can look complacently upon a world in need and answer the call of Christ in a perfunctory and formal manner. The warmth and glow of a love that is deeper even than militant patriotism and more compelling than the spirit of high adventure must characterize our conception of Christ's call. So conceived and so interpreted and presented, the loyalty and consecration of our young people can be trusted to answer the summons.

The gospel principle of stewardship must be related to both money and life in our thought with the same emphasis as that which has characterized our regard for primary obedience to the gospel. Only such emphasis will save our churches and our people from selfishness and cause them to become truly obedient to Him who emptied Himself and suffered the cross for our sakes.

The Importance of Parents Educating Their Children for Citizenship in the Kingdom of Christ

It is a fact, witnessed by the Scriptures and incontestably supported by modern science, that each human life is a product of both heredity and environment. Even the factors of heredity are to some extent under the control of man, but much more does environment yield itself to his direction. Ideals, points of view, and consecration to a life of service may be implanted in developing minds by properly directed education. In order that this may be effective, however, it is needful that this education begin early. It may be carried on through the Sunday schools and the Christian College, but it must have its beginning in the Christian home during the plastic years of childhood. Few men who have lacked this education in their childhood have attained to a high measure of Christian service and consecration. Every parent, therefore, should definitely control the reading, and seek in other ways to shape the ideals of his child, so that he will naturally express in his life the ideals of citizenship in the Kingdom of Christ.

Red Cross Women Adopt Mission Hospital

THE Interchurch World Movement has inaugurated a plan to have American cities adopt hospitals in mission lands by inducing the Red Cross women of Poughkeepsie, New York, to supply the hospital of the Union Medical School at Vellore, South India, regularly with needed materials.

Mrs. Grace G. Farmer, director of the department of women's activities of the Interchurch Movement, gave three lectures to 120 women in Poughkeepsie on the new mission study book, "A Crusade of Compassion for the Healing of the Nations," after which Mrs. James D. Keith broached the adoption plan. It was decided a hospital supported jointly by several denominations would be most suitable and the Vellore institution was finally decided upon.

"It was made clear to the women that this was a city-wide effort on the part of their organization and was not to interfere in any way with support being given by women's organizations to denominational work in missionary lands," explained Mrs. Farmer.

"Mrs. William Ward, the executive head of the Red Cross work during the war, gave a speech to the women in which she reminded them what good work they did in preparing supplies for the wounded in the war and told them that now they were to do as good work for the Lord's neglected in India. She made a stirring appeal and funds for the purchase of materials were raised on the spot."

Among the items to be furnished by the Poughkeepsie women are thousands of strips of thin, unbleached muslin, compresses, wipes, sponges, face masks, lint, operating aprons and caps, absorbent cotton, bed linen, utensils and toilet articles. Patterns were furnished the women.

"We believe that persons who are not especially interested in the religious motives that prompt us in seeking to heal the sick in missionary lands and who do not now contribute to the support of missionary causes will respond to work of this kind when their home city in America decides to adopt some hospital city in India, China, Africa, or in some other remote part of the world where the people are dying for want of medical care," said Mrs. Farmer.

The medical work among women in Vellore was started by Dr. Ida S. Scudder, a graduate of Cornell Medical School, whose grandfather, father and other relatives have been or are interested in missions in India, the family having given, as previously related in WORLD CALL, one thousand years of missionary service. The government of India has contributed one hundred and ten acres of land as a site for the school and has borne one-half of the cost of its support.

In an appeal for women recruits to enter the medical service in the Orient, the missionary societies affiliated with the Interchurch World Movement have shown that there are but 159 women doctors in India, where there are 100,000,000 women; only 93 women doctors among the 200,000,000 women in China, and fifteen women doctors among the 50,000,000 women of Africa.

They Still Keep Coming

IT is not a question as to whether after the war there will be an added influx of immigrants. They are already coming, and coming by the hordes. When, late in the summer, the Department of Labor statisticians announced that more than a million and a quarter of the aliens who for four years had been unable to return to Europe because of the world conflict were going as fast as they could obtain transportation, we began to talk about the vacuum that would be created by the exodus. But more recently our comment has changed. The exodus began, and continues; but over against it we are met by the renewed immigration. Those who went home have told of the American business chances, the big wages, and the splendid prospects; and that which they have had to say, added to that which they are called upon to endure as the aftermath of the war, is bringing and will continue to bring more of the millions.

Call it the new immigration, if we will. It is not only the old over again, but it is more. These who are coming as the raw material for the American citizenship of tomorrow, are not only the same as heretofore, —the good, bad and indifferent, literate and illiterate, virtuous and vicious, aimless and ambitious, strong and weak, skilled and unskilled, old and young, married and single,— but moreover, they are from out of the war lands, war smitten, war warped, war suffering. They flee from the terrors and the toxins and they come to us.

What are we going to do about it? That which the newcomers will be and do will depend upon what American Protestant Christianity will do for them. And it must be done. If we will but receive it, we must consider that their coming is providential. Our Lord brings them here, and brings them for us to do our duty by them. We have been slow to send missionaries to their homelands, and now, since the war, we promise to be even more slow. Count up foreign missionary effort in southern Europe, and note its paucity. What is being done by us in Czecho-Slovakia, Jugo-Slovakia, Italy, Hungary, Greece? Count up our efforts on our fingers. We had the opportunity, but we have been slow to improve it; and now, after the war, we will be slower than ever. So our Lord is bringing them to us that we may give them the gospel for their own sakes, and for that of the homelands to which they will return after the sunset of the day after tomorrow. Czechs, Italians, Slovaks, Greeks, Russians, Jews! They are coming, coming to us. Look at it in the right way, and it will appear very plainly that the new immigration is not a peril, but a providence. The challenge is to our faith, our devotion, our zeal. The accomplishment of our tremendous task will mean not only the ascendency of Protestant Christianity in this country, but, as well, the gaining of a vantage ground for worldwide evangelization.

Are there those who exclaim, "But these are not heathen!" What are they? For truth's sake do not begin to say that they are Roman Catholics, Greek Catholics, Hebrews. They are creatures of systems. That is all. Those systems are un-American; and they are out of sorts with them, and ready for something better. They have lost faith in their systems, and will lose it in religion if we do not go about our duty. These nominal Roman Catholics are to a large extent tired of Rome. These who go by the name of Greek Catholics are—and especially since the recent turn of affairs in Russia—disgusted with the old faith. As for the Jews, it is only necessary to say that they, by the thousands, are indifferent. And how easy it is to spell indifference i-n-f-i-d-e-l-i-t-y!

It is a world call. These new immigrants are coming to us for us to meet our responsibility, and seize our opportunity. They come hungry for the gospel. They are famine sufferers. Is it not ours to feed them? Certainly. Feed them, and feed them common sensibly. Show them how to eat the Word. Teach them about its digestion and assimilation. And never forget that the Master's "Inasmuch" is still in the Holy Writ.

A Splendid Example

THE following story from The China Press, Shanghai, is one of great interest. We are conscious of a sense of shame when we think of the difficulty of finding such an example as this here at home:

EMPLOYES OF BIG STORES ALL MUST GO TO CHURCH

STAFFS OF WING ON'S AND SINCERE'S, FROM MANAGER TO COOLIES, OBSERVE SABBATH

Church going for the employes of the Wing On and Sincere Companies, the two leading Chinese department stores in Shanghai, has been made compulsory. Every member of the staff from the managing director to the gate coolie is required to observe Sabbath in both stores on Sunday morning, when regular Christian services will be conducted on the roof garden between the hours of nine and ten o'clock.

"I believe we are simply carrying out the orders of God in introducing the teachings of Jesus Christ to our employes," said Mr. Gock Bew, managing director of Wing On store when interviewed by a reporter of The China Press yesterday. "You see, so few of our men have had the opportunity of knowing Jesus Christ and the gospel.

"When I was 24 years old I knew nothing of the teachings of Christianity. Up to that time I worshiped the idols in Canton with satisfaction. But in that year I went to Australia and I found the gospel and have been converted to its doctrines for the last 27 years. I am 51 this year. It is only right that we as Christians should perform the work of the evangelist as decreed by God himself.

"We used to hold the Sunday service from 9 to 10 o'clock in the evening. This we found inconvenient, because after nine, when our stores close, the employes are supposed to have their deserved rest, and we could not force them to attend. And many indeed failed to attend. But by changing the hour to nine in the morning, when the men are supposed to be working in our stores, we are giving them pay as well as their religious worship. We postpone the opening of our store to ten o'clock. Every man is compelled to go to church unless he has some sound excuse. Otherwise, his pay is reduced.

"The service, which is conducted on the roof, is open to the public. I shall be there every morning and would welcome any guests who avail themselves of the opportunity to come."

The services are to be conducted under the leadership of various pastors and speakers.

"The commonest prejudice of all, perhaps, is the near-visioned belief in the superiority of the people of one's own small corner to all the rest of the world."

Whenever a church or Y. M. C. A. has shown itself hospitable to the strangers it has had souls to keep, but most of them prefer the "absent treatment."—Steiner.

From a Shut-in to Shut-ins

I RECEIVED a few days ago three copies of WORLD CALL from a member of the church at Hattiesburg, Mississippi, and promptly sent in two subscriptions, and have written checks for various causes, I thought for as much as I was able to give, but in looking over the April number saw the article on help for incurables, that I had not read. It appeals to me irresistibly for I have lived many years an incurable. I have made it "good for me that I have been afflicted," and am now drawing to the close of a long life in great peace and comfort. I know that in many frail bodies there are priceless spirits that shine all the brighter through dark hours of pain and helplessness, and they are valuable to humanity because they bring out often in hardened natures flowers of love and tenderness that otherwise would never have bloomed. Every day of my life there are appeals to my pity and sympathy, and it grieves me not to be able to respond to them, but as a grateful offering to my Father for the loving care that has surrounded me, I shall send you one poor lone little dollar for the incurable girl mentioned. If you cannot reach her, you may keep it until such a work as suggested in the article be started. Perhaps the motive that prompts me to do this may move others to do likewise. Ideas are the most powerful things in the world, moving either silently and obscurely or sweeping the world with dynamic power.

Remembering how our Savior pitied suffering womanhood, and tenderly healed, I offer to Him this little gift, and ask Him to multiply its power to bless as He did the simple luncheon of the poor lad. I would love to write to that girl, and tell her of the immeasurable blessings and heart treasures I have found in my poor, weak, cramped body and thwarted desires and ambitions. A home for incurables! Yes! let us have it, and let them know that they are "prisoners of hope." Will you kindly let me know if any steps be taken in this direction? My prayers go up to the throne of mercy continually for all suffering humanity, and it saddens me that I can do so little to help in the world's great pain. I congratulate you people who are in the midst of it, and as one who can only "stand and wait," I charge you as God charged Joshua, and as the charge was repeated so often by Moses to him and the people. "Fear not. Be of great courage. Go forward." There are hard places, of course. Everything worth doing requires hard work, patience, perseverance, yet but for them faith would not be fully developed, great things would not be done, the glory and power of God would not be made manifest to the world. The greater the difficulty the greater the achievement. I am not speaking as one who does not know. I have been through so much that as one who pauses and looks back, I can send out to the cheer of victory in the words of David, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivers him out of them all." We do not have to see all the way ahead. I feel the need of divine help one might in a very responsible work, and was praying for guidance, when in a moment, as in a vision, I stood looking down a long flight of steps lighted by a light above my head. I looked up and saw a lamp like those used in the East in the time of our Savior. It was only a moment, and I was normal again. To my mind the answer was, "Step by step I will lead you." It is a comfort to think that we do not have to know just when and how help will come. I just pray now, and wait. I could fill a book telling you of the many and wonderful answers I have received, and then many would be forgotten.

For more than sixty years the pathway from my heart to God has been paved with prayer, and His answers have made it glow with glory and beauty. Undertake great things, you who are fighting the battles for all that is best and right against sin and wrong, suffering and want. The struggle is a titanic one, and it is grand to have a part in it. In the dark hours get closer to God and make large drafts on His love and power. He will honor them. Has He not said, "I will draw near to those who draw near to me. I will honor those who honor me"? Would you go to a very rich man and ask for five dollars when you needed a thousand? There is an immense work demanded of the Church right now, and great undertakings grow and increase more rapidly than small ones.

To be working, to be having a share in great movements is a wonderful privilege. There will be hardships, self-denial, discouragement, woeful fatigue oftentimes. Yes, somebody must endure these things if the world is saved, but our Savior lived through it all, and lives now in His disciples, urging them not to faint because they are weak and weary. I am not boasting when I tell you that with my physical disability I have done the work of a strong woman until old age came, and that I never stopped just because conditions were hard, or I was in pain, or tired. I only ceased to work when I could no longer do it. That is why my prostration is so complete. What I am writing may seem to you tiresome platitudes, but they are great, living truths that lift the world up from the depths unto God. I just want you all to know that there is a humble old woman full of faith and love whose heart bleeds for suffering humanity, who prays for you, that help may come to you as it is needed, that many hearts and minds, the very best, brightest, strongest, most talented, may take up the work with you until the gospel is preached, and its beneficent influence is felt over the whole world.

The New Church

By JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

It was a humble church—no stately steeple
Looked down upon the river and the street—
A humble church, for humble, toiling people,
Who hither came with heavy, aching feet.

Outside there raged the city's ceaseless riot,
And careless souls the path of ruin trod;
Within, amidst a reverent Lord's day quiet,
The little church was set apart to God.

I saw another sight than those rapt faces;
I saw a vision of the years to be—
The throng of those whose forms shall fill these places,
When time shall be no more with you and me.

More solemn than those solemn invocations,
More joyful than those joyful notes of praise,
I heard the prayers of future generations,
I heard the songs of far-off future days.

I heard the wistful penitent's grieved sighing,
In memory of a sad and wasted past,
And high above I heard the angels crying,
"Rejoice! the wanderer returns at last!"

And then I heard the Master, softly saying,
"O ye who reared the building for my sake,
Through toil and sacrifice and fervent praying—
Most sweet to me the gift is that you make.

"For once I was an exile bowed with sadness,
Unhoused, when birds straight to their nests might flee—
And my remembering heart is thrilled with gladness
When those that love me build a house for me."

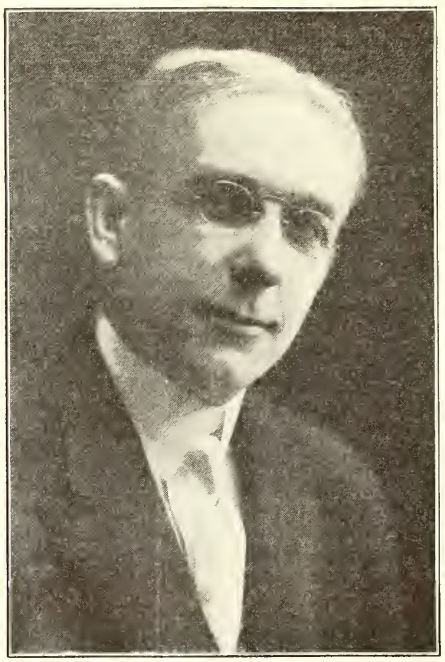
Notes and News

Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Menzies, with their four children, left the College of Missions in May, 1919. They went to spend the summer months with family friends in Scotland, hoping to go on, early this fall, to their work in India. A letter from Mr. Menzies, dated October 27, reports their profound regret that they cannot get passage yet from England to India. They say hundreds of missionaries are tied up in England waiting to go to their various fields. While they wait they have put the children into school, and they report them as doing well. Mr. and Mrs. Menzies have both been speaking in the churches, and they seem to enjoy the fellowship with our people there.

Mrs. Bertha F. Lohr has joined our force of missionaries among the Mexican people at San Antonio, Texas. She is located at 1225 El Paso Street. When it was found that Mrs. Lohr could not return to her much-loved work in India on account of conditions arising out of the great war, she gave herself at the College of Missions to diligent study of the Spanish language. She made a remarkable record in acquiring the use of the language and is happy to be in the work at San Antonio.

Miss Hallie Lemon writes from her important work among the Mexican people in San Antonio: "I am busy with the little tots each morning from eight o'clock until noon. What a wonderful time we have with them. I love children more every day. I do not wonder that heaven is to be full of them, or with those who have become as little children. In spite of the bad, rainy morning last Sunday we had thirty-six little folks in our two primary classes. Miss Brewer is getting into the work with the girls well. Her time is full, though we try to guard her so that she has some time for special language study. Mrs. Lohr is doing splendid personal work in her Bible teaching, and is already teaching some in Spanish. We are getting such a group of workers as will make it possible for us to touch this neighborhood as we have planned and longed to do. Since our sunny southland has somewhat come back to its own the people are responding wonderfully, and we are all kept busy. Sometimes it seems almost a shame that we have to take time to eat and sleep."

Our missionaries in India are greatly distressed at the very unfavorable rate of exchange which puts upon the missionary societies at home a heavy responsibility. In a recent letter from Miss Mattie Burgess, in a very characteristic way, she expresses her willingness to return a part of her salary so that the work can go forward. Other missionaries have offered to do the same thing, but we believe the Church will not suffer the Boards to make smaller the too small salaries of the missionaries. There has been famine and the attendant suffering with it, and the missionaries have been put to their utmost efforts to relieve the need. Our orphanages and the home at Kulpahar have been compelled to take in many extra people, but now, because of the shortage of funds, they are refusing to take more. We shall never know what opportunities may be lost when the missionaries are forced to a stand like that. Miss Burgess went from Bina, where she was located this year, to Kulpahar, the first of July, to help in the work for two months. Later the Advisory Committee decided she should stay there indefinitely as the work is so heavy. She says, with the self-depreciation she always manifests, "No tongue can tell how much Miss Clarke and Miss Vance do at this station. It is a hard life. It has its wonderful aspects, too. It would take a gifted pen and a great soul, with the right kind of imagination, to record properly what our missionaries at this institution have done and are doing. I am not able to do half as much work as Miss Vance or Miss Clarke. I am staying on with the hope of helping Miss Vance. I can look after buildings and repairs. I can do clerical work, and I can help Miss Clarke with the fields and garden.



Joseph C. Todd

JOSEPH C. TODD, Dean of the Indiana School of Religion, Bloomington, has recently been called to become an associate secretary of the Board of Education, and is to have oversight of the work in state universities. This is a rapidly growing field and the Disciples, who were the first to enter this field, should be abreast of the field. Other bodies are putting large sums of money at these university centers. The Methodists are raising two millions for their work at the University of Illinois and have already received one-half million. The Presbyterians are putting eight millions into their educational budget for work at state universities.

Mr. Todd is a native of Boone county, Missouri, and was educated at Missouri Valley College, Union Theological Seminary and Columbia University. His pastorates include Boonville, Missouri, Monroe City, Missouri, and Bloomington, Indiana. In 1910, during the latter pastorate, he founded the Indiana School of Religion, and has been Dean of this institution since 1912. In 1918 the degree D. D. was bestowed upon him by Missouri Valley College.

I cannot attempt to keep pace with my colleagues."

Word comes from our missionaries in Buenos Aires that the enrollment at Colegio Americano for the year was one hundred and fifty-four. There were thirty-one boarding pupils.

Fouad Khayatt, son of a rich landowner of Bagdad, has arrived in the United States to study agriculture. The young man's father owns thousands of acres of land in the valley of the Tigris river and there he intends to introduce scientific farming methods, using American machinery. In addition to this he intends to establish agencies for American farm implements. The young man was educated at Roberts College, an American institution in Constantinople, and when he came to America, went to Near East Relief headquarters, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, where he told of his plan. He is greatly interested in the work of the organization in striving to save from starvation the hundreds of thousands of people in western Asia and obtained his first idea of the great commercial and industrial development in this country, which brought him to the United States, through American relief workers and missionaries in his own country.

A chain of stores has been established throughout western Asia to handle the products of the industrial homes maintained by Near East Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, for the benefit of Armenian, Syrian and Greek refugees. In these refugee centers quantities of lace, cloth, rugs, carpets, leather goods, combs and the like are produced and markets for these articles are found by the establishment of these stores. In partially caring for the 800,000 starving people in Turkey and neighboring countries, Near East Relief gives food and clothing when necessary, but as far as possible furnishes it in return for work done in industrial centers maintained and equipped by the organization.

Dr. Shelton has had his hands full in curbing opium growing in his district. He writes as follows concerning his experience: "Early in March I learned that opium was being and going to be planted here in large quantities. I went at once to the magistrate and protested. He issued a proclamation forbidding it, but it was not heeded as he had secretly given his consent. After repeated protests most of the opium was pulled up, but in several places there was enough left for seed. A final protest resulted in his putting the banker and a merchant in chains for a few days, and the destroying, so far as I can find out, of the last stalk of opium. It would have been a calamity to have had opium grown here and for sale or trade among the local young men. It has been very difficult to accomplish the destruction of all that was planted this year, but it should be easier next year as it can be taken earlier, before any is planted. The total result is that this year there will be no opium grown here and that I have made forty or fifty good enemies."

We cannot print the following as a "telegram" on evangelistic success, for it has been four months reaching us from the Tibetan border. However, the news is worthy of an outstanding place in evangelistic news:

"Increase in attendance over last year in June, fifty per cent. Had to make new tables and blackboards to accommodate increase. Must have new building. Several pupils asking for baptism and these are being given special instruction. The Christian religion is getting rooted and grounded so firmly here now that the only way to uproot it would be to destroy the whole population. Lee Gway Gwang is a powerful preacher, fluent in both Tibetan and Chinese." —The Ogdens.

The following is from a letter written by a young woman missionary who went out from a home of abundance in America to give her life to the Filipinos: "September 28th Mr. Stipp and I went again to Piddig, Banna and to a Tinguin town of Nueva Ear, seven kilometers distant, among the mountains. We crossed rivers six times, climbed mountains and were caught in a hard rain on our way so that all of our extra garments were also wet. That night and next morning, even before church, we were compelled to iron our clothes before we could begin our service. There we held the first communion service ever held among the 'Itnegs' or Tinguins."

"I must not leave out the orphans, the most helpless of all humanity. In this land of ignorance and heathen blackness, these suffer unspeakable distress. They die of hunger and cold at people's doors, and comparatively nobody cares. The priests will take the last piece of furniture, and the last bite of food out of orphan children's mouths for reading prayers for the dead parents. I have seen them take even the home and turn the children out to beg. The mission, and individual missionaries, have done what funds would allow toward helping about a dozen all told of these helpless children. Some have grown to manhood, and some are in their teens, and most all are useful and promising. The oldest, Lee Gway Gwang, is a powerful preacher. No foreigner can equal him. Another Lee will follow in the footsteps of the sainted Loftus as a Christian doctor. Others are making good. It pays to raise these. A month ago our mission decided to open a room in the hospital and take in a few of these distressed ones. Ten have been taken into this room on mission and private support. It will pay. And it would pay you, dear reader, to raise your representative for Christ in Tibet in this way, if you cannot come yourself. I speak from experience, and in view of facts that speak louder than words. Try it and see if you do not gain in spiritual sweetness and power. It pays."

The following interesting Cradle Roll note comes from a Philippine missionary: "We had a Cradle Roll Sunday in our Laoag chapel and many babies with fond parents. Three prizes were given, based on weight. The 'weighing' was an interesting time, bedlam broken loose with all the crying, but we loved our adorable brown babies and had a wonderful service."

The following is a typical expression from a new missionary and his wife who have been a year in India: "The more we see of India the gladder we are that we came and we are both very eager to take up our full share of the work. We know that you will remember us in your prayers, but it will also help us more than you can imagine if you will write to us occasionally. If you find no time to write, send a paper or magazine. We sometimes get quite hungry for news of the homeland and of the doings of our friends."

Nine of the students in the Bible College and Union Seminary in Manila have Sunday appointments outside of the city every Lord's day. They have six churches and are caring for Sunday schools at many points. These are poor boys and $100, in addition to what they are earning, will keep one of them in school in training for the ministry for one year.

Ben Holroyd of China in writing of the loss of their little baby, Mary Elizabeth, states: "Mary Elizabeth was such a happy, bright baby that it has left a great longing in our hearts, but we have some very precious memories and we know that God has some great purpose in it all. We only hope that this experience will enrich our lives and make us of greater service to those around us who so need His love. Mrs. Holroyd and I are very happy to be going to Nantungchow, for our hearts have always been in the work there. We shall live in a Chinese house and fit it up as comfortably as we can until we can have a missionary home. We are aware of the sad condition of exchange at present. For $100 gold we now only get $97 Mexican. This is a tremendous strain on the society." In 1914 $100 gold would purchase $250 in Mexican.

Borough Park, Brooklyn, New York, where E. B. Kemm ministers, is planning an aggressive campaign. Mr. Kemm writes: "We have been mobilizing our forces this month for the fall campaign. The people are responding splendidly and the outlook is the most promising since I took the pastorate of the church the first of the year. Doors of opportunity are being opened to us and we are preparing to enter these doors as early as possible. Last Sunday was a remarkable day in our history. A young Jewess, who has been a Christian for seven years and whose mother has been a follower of Christ for ten years, was added to our ranks. She has been worshipping with us a little while and had enrolled in our Bible school September 21. The Lord has answered our prayers for a worker from the Jewish race to help us reach these people who are now in the majority in our community. Next Sunday will be Rally Day in our Bible school and we are making unusual preparation to observe it and planning an aggressive program to increase its enrollment and efficiency."

have a representative in each state, county and local church body throughout the country. In selecting these representatives first consideration will be given to salaried denominational workers already on the field.

Dr. Charles H. Sears, for twenty-one years connected with the Baptist Extension Society of New York City, has become head of the co-ordination branch of the New American Division. This division considers the religious needs of the foreign-born.

George G. Hollingshead of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has succeeded William P. Shriver as head of the Interchureh survey of American cities. Mr. Shriver is now head of the city section of the co-ordination branch of the Home Missions Survey.

C. L. Fry has become head of the Exceptional Groups Survey. These groups include floating populations which cannot properly be classified under either rural or city surveys, such as fruit pickers, grain harvest hands and other migratory laborers.

One of the best types of missionary work which is being done in the Philippine Islands is that of the student dormitory. In these buildings which provide rooming quarters, students from the high schools and the Philippine University are gathered by the missionaries and given a fine Christian influenee. The Foreign Society has such a dormitory at Vigan for the Government High School there, also the new Albert Allen Memorial Bible College and Dormitory just opposite the great Philippine University in Manila. This dormitory building also houses the Bible College, where our young men are being trained for the ministry. Plans are now being laid for the building of a second home on this property. When this is completed we will have the best dormitory property in all the Philippine Islands. The location is on Taft Avenue, opposite the center of the University eampus, the best possible location. Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Higdon are in charge of the teaching and Mr. Higdon is also instructor in the Union Theological Seminary, a little distance away. Mr. and Mrs. C. C. McCaw, who have recently sailed for the Philippines, will have charge of the dormitory students. The students who room in the building and go to school elsewhere are required to attend the chapel service daily and they also take lessons in Bible study. Thus the missionaries come in intimate contact with the very finest young men who are being trained for leadership in the Philippines.

From Hiram N. Van Voorhis, our evangelist in the Charleston, West Virginia, District, we have the following message: "The big government city of Nitro, located sixteen miles north of Charleston, has been disposed of by Uncle Sam to a syndicate of Charleston capitalists. Nitro, a center for the manufacture of ammunition, was completed by the ordnance department of the United States army just ten days before the armistice was declared. Thoroughly modern in every detail, it cost our government the immense sum of seventy million dollars. The recent purchase price represented a bargain, $8,510,000. At a dinner recently given in Charleston by interested parties, one of the big men back of the Nitro project, stated that it is the purpose of the local capitalists to bring twenty-five thousand people into Nitro within the next year or two. This means a handsome opportunity for the Disciples of Christ, if we can only provide the working force, equipment and money to seize it."

"We shall have to choose between drink and efficiency. The United States 'dry' will industrially be too great a mateh for Great Britain 'wet.' This matter of the liquor traffie has too often been discussed under the head of 'drunkenness,' which is a misleading way of regarding it."—"Western Times" of Exeter, England.

Canon J. H. B. Masterman, reporting his recent visit to America in The Challenge, of England, says:

"What struck me was that the longer any district that I visited had been 'dry' the more convinced the people appeared to be that no return to the old order was possible.

"I talked to commercial magnates at Memphis, to publie officials at Topeka, to trades union leaders at Roanoke—everywhere the testimony was the same. Men who had voted against prohibition freely admitted that they had been converted by experience of the benefits to the eommunity that it had brought. I did not meet a single individual in America living in a dry area who regarded the restoration of the saloon as either desirable or possible."

Mrs. J. C. Ogden reports that the Mission lends small sums of money to poor women as capital with whieh to do business. The mission finds it is better to let them have it as a loan than to give it outright. This money helps the women, and it has proved a success to all but one. She took the money and spent it immediately without even a trial. One woman is selling bread, and one is selling tea, salt and butter. Mrs. Ogden writes, "We have to do many little things that really seem not worth while, but I believe they are, and when I can help some poor family I am willing to do it. Jesus went about doing good, and He never forgot the poor and was kind and patient and thoughtful of all."

Mrs. Tobitha Hobgood, Lotumbe, Africa: At present our interest is centered on the Union Revision work which is going on here. Mr. Hensey, Mr. Gilchrist of the Congo Balolo Mission, and Mr. and Mrs. Ruskin of the same mission, are here to revise the books of the New Testament with Mr. Hobgood as a member of the committee. It is hard and tedious work and will take a long time to finish. My ehief work is looking after the cooking department while these people are here with us, and that, with all the extras and "Bob" involved, keeps me on the jump. Since the influenza wrought such havoe, we have not had such good school and chureh attendance. My work has been with the children in their school and with the women's meetings. I also do what I can to help Mr. Hobgood with palavers, and church work and the Sunday school. I have given out a good deal of medicine. I like this work well and wish I had more time for it. It seems that we have never been so busy as we are now, but it always seems that way. After all, it is a very satisfaetory situation to be in.

George B. Baird, Luehowfu, China: Schools are all open. The enrollment is as follows: Boarding schools, 30 pupils: Central Primary, 30; West Side, 12; Liang Yuen, 50; Special Night School, 60; Total number, 182. The Sunday school started off well with 197 present. During the summer months Sunday school and church serviees were eombined, with no division of classes. We are starting a Sunday school and preaehing service at West Side Center on Sunday afternoons. This is somewhat of an experiment.

W. H. Erskine, Osaka, Japan: The Christy Institute started with crowded rooms again. We have boys standing out in the hall listening to the teacher. My work in short-hand is growing, as I am now teaching two classes. Our typewriting department is busy with both boys and girls. The girls' class has a big increase. It takes time to work up a school. Tennoji church is growing and we have fine audiences every Sunday. The Sunday school has been graded and reorganized and promises well.

Dr. W. E. Macklin, Nanking, China, writes: I have spent my furlongh entirely in traveling and visiting the churches, and think I have done some good, if the very kindly receptions I have had are any indication. The churches need information.

Herbert Swanson, Vigan, P. I.: I have traveled about five hundred miles in the interest of the evangelistic work since coming back from Bagnio and the auto has been a great help to me. Without it I should have been limited to much less than one-half of this amount of travel. About twenty-five sermons have been preached, through an interpreter, in the various places, mostly in the interest of the Every Member Canvass. All the churches that have pastors are now giving something toward the support of their pastors. Some that do not have pastors are offering to give if we shall be able to get men for these places. Because of the exceedingly high price of rice, and the constantly increasing cost of everything else, the pastors have had to ask for higher salaries in order to meet the bare necessities of living, and we are urging the churches to assume as much of this as possible. I think they are responding quite well considering the fact that they must meet these same high prices, and wages have not increased in the same proportion. Thus far fourteen baptisms have been reported for the month. In the Training School in Laoag we have nine girls from Ilocos, Sur and Abra. This leaves us only one Bible woman at work, but all the girls will serve during the vacation and will be more capable for the training.

The work on the new chapel in Bangued is going on merrily. When this is completed we shall have a very good building. It is 42 feet by 56 feet. The building is of brick and stone and the walls are now about nine feet high. We hope to be ready for dedication about Christmas. The Lapog congregation have also been working on their new stone chapel and have the walls well up. The hospital work goes along about as usual, but during the recent elections people did not have time to be sick and so "trade was a bit dull." There are twenty-two nurses now, five beginning their first year. The eleven graduates and seniors are taking the New Standard Teacher Training Course. We hope to give this to the Bible boys also, but do not have a class started as yet.

The Board of Temperance and Social Welfare had two men each in Ohio and Kentucky during their respective campaigns. In Ohio the meetings were held in the streets, the speakers addressing the audience from a truck. In Kentucky the meetings were held in churches and community halls.

Through an oversight the church at Bondurant, Iowa, did not appear in the list of Living Link churches in the annual report of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Miss Ina Hartsook is the Living Link Missionary of the Bondurant church. Mr. J. B. Dalton is the pastor.

The problem then, that confronts the Christian churches of America at this moment is the speedy organization of the million or more Mexicans in our land, and through them their countrymen across the border. The tremendous energy that was shown in exploration and in church building in the sixteenth century is not dead. It is in the tomb awaiting the voice of the Son of God. That energy, quickened by God's Spirit, can be used for the building of God's Kingdom in Latin America.

A recent letter from Dr. G. D. Purdy of Jamaica, tells of six baptisms at King's Gate church, and more to follow.

Mr. M. D. Clubb reports that two men were baptized at the Chinese Mission in Portland, Oregon, in October. Mrs. Crooke has been working among the women and children. There are about twenty children in the Sunday school, and from ten to fifteen coming through the week. Mrs. Crooke's work is opening doors into new homes, and women are wanting to be taught English. The need of a pastor is felt, but the work is growing. Miss Grundy has twenty men and five women in her classes. On account of their work they are compelled to come at different hours, so that she is busy all day, and until ten at night. T. Kawai, pastor of the Japanese church in Los Angeles, reports seven baptisms in November. This church observed C. W. B. M. Day with an offering of $25.

There is no doubt but that Japan is one of the most important fields for missionary endeavor at the present time because of her unchallenged leadership in the whole Orient. In spite of this, however, the work of the missionaries with the present force is not at all keeping up with the increase in population.

Bishop Roots of China, in a recent address, makes the statement that opposition to the gospel in China at the present time is no greater than that in New York City. He also states that it is the height of folly for the different communions to go on with their work in China independently impressing the different denominational tenets upon the people. He states that if Christianity is to succeed in China we must all do our planning together.

Dr. J. H. Barton of the Congregational Foreign Board, who has just returned from eight months in Famine Relief Work throughout all Turkey, is enthusiastic with regard to America taking over the mandatory of those countries. He states that the native peoples in Constantinople, Anatolia, Armenia, Georgia, and even in northern Syria, are enthusiastic for American direction. He also states that Great Britain, France, Italy and Greece would be very happy if America would undertake such direction of these stricken countries. It seems that it is going to be difficult for Great Britain or France to take over the mandatories on account of many things. The urgency of the situation is greatly magnified by the fact that none of the divisions of Turkey are able to govern themselves.

America is placed in a very favorable position because of the feeling of all that we would be disinterested, and because of the fine foundation for our possible mandatory which has been laid by the long and valuable missionary service of American missionaries in all parts of Turkey. Dr. Barton also states that there were never so many opportunities for missionary service as now. Schools are clamored for by the natives, and for the first time it has been possible to do open evangelistic work. Even the Mohammedans, in many places, do not seem to be opposed to active Christian preaching.

Dr. Cornelius Patton of Boston, who has just returned from China, states that he recently stood in an old temple, in the very niche where a two hundred and fifty pound heathen idol had formerly reposed, and that now across the niche hangs a copy of the Ten Commandments in Chinese. In this town, where many of the pagan gods have recently been destroyed, the governor of the municipality asked the native Christian pastor to take his choice of four idolatrous temples for his chapel.

The total Foreign Missionary receipts of Protestant churches in North America for the year 1919 are $30,872,000. Of this, Canada has supplied $1,500,000, leaving a balance of $29,372,000 for the United States alone. This is a great advance over former years.

While we are thinking of mandatories, let us recall the responsibility of the Disciples of Christ in a section like Nantungchow, China. The plan of the mandatory is for some nation to accept responsibility for the governmental, commercial and educational direction of a less favored nation. Our people hold the sole spiritual mandatory for Nantungchow. There are more than four millions of people and no possibility of their ever receiving Christian teaching save through representatives from our churches. What responsibilities and opportunities have come upon us and how sacredly and earnestly we should discharge our trust!

A Chinese has recently said of our missionaries and the native converts, "During the cholera epidemic it was impossible to get any one but of the Christians who were willing to care for the victims of this disease. They are not afraid of either disease or service."

Even our people on the Tibetan border are keeping in touch with the great movements of the day. Dr. Shelton writes that he was telling Lee Gway Gwang about the great plans of the Interchurch World Movement. This evangelist is an orphan whom Dr. Shelton took fifteen years ago, a little beggar from the streets, and he is half Tibetan and half Chinese. When this young pioneer preacher heard of the great plans for advance in America he said, "Well, I guess the devil must have palpitation of the heart these days."

Dr. Elliott Osgood of Chuchow, China, writes that he is giving himself very actively to the winning of a group of educated men in his town. He has steadily maintained a Bible class for these leaders and they have been very regular in attendance. Two of the very best of these educated Chinese have declared themselves definitely for Christ and a number of others have told him that the only things that hold them back are certain habits and entanglements in social life from which they cannot at once extract themselves. The good doctor states that the current of Christian teaching and conviction is getting so strong that these men cannot long withhold outstanding decision for Christ.

F. E. Livengood, a new missionary in India, thinks the Boys' School at Damoh is a real proposition. He writes of a recent visit there while studying the language: "During the morning I tagged about after Ray Rice while he put the various groups of boys to work, looked after the sick boys in the hospital, and planned with the house-father for the day's duties. If you could have been there, you would have concluded that it is no small job to be responsible for the welfare of two hundred small boys. Just before tea, two new boys about seven or eight years old, were brought in and received. At the chapel exercises in the school that day they distributed the certificates won in a recent field meet. Five schools took part and our boys won 108 points out of 216."

The missionaries at Laoag, Philippine Islands, have had the fight of their lives in a recent cholera epidemic. Miss Edith Eberle of the Girls' School tells of some of their problems: "There was so much cholera and so much to do here to keep reasonably safe. The cholera was so close to us that we were awakened in the night-time and kept anxious during the day by wailing in the homes where death had come, swift and sure. We were kept worried about our girls, getting them to take precautions, overseeing the work in the kitchen and watching the girls for any indications of disease. We kept cholera remedy on hand. I personally supervised the boiling of all the water, the scalding of all the dishes and utensils, the dipping of bananas and all vegetables in boiling water, etc. During such a siege floors must be wiped up with disinfectant, chairs all washed after a public meeting. It was hard, but the dormitory earned the reputation of being a very safe place in which to live."

America is not the only country in which great changes have come recently. One of the missionaries writes from Japan. "It is just sixteen years since I first came to Japan and I get bewildered at the new developments in government and society. Many of the thinking people are considering seriously the need of prohibition. The rice crop this year is the largest in the history of Japan and if it were all kept for food there would be no lack, but as a large part of it is made into sake and much is exported, the country is practically on a famine basis, with prices simply outrageous. The people are learning the true evils of liquor manufacture and drinking.

Recently while in a village the mayor called on me. He came to ask why the United States had passed the prohibition laws and what means had been used to secure their passage. He stated that he wishes to start an anti-sake movement in his village.

A remarkable thing has happened at Nantungchow with regard to the purchase of property by our mission. Formerly one of the most difficult tasks in China has been for outsiders to secure property. Our missions have usually waited for many years before it was possible to purchase tracts of land. Recently the official of Nantungchow selected the best plot of land for missionary school purposes and posted their proclamations stating that the school would be a great benefit for the district and that the officials would expect all owners of the land included to call at the public office in the city and receive the official price fixed for them. It is an unheard of procedure and indicates the deep interest of the Chinese leaders in the good work the missionaries are doing.

We are obliged to go to the northern tip of Japan to find a unique evidence of apostolic support in a little Christian church. In this church, the pastor begins his last Sunday evening service at twelve midnight for a young man who cannot come earlier in the evening because of the responsibility to his master. This same lad has his board paid by his master and is allowed fifty cents a week for spending. He dedicates one-half of this to the Lord as part pay on his pastor's salary. The pastor referred to is one of the oldest men we have in the ministry in Japan, but he has the largest class of young men in the northern part of the empire.

N. D. Webber of Bridgeport, Connecticut, reports that E. C. Davis, Christian Woman's Board of Missions missionary to India, brought a stirring message to his congregation in November.

F. Gaylord Roberts of Laredo, Texas, has registered the highest average attendance in the Bible school in its history during the month of November, and the church attendance also is on the increase.

The following laconic statement from the Batang, Tibet, border indicates how the high cost of living has permeated to the most remote regions of the world. "The price of wool has gone up. French agents at Adendsi are buying wool and we have to pay the same price as the Frenchmen."

Dr. Shelton writes that he has not been able to receive any medicines for two years and counts it very fortunate that there is very little sickness in Batang at the present time. It seems that the medicines have been held up by robbers and unsettled conditions and the missionaries do not know when they will receive them.

Edwin Marx of the University of Nanking, reports that the school has opened with full capacity of enrollment and a number of students turned away who could not be accommodated. He states that the Chinese students this year seem to be animated with the most serious purpose they have ever manifested and the whole student atmosphere is very stimulating.

S. T. Willis of Duluth, Minnesota, is another of many ministers to report a high water mark in the results of the Every Member Canvass for the coming year. The church at Duluth is enthusiastic over the prospect of substantial aid to come from the results of the Interchurch World Movement campaign to make possible their large building needs.

Our missionaries in India are establishing native Christian villages and communities which will be a great help in the work. In doing this the church people are grouped together so that they are not subjected to the persecution that usually comes when the Hindus turn to Christ. The mission has recently purchased a third interest in a village of over seven hundred acres, through the generosity of Mr. Foster of Missouri.

H. R. Allegood writes encouragingly from Vicksburg, Mississippi: "With fourteen additions during the past three months at regular services, and a much better interest among most of the older members; with our newly organized Christian Endeavor Society working excellently, and plans being laid for the Every Member Canvass soon, we feel confident that the next church year will be the best in the history of the Vicksburg church."

Thomas Miller of the Haverhill, Massachusetts, church sends this fine report: "Haverhill church is taking on life. Three weeks ago the Christian Endeavor held a rally and filled our house to the limit. Bible school is having a membership contest, and we are looking for great results. For the first time in many years the church is able to say, 'We pay as we go.' There is only one thing we have to work for now and that is the reducing of our mortgage, which we intend to do quickly."

O. F. McHargue of Dunkirk, New York, reports that by a successful deal recently made in real estate, the church is now in possession of property valued at from $16,000 to $20,000, on which they have an indebtedness of only $4,000. This congregation hopes very soon to become self-supporting. The church is in the center of a large foreign population and as soon as adequate equipment can be installed, they plan to do a large work in this field.

The newspapers of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, testify eloquently to the fact that W. H. Frame, pastor of the Christian Church there, is up and doing. A lengthy news item describes the extensive alterations in the interior decorations of the church, and on another date the same paper gives notice of the Sunday sermons. This energetic pastor also had the honor of preaching the sermon at the union Thanksgiving service held at the St. James Episcopal church at Baton Rouge, and the newspaper describes this sermon as "eloquent."

Frank V. Stipp of Laoag, Philippine Islands, writes in the following enthusiastic vein about their work: "There were thirty-three baptisms reported. This is the highest since my coming here more than four years ago. The Laoag central Bible school with its afternoon classes reported a high water mark of 2,550 pupils taught the Bible lesson on the last Sunday in October. The average attendance for the month in all the Bible schools of the province was 4,050. Both of these exceed all previous records in the history of the work here by about thirty-five per cent."

It is interesting to look over the monthly reports of the hospitals of the Foreign Society in mission lands. Recently one has come from Petra I. Aguinaldo, the head nurse at the hospital at Vigan, P. I., which indicates that during the month of October there were 1,834 patients treated at the hospital. Among these cases were sixteen major and forty-three minor operations. The visiting nurse called on 230 people. There were 365 surgical treatments, seventy-two laboratory examinations and the visiting nurse called in twenty-two different towns. This indicates something of the work we have done in the hospitals in mission lands.

E. B. Kemm of the Burough Park Church, Brooklyn, New York, writes: "The Christian Woman's Board of Missions and Greater New York District Conventions, which met with us November 13, were a great uplift, and were throughly enjoyed by all. Over one hundred were present at the convention dinner. Dr. H. F. La Flamme, Field Department Secretary of the Interchurch World Movement, was the speaker at the evening session. His splendid address on the Every Member Canvass was followed by a very helpful discussion. Our people are very happy over the work they have done, especially rejoicing in having given $531.45 for missions and benevolences thus far this year. And we are looking forward to a much larger work in 1920."

W. D. Crewdson, who went to a new work in Austin, Minnesota, in June, writes that there have been thirteen additions to the church since his undertaking the work, and that a splendid Christian Endeavor Society was recently organized.

H. L. Patterson of Kingsport, Tennessee, has been made District Secretary and County Chairman for his own county in the State United Budget Campaign. He reports that his Sunday school has reached an average attendance of more than a hundred.

Henry Mahon writes that he went from Lynn, Massachusetts, to Machias, Maine, where he dedicated the remodeled church at that place, to which G. W. Ford ministers. The church was dedicated free of debt, and Mr. Mahon stayed to hold a meeting in the town hall.

E. K. Van Winkle of New Kensington, Pennsylvania, reports that in a meeting held for his church by H. S. McClintock of Philipsburg, Pennsylvania, there were thirteen accessions, nine by baptism and four by letter. At the close of the meeting funds almost sufficient to pay the current amount due the Church Extension loan were raised and the balance is in sight. The congregation is much encouraged and is looking forward to great achievements during the coming year.

The following letter from H. Galt Braxton of Kingston, North Carolina, bears eloquent testimony to the new awakening that is coming to some of our churches: "We conceived the idea of remembering our own regional orphanage this year with a Thanksgiving box and our members elected to contribute an even hundred dollars in addition. So our offering for the current year for national benevolent work goes direct to Atlanta. You will rejoice with us that the offering is truly a free-will one, for it came without any exhortation but a simple announcement that we wanted to help the motherless and fatherless of our own orphanage. God is surely giving us a new vision of our stewardship in this day and though we are far from the mark of our ability in giving I am confident the tendency is upward and onward."

The churches of northern Ohio are responding to the needs of the Cleveland Christian Orphanage in a very gratifying way. The list of donations for last year makes a volume of considerable size. These donations were of the greatest variety and consisted of food, clothing, household supplies, everything that children need. It is surely to the credit of our Ohio churches that their interest in the children is so deep and thoughtful and that it finds a practical expression.

C. E. Pickett of Cadillac, Michigan, reports an excellent financial progress for his church for the past year, both in missions and in the support of the local budget. And for the coming year the church voted to increase the missionary budget sixty-two and one-half per cent. That Mr. Pickett is making his personal influence felt in the city is evidenced by the fact that the local Young Mens' Christian Association has invited him to give a course of Bible study for its members.

A. Preston Gray, Murfreesboro, Tennessee, is making himself felt in the religious life and activities of the community. He writes that during the month of November he conducted chapel service in the grammar school, addressed the vesper service at the State Normal School, addressed the Central High School, and Bradley Academy for the colored, and also attended and took part in three conferences for older boys under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The following interesting extract is made from a letter to the home office from John M. Talley of the Central Church of Hattiesburg, Mississippi: "I have eight additions to report this past month, five baptisms in the McCorkle meeting, three to take membership since our State Convention. We begin our fourth year's work under the state and national boards today. Will let contract for our new church about the tenth. We will have the best equipped house in the state when it is completed."

The following letter tells the story of an aged sister in one of our homes and the gratitude she feels toward the brotherhood for her care: "Allow me once again to thank you and the board for the many kindnesses you have extended me. I am happy as a lark this morning and from the depths of my heart I thank the Church for this beautiful ministry which brings joy to so many hearts which are bowed down with care and burdens grievous to bear. I thank those at the front who are toiling night and day for us who are perhaps unworthy of so much kindness."

The October and November donations to the Northwestern Christian Home for the Aged bear eloquent testimony to the devotion of our Northwestern churches to pure and

The offering for the aid of these 250,000 homeless victims of Mohammedan persecution will be taken in the Schools of your church as early in the new year as possible. See that your church is not silent when America responds to the appeal of the children of Bible Lands.

undefiled religion. They evidently thoroughly believe in the doctrine that he who has two coats should give to him who has none. Vegetables, flour, meat, canned goods—in fact, food supplies of all kinds were among the donations received.

The Chinese students in America have banded themselves together into an organization, and are protesting against China being made a dumping ground for American liquor.

Chas. H. Randall of California, a member of Congress, has introduced into Congress a bill to withdraw the protection of American citizenship from liquor agents who go to foreign countries to debauch native people.

Miss Viola Compton of Del Rio, Tennessee, never wearies in well doing. She is always ministering to some of the poor people who live in her neighborhood. During the month she contributed to the comfort of eleven families.

Mr. W. F. Holt recently presented the home at Long Beach with a fine Jersey cow. In writing about it Mrs. F. M. Rogers said, "I am delighted over this gift. It means so much to the enjoyment and health of our dear old people."

Our family in Massie Hall, Long Beach, California, are deeply indebted to Miss Bransley and her brother for a delightful evening's entertainment. These talented young people read and sang to the edification and enjoyment of our family.

Miss Lillian Collins of China writes that two of the girls who graduated from our Luchowfu Girls' High School last spring are teaching for us, two have entered Ginling College, and one is teaching in the government school at Luchowfu. As a Christian she has a great opportunity there.

Mr. R. A. Burriss, superintendent of the home at East Aurora, New York, is making a record in more than one direction. He has thoroughly renovated the house, thoroughly reorganized the forces, and enlisted a wide, deep sympathy among the members of the church in New York in behalf of the home. His report on garden supplies shows what a substantial contribution a little land well cultivated may make toward reducing the high cost of living. His report of donations is rendered in such a way as to account for everything. The Havens Home under his leadership is enjoying a thorough business management.

Miss Mary Irene Orvis of Beunos Aires reports that the commencement at Colegio Americano was to be on Wednesday, November 26, when the school would have its first graduate. Dr. Ernesto Nelson, late of the National Council of Education, was to deliver the address. Miss Orvis tells of the death of Dr. Craver, the president of the Theological Seminary, in which Mr. Reavis taught. Dr. Craver had been a missionary for over thirty years, and had served in Mexico, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Argentina. His wife, who shared all these years of service, survives. Dr. and Mrs. Craver have been good friends of our missionaries, and they feel his going keenly.

SIGNING THE COMPACT ON THE "MAYFLOWER"

THE signing of the Mayflower compact nearly three hundred years ago was the beginning of free government in the new world, and marks the second great step in individual liberty. The Mayflower compact was the first written constitution in the new world. It was an agreement by which all citizens pledged themselves in the presence of God and one another to enact such laws as they might need and to which they promised strict obedience.

Iceland was the first nation to vote complete prohibition. This happened in 1908.

In 1904, in Ceylon, 190,000 Singalese signed the total abstinence pledge but their inclination was not recognized by the British-governing officials.

In Ohio, under license, pauperism increased during the past fifty years 138 per cent, whereas Maine under prohibition decreased its pauperism 145 per cent.

The religious leaders among the Mohammedans, Buddhists, Brahmins, and Parsees, teach their members to abstain from alcoholic liquors. These organizations embrace one-half the population of the world. Outside traders, however, are breaking down these habits in India, China, Japan, Persia, Turkey, and Africa.

Mr. Daniels, manager of the "Carry Ice Cream Factory" of Washington City, a factory which makes one-fourth of the ice cream for Washington, said in an interview with some Englishmen recently, that "the consumption of ice cream in Washington had doubled since the coming of prohibition." He said further that he could take any brewery and with slight changes could manufacture ice cream and pay larger dividends on money invested than could be paid in the manufacture of malt liquors. For example, he said that the yearly output of this plant while being used as a brewery was worth $715,000. Its yearly output of ice cream products will be worth $1,050,000.

Dr. G. L. Hagman writes: "I note in my article on "The Healing of China" in the January number of WORLD CALL an oversight. It should have read in the first paragraph 'Our Mission now has hospitals in Nanking (Union), Chuchow, Luchowfu and Nantungchow.' I am very sorry the omission of the Chuchow hospital occurred. Many of your readers know of Dr. Osgood's many years of devoted service there."

T. Newton Hill, Bina, India, writes: "We appreciate very much being here with Mr. and Mrs. Elsam. The advice of older missionaries may save many serious mistakes. They understand the people very well indeed. We hope to be able to make our contribution to the work here. The people seem very friendly. They buy books, and in many ways there are evidences of Christian influence. We do need a doctor here. At present we have an Indian doctor, and the work is going very well. He seems to have a good missionary spirit and is very well qualified for the work, but he cannot take the place of a fully trained and devoted American or European medical missionary, and he cannot begin to meet the need for a woman doctor. We went out to camp November 10, returning November 20. The tents, etc., were loaded on carts. One broke down before leaving the bungalow, but there was no more trouble. We camped near a big village and preached there and in the villages near. We preached to several hundreds, and the compounder gave out medicine to over a hundred. One man, the son of a village priest, who will in time succeed his aged father, bought a New Testament. Usually the people buy single Gospels or song books at half a cent each. Mrs. Hill and the Bible woman she had with her, found their hands full going to different sections of the one big village. The fall rains now prevent our going out with carts. A Ford run-a-bout truck combination would do it all right."

Dr. Mary Longdon was taken from Bilaspur to Damoh, and is there now under Dr. Mary McGavran's care. We are thankful, indeed, for her improved condition. It will be some time before she is able to go back to her work at Pendra Road. Miss Ivalu Andrus, the young nurse who went out to India in 1918, is cheerfully and bravely doing her best for the situation at the Sanitarium at Pendra Road. She felt that she had been dropped into a new world when she reached the Sanitarium bungalow, in the midst of the jungle, at midnight. There was no one but the compounder who could explain things in English, and his work has nothing to do with the Sanitarium proper. Miss Andrus thinks that every missionary should know everything about everything, especially when she is located in an isolated place. Many things she once knew, but had not used for years, she has found very helpful in this situation. Mrs. Madsen is very kind and helpful, but the Madsen bungalow is one and a half miles from the Sanitarium. Miss Andrus writes, "We are the only missionaries in this district for miles and miles and miles, and we are only able to reach out a little on either hand."

"FEED THE PROFS"

So yelled the students of Cornell as they recently paraded the streets in protest against the low salaries of their teachers. The salaries of teachers in colleges must be increased at once because

I. Economic Justice Requires It

Negro porters in hotels, scavengers of the streets in cities, unskilled ditch diggers, and hod carriers are receiving more pay than most of the trained, consecrated teachers in Disciple colleges.

The treatment of teachers in Disciple colleges is the outstanding economic crime of the Church.

II. Saving a Profession Demands It

College teachers are leaving the profession in alarming numbers because they cannot live on the salaries paid. Teachers in church colleges are being offered large increases to go to tax-supported institutions. President Neilson of Smith College says:

"We are facing the elimination of a profession."

III. College Existence Compels It

It is not too much to say that the very existence of the church college depends upon an immediate substantial increase in teachers' salaries. President Schurman of Cornell in speaking of teachers' salaries, recently declared: "Nothing less than the future of American civilization is at stake."

Yale, Princeton, Harvard, Smith, Cornell, and others are raising millions for salaries alone. What are the Disciples doing?

The Story of Zanig Manongian

ZANIG MANONGIAN is a beautiful Armenian girl about fifteen years of age. She was reared in a comfortable home in Tokat, a village near Samsun on the Black Sea. Her mother died before the Armenian atrocities began in connection with the late war, so that Zanig, as the oldest daughter, was both sister and mother to her two sisters and baby brother.

When the order came to Tokat that all Armenians must go to the desert, the men were taken first, with their hands bound behind them. Mr. Manongian, although a prosperous merchant, was led away with the others and his children never saw him again. To the young girl now fell the hard lot of being both father and mother to the terror-stricken children, but she was strong and brave and she managed to secrete upon her person a considerable sum of money. Later, when the women and children were called out to start the long journey, Zanig would often carry small children a considerable distance for a piaster and the earned sums enabled her to increase her funds with which she purchased food whenever the occasion presented itself for her little brother and sisters.

A brutal soldier one day discovered that she had money upon her person, which led to her being thoroughly searched and robbed of all that she had, including her clothes. Clad only in rags she was obliged to continue her weary march, unable to secure for the family dependent upon her those supplies which were so essential. The two sisters grew weaker and weaker, and when disease swept through the company they both sickened and died, their poor starved bodies being left unburied on the sands of the desert.

At last the caravan came to the river Euphrates. The boys were bade line up on the banks of the river, Zanig's little brother being taken among the rest. Here the soldiers seized them and, wading part way out into the swift stream, threw them far out into the water, where the most of them were drowned. A few managed to scramble out upon the opposite bank, but strain her eyes as best she could, Zanig could not discern her brother.

After this her story was full of her own awful experiences which through three long years she endured in common with tens of thousands of the Armenian girls. At last she was lodged in the tent of an old Arab woman, who was kind to her and helped to nurse her back to health and strength. One night, bidding her kind friend good-bye, she slipped away and started for the north alone over the desert. Traveling chiefly at night and sleeping and hiding by day, she at last came to Aleppo, where the Near East Relief station received her.

She had been in Aleppo almost a year when I saw her and had been so well cared for that her face was again plump and fair, though it bears the branded marks of the Turkish harem. As she looked at me with her soft, brown eyes, I could see a pathos in them indescribably sad that will never pass away.

Her first ambition is to find her brother if he did not perish that day in the river, and then she told me that she wanted to be a teacher among her own people.

MARCH, 1920 10 CENTS

China for Christ Movement Organized to Cooperate with the Interchurch World Movement At a Conference in Shanghai, December 16-20, 1919

FROM the New York office of the Interchurch World Movement came a call to the China Continuation Committee asking the latter to act for them in placing the world movement of the churches before China. Knowing that the Chinese Church as well as the missionaries were desiring at this time some comprehensive, united movement for the winning of China to Christ, the China Continuation Committee sent out a call to one hundred prominent Chinese Christian leaders and representative missionaries asking them to meet for the consideration of how best to launch this large movement and coordinate it with the Interchurch World Movement.

The results of the conference were gratifying to every individual in attendance far beyond the most sanguine expectations. The Chinese leaders, though slightly in the minority, were decidedly the most influential factor in the conference. The missionaries were eager to follow their lead which was statesmanlike and fully awake to the needs of the church and the nation at the present time. They insisted that the China for Christ Movement should be thoroughly loyal to the principles of Christianity and at the same time make a strong appeal to the patriotism of the Chinese. The salvation of China politically, economically, and socially is to be found in Christ. They assured the conference that such a movement would be financed heartily by the Chinese Church.

The present Interchurch National Missionary Society, working especially in Yunnan Province, has in a wonderful way enlisted the sympathy and support of the churches of China. There is every reason to believe that the new and larger movement will receive even more hearty support. At the suggestion of the Chinese present the conference voted requesting the Chinese chairman, David Yui, and the Chinese secretary of the Continuation Committee, Cheng Ching-yi, to act as a nucleus of the committee to launch the new movement for the accomplishment of the large amount of work outlined by the seven commissions of this conference appointed to consider the various phases of Christian activity demanded in China at the present time. Cheng Ching-yi was asked to be permanent chairman of the new Movement and of its Executive Committee. The Chinese alone in the Conference in a few minutes subscribed $4,000 a year for the support of an assistant for Dr. Cheng.

This whole movement is essentially of the Chinese. They, however, earnestly request the missionaries to take membership in the organization, and wish one-half the membership of their Executive Committee to be foreign. Thus it is evident that the great Church of Christ in China is in hearty accord with the missionary and his plan for the work, and the future relationships will be most cordial. The missionaries, as was so repeatedly and strongly emphasized in the conference, rejoice in the present opportunity to serve as assistants while the Chinese Christians take the leading positions in the China for Christ Movement.

It was a delight to us all to find this fine spirit prevailing as between Chinese leaders and the missionaries, and the splendid unity of spirit, purpose and plan of the Episcopalian bishops and Southern Baptist leaders; Presbyterians, and Congregationalists; American, English, and Continental churches, all praying and planning together as absolutely one body. It was distinctly understood that we were not framing up a plan of church union. However, it was clear in everyone's mind that the way to attain unto fuller unity is first to work together as brothers, and this we planned for in the fullest and most vital sense. It can be no surprise to the Christian statesman who is looking into the future if this China for Christ Movement becomes the actual working, efficient center of the Chinese Church of Christ which is to be.

We have some copies of WORLD CALL for 1919 still on hand and will be glad to supply any missing numbers of volume I except the March number.

If you do not receive your WORLD CALL by the tenth of the month will you please let us know? We want to supply the missing number and to correct the mistake if it is in the mailing list so that you will receive the next number on time.

Will you send all literature orders to the Literature Departments of the Boards? When literature orders are received at the WORLD CALL office they must be sent on to the office of the Board and this often delays literature orders for a day or two.

In sending change of address, please remember it is necessary that we have both the old and new address before the change can be made.

Canadian subscribers are urged to remit by money order. The exchange is very unfavorable and with the extra cost of postage for Canada it is impossible for us to carry the cost of exchange.

If you are pleased with WORLD CALL do not be content with passing it on to your neighbor. Get him to subscribe for the magazine. Subscription envelopes will be furnished upon request.

Will you not reply promptly to the expiration notices so that we need not remove your name from the mailing list? We feel sure that you intend to renew and that you do not wish to miss a single copy of WORLD CALL.

All subscriptions and remittances for same should be addressed WORLD CALL, 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana.

"How Can You Publish World Call for $1.00 a Year?"

WE CANNOT!

But we are not going to advance the subscription price until July 1, 1920.

Then it will be $1.50 a year, in advance.

Until then new subscriptions or renewals on those expiring before October 1, 1920, will be taken at the dollar rate, but each for only one year.

This proposition should bring in at once thousands of subscriptions to include the numbers covering the campaign of the Interchurch World Movement.

There is no surer way of enlisting people in this great enterprise than by getting them to read WORLD CALL.

Frank L. Johnson Murdered by Turks

MR. JOHNSON was the husband of Esther Trendley. When he went to the war front in Y. M. C. A. service, she came to the headquarters of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and did fine work as a secretary, not only with the Young Women's Circles, but also in the general field.

When he consented to go to the Near East for longer service she gave up her work here that she might be with him or near him.

A cablegram received as WORLD CALL goes to press says that he was murdered by Turkish brigands while in charge of American relief for the starving people near Aintab, Syria.

Dress on the Colors!

IN what seems now like ancient and minor history, it is related how, at the critical moment in the Spanish-American War, when the American forces attacking San Juan hill were wavering, the color sergeant ran forward with the flag lifted high above his head and cried, "Dress on the Colors, Boys, Dress on the Colors!" The line came up with a rush and never hesitated again until the goal was reached.

Not Wavering, Just Waiting

The Christian forces of North America have never yet advanced in any adequate fashion to the conquest of the world. The missionary ranks are little more than a skirmish line. The hour for decisive action has come on every field of the world. The urgency of the situation has moved the Protestant Christians of the United States to earnest and effective cooperation in the Interchurch World Movement. The call has gone out for 100,000 new ministers and missionaries and $1,300,000,000 in five years. In view of the magnitude of the undertaking, both its world-wide scope and its inclusion of all church efforts in missions, benevolence and education, and considering both the numbers and wealth of the churches involved, neither figure is large. Yet many are hesitating, like Peter face to face with the missionary vision on the housetop at Joppa, and repeating his doubtful, "Lord, I never did."

All that is needed is for some stout-souled Gideon or Deborah to arise in each congregation and cry, "Dress on the Colors, Brethren, Dress on the Colors."

The Simple Solution of a Baffling Problem

The minister is the color bearer of the congregation. In spite of the utter inadequacy of his salary, the proportion of his giving is usually so far beyond the average of his church that, if all would come up to his standard, all the money needed to meet the goals of the Interchurch World movement would be provided immediately. Of course many should give two and some five times the percentage of their income that the minister gives, and one in a hundred will do so when he sees the necessity. These will balance the stragglers who refuse to give.

In a way the Church has had this idea for a long time. For instance, when it was proposed that the congregation have a Living Link Missionary, the minister said, "I will give $50." After a few minutes the wealthy elder followed with, "Put me down for $50." Then the prosperous deacon got into line with an equal amount, and some zealous youth tither, with silent indignation in his heart, did the same. After that the rest of the church trailed along with 25's, 10's, 5's and 1's until the required total was made up, the doxology was sung and a telegram sent to headquarters.

The idea was fine, but the pledges should have been graduated by percentages of income rather than in flat sums. People of ordinary intelligence can be made to see this readily.

Not Banners But Armies Win Victories

As the preacher is the color bearer of the local church so the missionary carries the standard of the entire brotherhood. To come up to the minister's measure of giving will provide all the money needed. To match the missionary's consecration of life will insure all the workers that are demanded. Again it is not a matter of level and mechanical following, but the intelligent application of a principle—readiness to go or stay as the Divine will may seem to dictate. Only a small percentage of our young people ought to become ministers or missionaries, but all ought to be willing to do so. In some cases a higher degree of consecration is required to stay at home than to go. Cheerful readiness to accept conscription may be really a finer state of mind than headlong volunteering. The volunteer comes first and is always the pioneer. We have passed that stage in missions. This is the day for universal understanding of the task and unanimous readiness to undertake it, wherever and however each one may serve best.

The Church Is One—And Better Than We Know!

These are not far off, impossible ideals. People are better than they get credit for being; better than they realize themselves to be. Ministers and missionaries are bone of the church's bone, flesh of the church's flesh, even heart of the church's heart. The Disciples of Christ, of all people, should be done with the unscriptural distinction that has grown up between minister and member. The New Testament knows no "clergy" and "laity," no double standard of consecration. All are "kings and priests unto God." "Having gifts differing" there are naturally different functions for the members, but the Church of Christ is still one household, even one body, and that the holy body of Christ!

Let us dare to expect all Christians to be Christians! And let us not wait for later events but begin the first Sunday of March.

Twofold Victory Is in Sight

"The money that belongs by every right to God but is kept back from Him by His people, is probably the greatest hindrance to vital spirituality that there is in the world today."

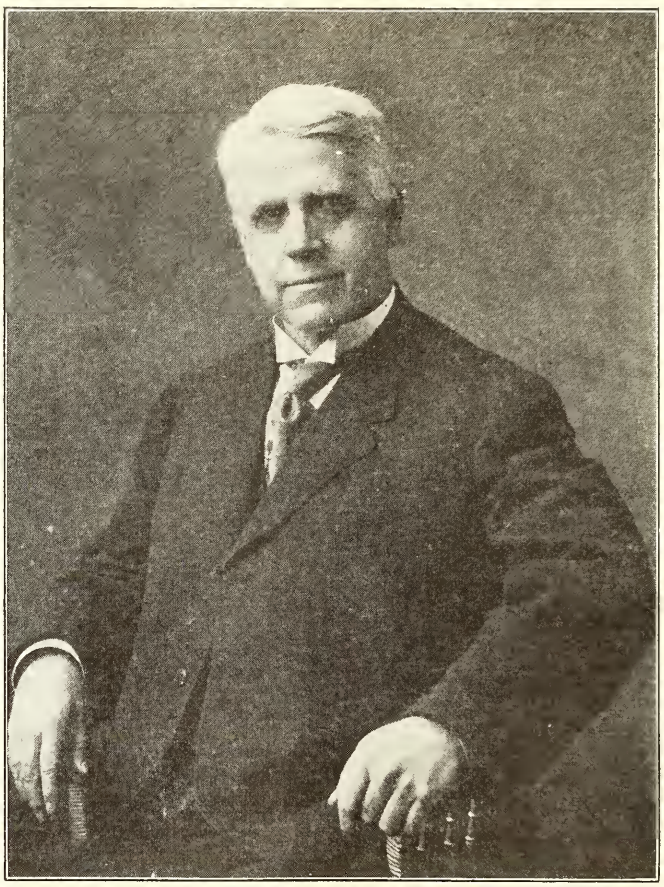
Keeping back God's money keeps back God's workers and dwarfs the souls of those who deny His claims. So reversing the process "opens the windows of heaven" and not only supplies men and money for every work of God, but also enriches the souls of all who give.

"Unto the Uttermost Parts of the Earth"

By W. R. WARREN

THE jovial elder had taken the young preacher and the distinguished visitor home to Sunday dinner after a sermon that was a high and impassioned presentation of the absolute obligation of the church to give the gospel to all the world. The entire congregation had been awed and convinced, though most of them probably had no very definite ideas as to what should be done about it. The task seemed too big, too distant and too strange for any but an enthusiast and a specialist like the visitor to take definitely to heart.

Not so the young preacher. To him the sermon had been the voice of God's prophet calling him to go "far hence unto the Gentiles." There was a great peace in his soul because of his definite purpose to obey the voice and go to China as soon as his college debt could be paid. The visitor's presence and voice had stirred vivid memories of the same great man's sermons and addresses at college, all bearing with single-minded, burning concentration upon the supreme obligation and the immediate necessity of foreign missions. These flaming messages had been the chief human factor in turning him from law to the ministry. Now it was a holy privilege to hear again this Elijah of the new day, who seemed a voice out of the future rather than the past, but none the less high, solitary and austere on that account.



Archibald McLean, President of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society; Vice-President of the United Christian Missionary Society.

The preacher and the elder and all other hearers were of one mind not only as to the visitor's complete absorption in foreign missions as the ruling passion of his life, but also as to his encyclopedic knowledge both of the Scriptures and of missionary history. He seemed able to quote any passage in the Bible with readiness and accuracy and he appeared to be equally familiar with every person and event in the whole world of missionary activity, from William Carey down to the last recruit.

Arrived at the elder's home and rejoiced with the six-cylinder dinner provided by the elder's wife, the conversation thawed out, and some one mentioned with scorn Ward McAllister's book, "Society As I Have Found It." (For the benefit of the present generation it may be said that Ward McAllister was the arbiter of fashion in his day, the organizer of "the 400," the Beau Brummell of 1890.) To the threefold amazement of all present the visitor remarked, "There are some good things in that book. I have read it." The jovial elder was an admirer of Mark Twain and naturally betrayed the fact in his conversation. Thereupon the visitor ventured, "Mark Twain's 'Scrap Book' is the best thing he ever did!" "I never read that," said the elder, perplexed by his oversight. The young preacher happened to be able to join in the visitor's laughter, as did the elder and his family after it was explained how the great and lazy humorist had devised a scrap book of ready-gummed leaves that needed only to be moistened to seize and hold a clipping.

Having learned that the distinguished visitor was a human being as well as a crusader and a scholar, the conversation went on merrily and henceforth the young preacher, like thousands of others who have made the same discovery, always thought of A. McLean with affection as well as admiration. And like these thousands of others also he found the great man as ready to give as to receive affection, a very genius at loving; a man who loves the people whom he has seen even more than the heathen whom he has not seen and yet cannot ignore.

It takes a huge heart as well as a great intellect to carry Mr. McLean's intimate acquaintance with the hosts of people whom he cherishes all over North America and "unto the uttermost parts of the earth." (Who could ever pronounce those words with such meaning as he puts into them?)

That same young preacher was standing by him at the National Convention which was held in an armory at Kansas City a quarter of a century or so ago. It happened that in succession several men approached who were well known to the y. p. and he ventured to introduce them to the secretary of the Foreign Society. It couldn't be done. He seemed to have known all of them from their childhood. Each one he greeted with a double handshake and a smile that could never be counterfeited. "How is Elizabeth?" "Is John well?" "How are the twins?"

It developed that for years he had been making annual visits to each of our church colleges and not merely delivering addresses before the students, but also getting personally acquainted with them, and particularly with those who were preparing for the ministry. At other seasons he was attending state conventions, arriving at the first, staying to the last, and commending with rapt attention as well as generous handclasp and spoken appreciation each speaker's effort. And all of this was done with keen discrimination and complete sincerity.

It is related that in his presence some one protested against being put on a convention program, saying, "I can't do myself justice on such brief notice!" This moved the McLean to say, "Young man, it is not justice but mercy that you want!"

For years two or three months preceding each March offering were spent in missionary rallies. The standardized method was to spend one day each in a wide circuit of leading churches. Ministers and members from nearby churches were invited in to take part. Each rally was a miniature national convention. Four parts the "Bishop" always took, the hanging of the maps and charts, the opening Scripture reading and exposition and prayer, the exhibition of curios from many mission fields, and the selling of missionary books. Usually two men accompanied him on these strenuous tours of daily meetings and nightly travel; one a missionary, the other a younger secretary or a missionary. "Where the Book Speaks," one of the most valuable volumes from Mr. McLean's pen, was made up of these Bible lessons and was published in response to the insistent demand of those who heard them in the rallies, including his comrades who heard a different one each morning. This book is used as a textbook by Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer at Cairo, Egypt. The fifth edition of it has been exhausted. Those who have wondered that so much teaching on missions could be discovered in the Bible will be interested to know that another volume of the same character is ready for the press, and many can testify in advance of publication that the new book will not be inferior to the former one.

There was always a rich sense of humor as well as a supreme devotion to the Kingdom to relieve the strain of hard travel, baggage-carrying and loss of sleep. The women of the churches visited graciously provided luncheon. Naturally the meat was often cold ham. At daylight one bitter winter morning the missionary trio reached Youngstown, Ohio. As they left the station they met a drove of hogs. Turning to Mr. Rioch, Mr. McLean said, "David, do you suppose they are going to the rally?" Another time at 3 a. m. he broke the silence with, "And the people who oppose missionary societies are in bed and asleep!" When the hanging of the maps and charts was as difficult as fitting a stovepipe he would speak with grim cheerfulness of "the total depravity of inanimate things."

When there was no other sort of campaigning in progress the Sundays were spent visiting churches and the weekdays at the office in the manifold work of the Society. These Sunday visits gave another chance for fellowship with ministers and other members of the churches, especially in the old days before hospitality was routed by the hotels.

The ties formed "in journeyings oft" were strengthened by correspondence and by intercession. The veteran leader's relation with the missionaries is especially rich, as anyone can understand who has seen him introduce the representatives of all the far fields at a national convention, but more particularly if he has attended the annual breakfast which Mr. McLean gives to the missionaries on Sunday morning of each convention. Incidentally it has become known that along with reading a chapter from the New Testament in Greek, an unfailing item of each day's life is prayer for each missionary by name.

Remembering these facts against the background of childhood without a mother, youth from the age of twelve away from home and manhood wedded only to his God-given task, we can appreciate this Christmas card sent to Box 884 a few years ago by John E. and Jessie Brown Pounds:

"A lonely man at Christmas time?
The thought but comes and quick departs;
Your hearthfires burn the world around,
Your home is in a thousand hearts!"

More than once he has been heard to recall how Browning said, "Open my heart and you will see graved within it 'Italy'," and to declare, "So you will find 'Bethany' engraved in my heart." Many things conspired with his fervidly loyal Scotch nature to make it so; his years of previous loneliness in Boston, the flowering of his lifelong purpose to preach the gospel, the influence of President Pendleton, Professor Loos and other rare spirits who carried high the torch they had so recently received from the school's illustrious founder, the fellowship of kindred spirits among the students, his far-seeing appreciation of the supreme importance of Christian education.

Thirty years ago the trustees of Bethany insisted on his becoming president of the college. For two and a half years he filled the post with distinction, but without giving up the secretaryship of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, to which he felt constrained to return with all his power, having employed P. T. Kilgour to help him keep up the Society's work in the meantime.

Since its establishment in 1909 Mr. McLean has been one of the staunchest supporters of the College of Missions at Indianapolis. A course of lectures delivered there has been published under the title, "Epoch Makers of Modern Missions." Not only among Disciples of Christ, but in widening circles beyond, this book has been received with great favor. It is used as a textbook by both the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States.

On graduating from Bethany College in 1874 the young minister became pastor of the church at Mt. Healthy, a small suburb of Cincinnati. That year he witnessed the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The next year he took an unnoticed part in the founding of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Isaac Errett as president of the young and feeble organization was not slow to recognize the younger man's promise and Mr. McLean was equally quick to discern the editor's greatness of mind and soul.

In 1882 he was elected corresponding secretary of the Foreign Society. For five years he carried both the Society and the Mt. Healthy Church. Then the growth of the missionary work justified full time service, which he has given ever since, except for the Bethany presidency as indicated above. Until 1900 he was secretary of the Society; since then he has been its president.

His statesmanlike grasp of situations in the large is manifest in many ways. Look at the maps. All of the Society's fields have been chosen under his leadership, and each of them is central and strategic. Review the history of the Men and Millions Movement and the Million Dollar Campaign of the Foreign Society that went before it. Mr. McLean never was a promoter, but, as was manifest in his superb cooperation with F. M. Rains as well as with A. E. Cory, he knows how both to build the spiritual structure that justifies promotion and to provide the support, both moral and material, without which all promotion must fail.

He thinks in continental terms and his soul is great enough to subordinate his personal feelings, Scotch and intense as they are, to the supreme ends of the Kingdom of God. The Missionary Intelligencer had been a darling of his heart for thirty years, but he allowed it to be merged into WORLD CALL. The Foreign Society itself, with its hundreds of missionaries on five great world fields, its millions of dollars invested in every sort of missionary property and institution, its loyal constituency and its annual income approaching a million dollars, is his achievement, as truly as the success of American arms in Europe was John J. Pershing's. It has never sent out a missionary without the blessing of his hand. It has never employed a secretary without the sagacity of his choice. (And what a superb succession these secretaries make: F. M. Rains, Stephen J. Corey, A. E. Cory, R. A. Doan, Bert Wilson, C. M. Yocum; and the treasurer, C. W. Plopper, and Lucy King De Moss without title.) It has never suffered an insult that did not pierce his heart. But he takes a foremost part in reducing it to a memory by helping to organize the United Christian Missionary Society, and promptly embalms that memory in the "History of the Foreign Christian Missionary Soicety," a wonderful story of the gospel's progress both in the hearts of those who send it and in the souls of those who receive it. With the modesty of greatness the author's vital place in the society appears only by inference.

Archibald McLean's face is toward the morning as it has been all the forty-six years of his ministry in the gospel. Once in the sympathetic atmosphere of the Student's Missionary Society, precursor of the Volunteer Band at Bethany, he told at some length of the apathy and even opposition to missions which he encountered and exclaimed in the agony of his soul, "I shall die ten years before my time because of the slowness of our people." He has given up that notion now. He should reach the age of ninety-five, attained by his father. The Missionary progress now rejoices his heart, but never exceeds his expectation. Those who work with him take his essential youth as a matter of course, like that of Bert Wilson.

It is not the granite of Prince Edward Island but the unfailing practice of the presence of God that has kept A. McLean a beloved and honored leader unto the third generation of God's people. The Bible is a vivid reality to him and its timeless freshness enriches his speech. Prayer is the other hemisphere of his communion with God. It is more than a habit or a practice; it is the very breath of life to his soul. It is so integral to his life that the sublimest lessons which he brings from God's word are reinforced rather than discounted by the most intimate association with him.

With the Missionaries in Mexico

IT was a very interesting journey our missionaries had down into the "heart of Mexico." Delayed from one date to another in getting the many-sided plans made, they started from Piedras Negras, which is across the Rio Grande from Eagle Pass, Texas, on the morning of December 14, 1919. There was a company of more than fifty, made up of our missionaries, our Mexican preachers and teachers and our twenty-five orphan children who came out of Mexico with the missionaries when the revolution made it necessary. This made a good car load. Another car carried the household belongings of the travelers.

One of the missionaries wrote: "We had communion service on the train that Sunday afternoon, I presume the only communion service ever held on a train in Mexico. It was a beautiful service and all were conscious that God was leading us and protecting us."

Monday afternoon, December 15, the company arrived in San Luis Potosi and spent the night there comfortably in the school building. A part of the group were left there to put into operation the beginnings of a work which we believe is to be a great power for good in Mexico. The larger number went on to Aguascalientes, where just as great opportunities awaited their efforts.

Our work will be confined largely to these two cities for this year. Zacatecas, just as needy and with perhaps as great opportunities, must wait till our force of workers is larger. We are hoping that within a year we may make a beginning there. Many towns throughout the surrounding territory must be reached just as rapidly as our people make it possible by their gifts of life and money. Something near a million and a quarter of people are accessible to our workers.

Among our missionaries on this field Miss Elma Irelan has had longest service. Miss Pearl Gibbons has served several years and Miss Elizabeth Fuller is a new missionary this last year from the College of Missions. Mr. E. T. Cornelius has been in the work nearly three years and Mr. and Mrs. Moody Edwards nearly two. We have now at the College of Missions nine in preparation for this field. Perhaps five of them will go this year to their work. Mr. and Mrs. Emerson Hines, who have been at the College of Missions several years, are now taking a special course in agriculture at the Indiana state school. They will be ready for an important part in this great field in the summer of 1921.

Our outlook for doing a large service for our neighbor republic to the south was never so great as now. In the years past we have loved and served Mexico, but our people have never generously supported the work. We think this was because they did not see the opportunity for an outstanding helpful influence, nor did they realize Mexico's need. In several ways the need and the opportunity have been impressed upon our thought and upon our hearts of late. Our opportunity is now greater than it has ever been. Our real love for Mexico and her people is now to be put to the test.

Day schools were opened by our workers at both San Luis Potosi and at Aguascalientes on the seventh of January. In the former place, during the first two weeks, about eighty were enrolled and in the latter, seventy-five. Night classes with some fine business men in attendance are being conducted and there is a real appeal for teachers of English. The people must kindly welcome our earnest helpers.

In another article in this issue you will read of the baptism administered on New Year's day at Aguascalientes and of the group that later made the good confession. From San Luis Potosi Mr. Edwards reports seven confessions at one time "as the first fruits of our labors here." The Sunday schools are gathering power and influence.

The missionaries are enthusiastic about the possibilities and troubled only because of the increased cost of everything necessary to put our buildings into order and to equip them as they ought to be for real efficiency. Then, too, they plead for more workers, for all around them are the fields white for the harvest.

One of the missionaries, who has struggled for four years with poor, makeshift plans for caring for our fine group of orphan girls, writes: "It is wonderful to be at home at last, though much is lacking yet in our arrangements and equipment. The packing time was hard and the problems of taking all those girls on such a trip were trying. God has been good to us and we are here with our minister and our teachers." Read her appeal for the privilege of caring for more of the needy and promising children of that section.

Another missionary speaks of his commitment to taking to the people there the liberty, light and love of Christ for which they have an insatiable longing. He speaks of the inexhaustible resources of the region, yet to be developed and of the wonderful climate in which they live. He adds: "May I plead for the gospel to be given to these more than a million people and pray for those who would hinder such a movement."

In San Luis Potosi we have two school buildings with residential graduates of considerable proportions. We also own the stone church building pictured on page forty-nine of the September issue of WORLD CALL, and another church building about two blocks away. At Aguascalientes our property consists of a roomy residential school building with a fine vacant lot connected. Here in the not distant future we should erect a modern school building. We also own a church and parsonage there. Much repair has to be put on these latter buildings, but they will serve a good purpose when they are put in order properly.

Our missionaries will keep us all in close touch with themselves and with the work as it progresses. We shall not fail them in all their efforts and in the big problems that are theirs to solve.

The Education Survey of the Interchurch World Movement

THE survey which is being made of the institutions of higher learning in the United States by the Department of American Education of the Interchurch World Movement is at once more interesting and significant than any such piece of work ever undertaken before. In fact, no such universal and thoroughgoing survey was ever attempted previously. When the survey is completed, which includes church colleges, independent colleges, state universities, independent universities, theological seminaries and training schools, academies and private secondary schools, it will contain a mass of information the like of which can be found nowhere else, nor in all other places combined in this country. It goes without saying that when this great bulk of facts and information is classified and digested, it will constitute a compendium of knowledge regarding higher education that will be invaluable.

In making the survey, there was sent to each college and university an elaborate questionnaire, comprising some forty pages and covering every phase of the institution's life and history. The main purpose of the survey is to discover the capacity for and disposition to train young men and women for distinctly Christian service. This again is the first time in the history of American education when an attempt has been made to get at the essential facts in this fundamental matter.

It is evident to all that trained Christian leadership is absolutely essential to the consummation of a world program for Christianity. This being true, it is well to know something of the training camps now existing and those which are possible for the training of the officers of God's army of conquering heroes who are to make Christ king throughout the earth. It it also imperative that we know the needs of these training camps in order that we may make them effective for this all-important task.

The last page of the questionnaire sent to church colleges and other schools under church control, connected with Boards of Education, calls for an estimate of needs to bring the institution up to a standard of efficiency. The standard used by which institutions are to measure their needs is one established by the Association of American Colleges, an organization made up, for the most part, of colleges under church control or auspices. It is the one college organization in America which represents the educational interests of the church in the field of higher education. A committee was appointed by the Association composed of experts, to work out a standard or norm, of what it takes on the financial side to build and operate a church college efficiently. The committee spent three years of hard labor on this subject and formulated. not by theory but by taking actual college budgets and making comparisons and cross sections, certain norms. There are two, called a "minimum" and an "efficient" college.

The "minimum" college is an institution enrolling one hundred students of college rank and the "efficient" college one that enrolls five hundred students of college rank. The terms "minimum" and "efficient" are taken as a matter of convenience and are not to be interpreted literally. They are used simply to denote attendance and do not have reference to the relative value of institutions. The fact is an institution of one hundred students might be more efficient than one of five hundred. The norms set up mean that it takes so much in resources and faculties to make a college efficient, no matter whether it belongs to the "minimum" or the "efficient" classification so far as students are concerned. This standard as established by the Association of American Colleges is now accepted everywhere in educational circles as the true norm by which institutions are to be judged as to resources for making them efficient.

Using this standard as a basis, the colleges were asked to submit to the Interchurch World Movement an estimate of needs to make them efficient on the basis of present student enrollment and to provide for the growth of the next five years. The colleges and schools of the Disciples of Christ holding membership in the Board of Education accordingly submitted askings as per the request of the survey blanks.

Those askings totaled $55,783,450. That is to say, it would take that amount of money to bring the colleges and institutions of higher learning which we now have up to the Association standard and provide for the normal growth during the next five years.

After these askings had been submitted, the secretaries of the boards of education of the various communions participating in the Interchurch World Movement met in New York City on December 16-19, 1919, and reviewed the askings of the colleges. At this New York meeting the norms by which the college askings should be reviewed were carefully considered and revised. Instead of providing for any growth during the next five years, the Boards were asked to cut down the askings of the colleges to a point where the amounts asked for will simply make the colleges efficient upon the basis of the present needs, making no allowance for future growth in student bodies. The following are the norms finally decided upon by which the askings of the various institutions were revised.

In order that the educational budgets of the various denominations may be reasonably consistent it is agreed by the Council of Church Boards of Education that the askings of the various denominational colleges shall be reviewed by board secretaries and that the following principles shall be applied in making such reviews:

1. That the "minimum" and the "efficient" college (except that the figures for income and endowment should be increased approximately 50 per cent on account of the high cost of living) be made the norm by which the askings of standard colleges shall be tested by boards connected with this Council, the number of college students to determine whether a particular institution shall be classified as "minimum" or "efficient" or in between.

In accordance with this norm, the "minimum" standard college and the "efficient" standard college should have the following personnel, income and assets:

	Minimum	Efficient
Personnel
Students	100	500
Faculty	10	50
Income
From endowment or gifts (exclusive of receipts from tuition or fees)	$30,000	$165,000
Assets
Campus and buildings	$300,000	$900,000
Equipment	50,000	85,000
Endowment	600,000	3,300,000
	$950,000	$4,285,000

2. That junior colleges or colleges which, though they bestow academic degrees, fall below the usual requirements of a standard college, shall not be endorsed for more than sufficient to bring them up to the income called for and the amount required for buildings, equipment, and endowment as listed under the "minimum" college.

3. That the askings of academies for income and endowment shall not be approved beyond an amount sufficient to bring their income from endowment up to $10,000 annually or their total productive endowment to more than $200,000.

4. That the amount to be sought for each institution during the first year of the five year campaign shall include:

(a) A sum for current expenses which, when added to the receipts of the institution for endowment, shall make its total income from sources other than tuition or fees equal to 5 per cent of the total amount of endowment sought for said institution.

(b) One-fifth of the amount which, by the application of principle No. 1, is allotted to the institution as necessary for buildings, equipment and endowment.

(c) The guiding principle controlling recommendations (a) and (b) is that each institution should be provided with an adequate sum for current expenses during the first year, but that the amount sought for buildings, equipment, and endowment should be considered for the period of five years, one-fifth of the total to be asked for annually.

When colleges have more than 500 college students, the approved askings may exceed the amounts designated for the "efficient" college in proportion as the number of college students exceeds 500.

Measured by the above standards, the colleges and schools of the Disciples of Christ, connected with the Board of Education need at the present moment, to bring them up to where they ought to be, the sum of $43,166,332. This represents the askings for the five-year period. For the one year the total askings were $10,694,972. In formulating those askings the minimum of college attendance was taken; that is, nothing was allowed for special students, graduate students, or academy students, except in the case of junior colleges. No subtractions were made from gross assets on account of annuities and unproductive funds. Furthermore, no indebtedness against buildings or current expenses was subtracted. So the above figures are less than they should be. Furthermore, they represent the bare necessities of what these institutions must have to be up to the standards obtaining everywhere in the educational world.

However, these figures when added to the missionary budget seemed too great for the faith of some. It was felt by many that they must be cut down if there is to be a reasonable hope of obtaining the total amount which is being asked as the Disciples' part in the Interchurch budget. Consequently, the Board of Education after long and faithful but futile attempts to reduce the educational budget—even by taking the student attendance of two years ago as a basis of figuring—proposed to arbitrarily cut the askings far below the needs, in order to reach a total budget for all interests that would be satisfactory and practicable. Thus the budget for the Board of Education and its constituent members for the first year of the Interchurch World Movement has been set at $6,000,000. The tentative budget for a five-year period is $30,000. These figures represent only about half the needs of our educational institutions if they are to take their places alongside the other colleges of equal size in other religious bodies. Certainly the Disciples of Christ cannot afford to lag behind in this matter which is of pre-eminent importance.

How Will You Plan Your Life?

THE present year has encompassed such mighty happenings and is so pregnant with prophecies of coming good, that it has been compared with the year when Christ was born. The great days of the Renaissance and the Reformation have returned, and are transcended in the vast enterprises of intellectual illumination, social reconstruction, and spiritual progress which have been set in motion. It is a new age for religion, and for the Church which, turning to its task with a new devotion, is devising works of unparalleled magnitude for the redemption and unity of mankind. No college man can be true to himself and his opportunities without planning his life on a big scale. The new age demands an enlarged service from every college woman. How do you measure up?

A Visit to Gartok

By RODERICK A. MAC LEOD

THIS visit to Gartok, the seat of government for Markham province, which Dr. Shelton considers one of the most significant events in all his fifteen years of missionary service, was made by Dr. Shelton, his two daughters—Doris and Dorothy—and myself. The nature of our invitation, our reception, our entertainment and our observations cannot fail to inspire increased hope and zeal in all those who are interested in the salvation of Tibet.

Our invitation, so far as we know, is without precedent in Tibetan affairs. Heretofore it has not been the custom for a Tibetan governor to invite Christian missionaries to visit him. But now we find the governor of Markham province not only sending us a cordial invitation, but also sending with the invitation two of his best servants to accompany us on our way, and to buy dainties in Batang for our entertainment in Gartok.

Our journey was full of interesting incidents, most of which must be omitted. The first day out part of our journey was made in a skin boat, 7 feet long, 3½ feet wide at the stern, and 1 foot wide at the prow and 2 feet deep. Into this boat we were all packed, bag and baggage. We had dinner in the dining room of this skin boat, a circumstance which was very much like the German method of fattening geese, the difference being that we felt as if we had more than one nail in each foot. In these boats, it is not safe for the persons packed on one side of the boat to eat more than those who are packed on the other side; so we all ate very heartily, in order that no one might go hungry. Despite our cramped positions it was a delight to be carried along at a fast rate by the current. Rapid transit is rarely enjoyed in Tibet.

The Governor and One of His Pets

In the villages along the way we had many visitors. Usually they came with a present of eggs, butter or walnuts, and asked for medicine. Some came with gifts of gratitude for cures wrought by Dr. Shelton in the past. All along the four days' journey the people were kind and courteous and entertained us as best they could.

Just as we started on our last day's journey we were met by a messenger from the governor. He had consulted his astrologer about our visit and the astrologer advised him that the stars were not right for our arrival. The governor, therefore, begged us not to come into Gartok until the next day, at which time the condition of the stars would be much more favorable. None of us knew anything of astrology, so, keeping our opinions in reserve, we took the advice of those who claimed to know the mysteries of the stars.

Our reception at Gartok was the same as that which is customary on receiving high officials. One mile outside of the town we were met by the officials and two hundred soldiers. The officials greeted us cordially and presented us with a khata, a white scarf which the Tibetans use in visiting. As we approached the lines of soldiers we heard in plain English: "Company, attention!" "Company, present arms!" And so on until they marched, tramp, tramp, in perfect order before us; and escorted us to the government house. As we reached the door of the house, a salute of three volleys was fired—an honor which is paid only to governors and high officials.

The governor himself met us at the door, greeted us heartily, and conducted Dr. Shelton and myself to the room which he had prepared for our entertainment. At the same time, the governor's wife led Doris and Dorothy to the room prepared for them. The governor sat with us for a long time, asking many questions, and discussing such topics as airships and postal systems. Then came the governor's present: two fat sheep, fifteen pounds of butter, one-half bushel of rice, one-half bushel of flour, ten pounds of tea, and five sacks of grain. After inviting us to feast with him the governor departed, and the other officials called to see us. All were cordial in their greetings and brought us presents. We had never experienced such a reception, and felt rather embarrassed.

We were entertained as special friends of the governor. Neither courtesy nor service was spared. Our rooms had been cleaned and decorated. A guard of soldiers was stationed at the door, as if we were officials. Each morning and evening a pot of hot yak milk was furnished us. A number of servants were placed at our command. Each day we feasted with the governor. We began to eat at 2 p. m. and remained at the table until 6:30 of the same day. During that time we ate all kinds of foods, after the Chinese fashion, conversed freely on various topics and listened to music—real pibroch. The Dalai Lama, during his visit to India, heard the Scottish bagpipes, and was so pleased with them, that he introduced them into Tibet. We did not expect to hear pipe music at Gartok; yet on the second morning of our visit we were thrilled by the stirring strains of ". . . the Pibroch sounding, sounding,.

Deep o'er the mountain and glen."

The governor saw that we were fond of music, so at each feast he had the piper play often. Among the selections played were the famous old pipe marches—"The Cock o' the North," "The Campbells Are Coming" and "The Drunken Piper," all of which were played with an accuracy and fervor which showed that the piper felt the spirit of the Gaelic airs. He also played Tibetan tunes, which are much like the old Gaelic music. When the Tibetan music was skirled forth, both the governor and his wife forgot their dignity; the former sang and the latter took to the floor and danced. Even we ourselves, despite our Christian training, felt a sort of tingling in our heels; and the thump, thump of foreign shoes could be heard at intervals from underneath the table.

Another part of our entertainment was a review of the troops at Gartok. The troops were clad in khaki and armed with

Enfield rifles. They went through the regular field exercises of the English army. All the commands were given in English. It was surprising to see the snap and grace with which the soldiers did their work. The governor seemed very proud of his troops. We, ourselves, could not help applauding them after they had passed the reviewing stand.

The review of the troops brought our entertainment to a close. Events were so arranged that we enjoyed every hour of the week. Even the five-hour feasts were a pleasure to us.

What we saw and heard would fill a volume. There was the governor, his wife, and people from all over Tibet. All were anxious to converse with us. Our room was constantly besieged by friendly visitors. Any question we wished to ask was answered without any hesitation, so that we gained much valuable information concerning the situation and nature of places of which we previously had but very little knowledge.

The most interesting personage we met was the governor himself. He is a hale and hearty Lhasa Tibetan of about the age and size of Dr. Shelton. He is a very capable man. The Dalai Lama holds him in high regard. This year his term of office was up, and he applied to the Dalai Lama for release; but the latter sent him back to be governor of Markham province for life—a great compliment indeed.

The governor is a man of outstanding characteristics which one cannot fail to observe. First among these is his kindness. He has a large number of much-loved pets, ranging from his wife to a turtle. Wherever he goes four little dogs, with a tinkling bell on each, trot at his heels. He also has a large Tibetan mastiff, and two hunting dogs, the like of which we had never seen before. These dogs look exactly like wolves. The Tibetans use them for hunting deer, and train them to drive the deer from the mountains down into the valleys. When the governor enters the field where his splendid horses and mules are kept, each animal gallops up to him to receive a few gentle pats on the nose. All of these incidents suggest a kind-hearted man.

Nothing pleases the governor as much as a good joke. He delights in the humorous side of life. Any mirth-provoking or witty remarks are always appreciated by him. Ridiculous situations amuse him greatly. On one occasion he asked us if we liked milk.

"Oh, yes," replied Dr. Shelton, "Mr. MacLeod drinks milk like a calf."

"Well," said the governor, "if he drinks it like a calf, I'll have the yak sent up each morning; and let him suck."

Although kind and humorous, the governor can be very severe. The whipping post, with two rawhide whips hanging beside it, and the presence of men with their right hands cut off at the wrist, show how the governor punishes wrongdoing.

However superstitious the governor's religion may be, the loyalty and devotion with which he observes its rites excited our admiration. Each morning he has his period of religious devotion, and his servants have standing orders that, under no circumstances, is he to be disturbed during that time. He gives freely to religious needs, and also makes pilgrimages to sacred places.

We found the governor a brilliant conversationalist. He talked freely about the political situation in Tibet, and told us of many improvements which were being made: among other things that a postal system had been established from Lhasa to various places, which system would soon reach Gartok; that a new arsenal, which manufactures modern Enfield riffes is now opened in Lhasa: also that a great trade is being carried on with India. In all his conversations the governor showed himself a man possessed of good, sound common sense.

The governor's wife is an interesting little woman—about four and a half feet high. She comes from the southern borders of Tibet, has spent some time at Darjeeling, and speaks the Ghurkha language. Music, singing and dancing are her chief delights. When she and the governor appear in public the other women scamper, like rats, into hiding places. She does not want other women so much as to look at the governor. Some time ago the governor visited a neighboring town, and became infatuated with one of the belles of that place. His wife heard of it, and without delay, went to that place and cut off both ears and the nose of the belle in question. Despite such acts, which remind one of Jezebel, she is very attentive to the governor; arranges his hair every morning, and seems to be happy with him. She was very friendly to Doris and Dorothy, showed them all her pretty things, presented each of them with a ring, gold cloth, and other things; in short, she tried to show her good will just like a woman from home would do if entertaining two Tibetan girls. We made several pictures of her. The two that pleased her most were a picture of herself with her two dogs, and one of herself with the governor and his piper. We met many other interesting folk. Among them were the governor's secretary, a major from Trashilumpo, and other officers from Southern, Western and Central Tibet. Many of them had been to Calcutta, an event which all Tibetans regard as a great achievement. They told of their sons who could speak and read English, of the new anti-cigaret law in Tibet, of the progress in Tibetan activities, all of which showed that Tibet is reaching out after and adopting foreign methods.

No less interesting than these was a robber officer from the "Bad Lands" of Eastern Tibet. He was a stalwart youth of powerful physique. At the outbreak of the recent hostilities between China and Tibet his chief took to the field with the Tibetan army. This robber band is still loyal to Tibet, but there is much discontent on account of the Tibetan tax system. The Tibetans have a regular system of taxation, and the taxes are high. The Chinese used the robbers' own method for collecting taxes—when they could, they held up a man and took all he had. The robbers like this system better. The robber chief is a friend of Dr. Shelton. The young man told us that his chief wanted Dr. Shelton to send him a pair of Belgian hares. They were wanted as a gift for the Dalai Lama.

We had unusual opportunities for observing the manners and customs of the people. We were the guests of the governor, so the people were not afraid to act and talk freely in our presence. Tibetan manners and customs are now so well known that nothing will be said of them in this article.

The day before we left the governor loaded us down with mutton, rice, butter and honey—three horse loads. On leaving he told us that we must write him each month, so that he might know of our welfare. As we left we were escorted out of the town with great pomp, by the officials and soldiers. The significance of the above experiences will be immediately appreciated by all those who are interested in Christian Missions. One point alone needs emphasis. The governor and people of Gartok know that we are Christian missionaries. They know why Christian missionaries came to Tibet. At the same time they seek our friendship and our help. What can be done we do not know. We do know, however, that we have a chance to try to save the Tibetans. That is all the opportunity the Christian missionary needs. Now, that we have such an opportunity, let us try, even if we die trying.

Dr. Shelton Held by Bandits in Southwestern China

EARLY in January cablegrams from China reported that Dr. A. L. Shelton, the famous medical missionary of Tibet, had been captured and was being held for ransom by bandits near Yunnanfu. This is 400 miles from Batang and the doctor was accompanying Mrs. Shelton and their two daughters through the robber-infested region on their journey home. He was expecting to return to Tibet and spend two more years before taking his furlough. Later cablegrams and reports from the State Department at Washington indicate that the American Legation at Peking is doing all in its power for Dr. Shelton's release. Negotiations are slow on account of the great distance from Peking, the virtual independence and lawless condition of Yunnan province and the lack of means of communication. H. A. Baker, another of the Batang missionaries, who is now at home on furlough, says that in three trips through that section there was always robbing ahead of or behind them and that once his own goods were saved by soldiers. Mrs. Shelton and the girls are safe and little anxiety is felt for the doctor. On the other hand those who know him best are picturing him working miracles of healing among his captors, preaching the gospel to them and in general making the best of the situation.

American Education in Interchurch Movement

Outline of the Presentation Made by Dr. James E. Clarke at the Atlantic City Conference

THE first impression made through the presentation of facts brought out by the Home Mission and Foreign Mission Survey is the need for trained workers.

It is apparent, therefore, that an educational survey has not been "dragged in," but is an integral part of the whole program of the Interchurch World Movement. The fact is, that at the very first conference out of which this movement grew, the cooperation of the forces of Christian education was sought because it was deemed essential that we raise up an adequate, trained leadership.

The American Education Survey undertakes to discover what are the resources of the church in the way of trained leaders; where it gets its leadership; whether we are getting a sufficient supply and what should be done to make that supply commensurate with the revealed need.

We should be able to secure easily all the money needed, but the money will be worthless without men and women through whose services its use may become effective for the promotion of the kingdom.

The American Education Survey is divided into four parts: a survey of institutions maintained by the church; a survey of state institutions to determine what the Church is doing for the development of the religious life of their students; a survey of theological seminaries; a survey of secondary schools maintained by the Church.

The survey is by no means complete. Indeed, the effort is to do the work so thoroughly and scientifically that it cannot be done hastily. Certain facts, however, some of which have been well known for years, are emphasized by the survey.

1. Approximately 90 per cent of our ministers and missionaries come from the Christian college. This does not mean that they decide for the Christian vocations while in college, for 70 per cent of them determine their life work before entering college, though many do reach their decisions in preparatory schools connected with Christian colleges. But the definitely Christian college renders a tremendous service in training and developing these young lives for the Christian vocations.

The Christian college confirms and strengthens their purposes; it fixes and enlarges their Christian ideals; it clarifies their vision; it trains them for the specific service needed.

As the needs of various foreign mission fields have been presented to us, one fact stands out with prominence. It is the emphasis upon the need of Christian educational institutions in every foreign land that we may raise up an adequately trained Christian leadership. If needed abroad, certainly similar institutions are needed at home; for the temptations to turn towards some other vocation are even greater in America than they are abroad.

2. We need numerous colleges, conveniently located, of high standard. A recent study of Illinois colleges sought to discover, among other things, why the students attended a particular institution. The reply given most frequently was, "Because the college is near home." The next most frequent reply was, "Because of the high standards of the college." The need is for colleges near home, of high standard and low cost. It is reported that 75 per cent of the ministers in the Maryland Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church are graduates of Western Maryland College.

3. Even granting that the state institutions provide a type of education just as acceptable as that provided by church colleges, nevertheless, there are not sufficient state institutions to provide for one-half of the young people of America who now attend college.

4. In order to maintain present standards the endowment of colleges must increase two or three times as fast as the number of students. Each student pays approximately only one-third of the cost of his education. Hence for each new student some way must be found to provide the other two-thirds of the cost of his education.

5. The salaries of college professors must be largely increased if we are to maintain even our present standards of efficiency. A recent study shows that the cost of living has increased 82 per cent; that the average wages paid to workers in eight of our leading industries have been increased 95 per cent, but that the salaries of professors in Presbyterian colleges have been increased only 31 per cent during the same period.

6. We must consider the tremendous increase in the number of students attending state institutions. We are told that 10 per cent of the college students of the Disciples of Christ attend colleges maintained by the Disciples and from this 10 per cent come 80 per cent of their ministers. But 75 per cent of the college students from the homes of Disciples attend state institutions. Shall we absolutely neglect this 75 per cent? Of course not. Therefore, the churches must make adequate provision for bringing to bear such religious influences as they can upon the lives of these students in state institutions.

7. In preparing the budget for presentation to the Conference, the Department does not present the unrevised askings of the colleges. On the contrary, the Council of Church Boards decided that it would test the askings of all colleges by the application of a norm—the norm being what is known in college circles as the "minimum" college and the "efficient" college. To illustrate the application of this norm, agreed to by all church boards of education, one rather small college felt that it needed a total of $4,830,000 within the next five years. By the application of the norm adopted by the Council of Church Boards, this college is placed in the budget for only $778,500 for the five-year period.

8. The other fact which must not be forgotten—perhaps the most significant fact of all—is that if we are to win the world for Christ we must create a background of intelligent Christian sentiment. It is not enough that we train our workers. We must train into Christian ideals the men who stay at home and "hold the ropes."

The supreme need of our time is the need of what Edward Markham calls "heroic men, star led." We can never get such men through any system of education which trains the head and hand, but leaves the heart untouched. We can never get them through any system of education which calls for nothing more than skill and efficiency. Never in the history of the world were the people of any nation so highly developed in skill and efficiency as the people of that nation which suddenly hurled all of its ruthless might against the ideals of Christian democracy. We will provide what the world needs only when we develop men and women into steadfast devotion to the ideals of Jesus Christ, and give them such equipment of body, mind and spirit as will make them efficient for the attainment and extension of those ideals.

Five Minutes in Our Foreign Fields

China

CHINA has an area of 4,278,352 square miles—the largest of any single country in the world with the sole exception of Russia. There are no exceptions to the extent of her population, for China numbers over 400,000,000 souls, one-fourth of the inhabitants of the earth. The territory lies almost entirely in the temperate zone—the region most favorable to the development of modern civilization.

There is apparently no limit to the possible development of China. The land will grow everything produced in the United States and many other things besides. The nation can feed and clothe herself, and many others, if given methods and machinery. The soil is one vast treasure house of mineral resources that rival those of the United States; her coal seams are inexhaustible; her iron ore deposits amount to over 750 million tons; she has a monoply of antimony and great quantities of salt and natural gas.

But for all these natural advantages China is just now finding her soul. Illiteracy, superstition and tradition hold her fast in bondage to the past. By the end of the twentieth century, now one-fifth gone, the population will probably number one billion. The evils of China will grow in the same proportion unless checked by the Gospel of Christ. For this gigantic task there are now only 5,000 effective missionaries, about one to every 66,000 souls.

The human resources of the Chinese are as great as the natural advantages of their country. One has only to consider their ancient civilization to prove this. They were discoverers of the mariner's compass, the arts of porcelain manufacture, of sericulture, and of printing from movable type. They were great engineers. The Grand Canal, the wonderful irrigation system of the Chengtu Plain, the dikes and sea walls, the cantilever and suspension bridges built hundreds of years ago, are evidence of their greatness.

The Chinese of today display the same characteristics; they are vigorous, physically and mentally. Their keen business ability is indicated by the statement that with the same surroundings the Chinese merchant will prosper where his Jewish contemporary would starve. They are excellent laborers and possess individual initiative probably to a larger extent than any other people in Asia. Wherever they settle they become an important economic and social factor.

Place the natural advantages of the Chinese over against their need of Christ and you will see why the challenge is so imperative and so compelling.

The missions of the Disciples of Chirst are situated in two contiguous provinces of the Lower Yangtze country in east-central China, viz: Kiangsu and Anhwei. Combined area equals that of New York State plus Pennsylvania. Population, 34,600,000. There are more than fifty missionary societies at work in the two porvinces, but the Disciples of Christ are solely responsible for giving the gospel and Christian institutions to approximately 10,000,000 people. Total evangelical forces are: Missionaries, 900; Chinese associate workers, 2,046; places of worship and preaching, 551; pupils in Christian schools, 18,664; communicants (church members), 18,835; estimated Protestant constituency, 38,000. The Roman Catholics report a membership of 234,721. In these two provinces the Disciples of Christ have at present 54 foreign missionaries, 186 Chinese helpers, 5 stations, 18 out-stations, 22 churches, 1,232 church members, 31 day schools, 3 high schools, share in 5 union educational institutions, over 2,000 pupils under instruction besides 28 Sunday schools with 2,544 pupils, 6 hospitals and dispensaries treating annually nearly 20,000 patients, property valued at over $1,000,000. Baptisms last year 90.

Yet every station is undermanned and insufficiently equipped and is calling for additional missionaries and money. We are as yet meeting only a fragment of our obligation, while new demands accumulate. To hold our present stations and occupy one other point in the dense areas that fall within our parish, reinforcements and additional equipment are urgently required.

Japan

Within the limited territory of the Japanese Empire there are 78,723,000 people, and the number is increasing about 700,000 a year. Of this population 74 per cent are farmers although only 14 per cent of the land can be cultivated. Japan cannot feed her people from her own soil, and her social and economic problems are acute. Since the white world does not welcome her people she is colonizing Formosa, Hokkaido, Saghalien and Korea. But these fields cannot absorb her surplus population.

Many of the problems existing in other mission fields are not found here. Japan is literate and intelligent. Tokyo is one of the world's greatest student centers. But there is need of strong Christian culture to provide a moral sense with which to face and shape the industrial conditions which are now arising. Readjustment and reinforcement of Christian forces are among the most urgent needs of this nation. Union institutions of Christian learning would in time furnish Japan with her own evangelists and create a Japanese missionary church for her colonies and neighbors. Generous cooperation with the Japanese in social uplift projects, where the leadership and advice of the missionary is always expected, should be freely accorded. Christian literature of the highest grade is an essential for the vast numbers of educated people in Japan.

The present tendency in Japan since the close of the great war is decidedly democratic. This tendency, together with local conditions, offers to American Christianity the greatest challenge ever given to a Christian people.

We can aid through a strong evangelistic effort, the distribution of tracts, strong Christian books, and a morally pure fiction. Well-chosen missionaries in rural towns will be able to carry the gospel to the 74 per cent of the people yet untouched. Five years of adequate support of such a program in Japan would turn the tide toward Christ.

The Japanese are uniformly friendly toward America. Many of Japan's leaders are graduates of American universities. This fact constitutes a great challenge to our churches. America introduced modern civilization into Japan. America can and must throw such efforts and forces into the Japanese Empire as will enlist the vision and energy of this progressive people in the cause of Christian democracy.

All of our stations and districts are located on the principal island, Hondo or Honshu, which supports the bulk of the population and most of the large cities. No other mission in Japan is more strategically distributed with respect to three principal aspects of the national life. In Tokyo and environs we are at the fountain-head of politics and education. Northward at Akita and Fukushima we touch the rich agricultural districts which slope from the central hills to the coast on either side. Southwest from the capital, at Osaka, on a bay of the Inland Sea, we are in the second largest city and leading industrial center of the Empire.

Though our stations and outposts are, in most cases, in close juxtaposition to other missions, the Disciples of Christ are largely responsible for areas whose combined population is over 8,000,000. Following is a conspectus of our resources and results after thirty-six years of labor: Foreign missionaries, 30; Japanese workers, 127; Bible colleges, 2; day and high schools, 11; number under instruction, 1,419; Sunday schools, 58; Sunday school pupils, 3,659; oganized churches, 23; preaching places, 68; church members, 1,240. Baptisms last year, 122.

The Japan mission is calling for 16 new missionaries and the means to support them.

India

Take a map of Asia and draw line touching the Himalayas, the Equator and the borders of Persia and Siam and you will have inclosed a territory which holds about one-fifth of the human race or about 350,000,000 people. Take into consideration the fact that India has about three-fourths the territory of the United States and you will find that there are 163 persons for every square mile of this vast area.

India has been called "the birth-place of religions." Today the number of adherents to various religions is only 13,000 less than that of the total population. The principal religious communities as estimated at the beginning of 1919 are as follows: Hindu, 234,000,000; Moslem, 71,000,000; Buddhist, 12,000,000; Animist, 11,000,000; Christian, 5,000,000; Sikh, 3,000,000; and Jain, 1,000,000.

Some of the religious beliefs which are held by people of India today were in existence at the time of David and the new laws of the Buddha are as old as those of Pericles. But the glories of the distant past do not satisfy the ideals of the new day which has now dawned in India. The old superstitions, the basis of caste observance, and much of social usage and local worship are dying out with the advance of civilization. When a school boy knows the real cause of an eclipse he will not show quite the same zeal in trying to frighten the demons, Rahu and Ketu, to make them release the sun.

The people of India are hungry for social freedom and for a way of life which will give opportunity for development in this world and hope for the future.

A survey of the educational situation in India shows that less than 6 per cent of the people are able to read and write. Nearly 99 per cent of the women are illiterate. Among the religious communities of India the Hindus have nearly 6 per cent literate; the Moslems only 4 per cent; the Christians about 22 per cent.

The remedy for the situation lies in the extension of the mission schools and especially in opening new doors for the education of the womanhood of India.

Aside from some work carried on by the British and Australian churches, the missions of the Disciples of Christ are located in (1) the Central Provinces (situated almost in the middle of the country); and (2) the United Provinces (north of Central Provinces to which they are joined by a narrow loop dividing the native states of Central India). The combined area (243,337 square miles) equals that of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. The population aggregates 65,000,000, about 3½ times that of the states just named. The total Christian community is approximately 240,000, of whom 200,000 are in United Provinces and 40,000 in Central Provinces. Only the following portions of this densely populated expanse, in which about 20 societies of other communions are at work, engage the efforts of the Disciples, viz.: of United Provinces, parts of the southwest Districts of Hamirpur and Jhansi; of Central Provinces, sections of east, west and north, in respectively the Chhattisgarh, Narbada and Jabalpur (Jubbulpore) Divisions. Within this territory are 2,500,000 people. There are as many and more in adjacent native states, where mission work is not yet permitted, but whose doors will soon be open into regions for which the Disciples will normally be responsible.

The Indian field is jointly occupied by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Statistics are as follows: Main stations, 13; out-stations, 23; churches, 20 (5 self-supporting); church members, 1,845; contributions last year, $2,698; Sunday schools, 92, with average attendance of 4,638; a Bible college with 20 students; a high school with 120 students; a normal school with 50 students; 8 middle schools with 350 students; 35 primary schools with 2,388 pupils; 5 hospitals and 12 dispensaries treating (1918) 1,200 inpatients and 40,000 visiting patients, and administering 108,000 treatments. There is a staff of 351 Indian workers, and 66 foreign missionaries. Baptisms last year, 303. Every station calls loudly for reinforcements of missionaries and equipment.

Belgian Congo (Africa)

"Less accessible to outside influences, Central Africa is the battle-ground which Islam has selected on which to contend with Christianity for the final control of this great continent. Ignorance is Islam's greatest ally. The Christian missionary is everywhere known as the disinterested friend of enlightened progress. The Church must capitalize this asset immediately or the battle will be half lost before it has really begun."

The immensity of the ground over which this struggle will be fought is almost past realization. Over the nearly ten million square miles of the African continent, larger than the combined areas of Europe, India, China and Mexico, between 130 and 150 millions of people are scattered.

Africa is no longer the "benighted land" of the days of Moffatt, Livingstone and Stanley. It has felt the awakening touch of modern civilization. Many thousand miles of railroads have been thrust into its interior from every shore, and in the not distant future Cairo and the Cape of Good Hope, the northern and southern extremes of that great continent, will be linked together by bands of steel.

Africa is awakening to the realization of its commercial value. Under the direction of foreign masters the native peoples are laboring at new tasks and learning very rapidly the essential fundamentals of modern methods. It is of paramount importance that they also be given teachers of high ideals and Christian principles.

Africa has been stirred industrially, politically, socially and to some extent religiously by the world war. A million sons of Africa served as soldiers, laborers and carriers in the great conflict, and this cannot fail to effect some transformation in the lives of the millions untouched by the war. As a result the Dark Continent is being permeated with knowledge as to the rest of the world. A new consciousness of values, of social relations, of desires and possibilities has been awakened in the human breast. The time has now come for a great forward movement in missionary work on this vast and almost untouched field. This is not only an opportunity, but a necessity. A new and aggressive missionary program is absolutely essential if the forces of Christianity are not driven from the field by the followers of Mohammed. The missionary must be the chief agent of Africa's civilization.

Nearly two thousand years ago Philip led a son of Africa to Christ. The churches have been slow in telling the good tidings to the others who wait.

Our field in the Congo is approximately indicated as follows: Latitude between the 3rd degree north and the 3rd degree south of the Equator; longitude, between the 18th and 24th east of Greenwich. South the Congo's largest southern tributary, the Ruki with its numerous affluents; north of the Congo it lies along the Ubangi River. Politically our territory includes most of the District of the Equator, a portion of the District of Lake Leopold II, to the south, a portion of the District of Sankuru (west of Lake Leopold), and the southern part of the Ubangi District. The population of the District of the Equator alone is estimated at about 760,000, and of the entire field, as above delimited, about 1,000,000. The prevailing language is Lonkundo, with slight dialectical variations. North of our mission, principally in the District of Lulonga, is the field of the Congo Balolo Mission; south of it the missions of the American Baptist and Methodist Societies. In 1916 two commissions of our Congo missionaries travelled 3,035 miles exploring new territory, adjacent to that of our established stations. They visited some tribes never before seen by a missionary. Out of this survey arose the demand for new stations among the unreached pagans of the Ubangi, and the eastern reaches of the Equator District. In 1916, also, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions withdrew from Liberia and undertook, with the Foreign Society, joint responsibility for the Congo field. The Disciples of Christ have four central stations, a steamer (virtually a traveling station), 220 outposts, 355 places of regular preaching, 8 organized churches, 65 church buildings, 65 Sunday schools enrolling 2,843 pupils, 47 Endeavor societies with 2,623 members, a Bible College, 121 day schools, 2 boarding day schools, 3,424 pupils under instruction, 5 hospitals and dispensaries treating about 20,000 patients annually, a total church membership of over 5,140. The work is carried on by a small staff of 29 missionaries, and 382 native assistants. Baptisms last year, 647.

For a 5-year program of expansion the mission has asked for 67 additional missionaries. The present appeal includes only those immediately required to meet most urgent demands.

Philippine Islands

The Spanish-American war brought under the control of the United States the group of 3,141 Philippine Islands, embracing 11,500 square miles and a population of 10,000,000 people. Under American guardianship this territory has become the great strategic base for Christian democracy in the Pacific, and Manila, the capital city, is becoming the focal point between America and the East. The inhabitants of these islands, mostly of the Malay race, are today preparing for self-government. Modern civilization and western methods are being rapidly adopted.

The northernmost and largest of the principal islands, Luzon, confines the present operations of the Disciples of Christ. We have three central stations in two distinct fields. These stations are: (1) Laoag, on the nothwestern coast, ministering through eight out-stations to a region of 200,000 people. (The principal out-station is Aparri, where native evangelists and teachers are maintained). (2) Vigan, 50 miles south of Laoag, the center of another district of 230,000, in which work is conducted at fourteen out-stations. Both Laoag and Vigan are situated among the Ilocano people, numbering in northwestern Luzon about 800,000, who have their distinctive language and tribal characteristics. (3) Our third center is Manila, the capital, which is metropolis for our mission as well as others working among another people with different language, viz., the Tagalogs. Manila has 300,000 inhabitants. The Tagalog region accessible from it has 146,695, among whom several communions are at work. Our Tagalog outstations number 11. Our present staff in Luzon is: Foreign missionaries, 22; Filipino workers, 52. We have 2 Bible colleges and 5 other schools, with 227 pupils; 113 Sunday schools, with an enrollment of 7,687; 4 hospitals and dispensaries, treating about 100,000 sick each year; 2 mission presses and publishing houses; 83 organized churches; 116 places of regular meeting; a church membership of about 7,000. Baptism last year, 572. Those who resist all efforts toward modern civilization include wild tribes numbering 750,000 people, independent animistic peoples in the highlands of Luzon and Mindanao, and in West Luzon and Palawan, nomadic polygamous Negritos, or true aborgines.

The chief problem of missionary enterprise in these islands is the replacing of the decadent religious beliefs, including the idolatrous Christianity practiced by many of the Filipinos, with a virile and democratic Christianity. There is also a decaying Mohammedism, professed by 350,000 Moros.

The United States has introduced a splendid educational system. Missionaries are now supplementing this by counteracting the strong atheistic tendency prevalent in the university and professional schools by the close supervision of the dormitory system prevailing in the high school centers and in Manila. The outstanding educational need is a great union Christian college in Manila, with up-to-date buildings, a competent staff, and an adequate dormitory system.

There are now 200 missionaries, including wives, and 1,860 native workers, conscientiously but inadequately covering the field. The general average has been one evangelistic missionary for every 50,000 people. Through the United States schools English is rapidly becoming the universal language of the islands, but there are sixty-eight different languages and dialects for which Christian literature and propaganda material are essential. Literature is a most important medium since the people are rapidly gaining education and a political self-consciousness and are probably on the verge of self-determination.

The great opportunity awaiting the churches of America is that of making the Philippines our Pacific contributions to posterity.

Tibet

For romance and remoteness, with all the lure that these imply to select, ardent spirits, no other field is comparable with this rugged roof of the world, the dome of Asia, one of the trio (with Afghanistan and Central Arabia) of final strongholds against the march of Christian conquest. The feet of the bringers of good tidings and loving deeds will soon be in Lhasa, as in Mecca and Kabul. The Disciples of Christ are regarded as having presumably pre-empted Tibet. One condition must be fulfilled, if we wish to make this high privilege secure, not out of emulation, but out of love and desire to do a daring thing for God. We must plant stations and send workers rapidly to show that we are able and worthy to occupy the land, or at least to take the leadership in the work of evangelization, with all the cooperation we can secure, as the American Board (Congregational) has done in Turkey, or the United Presbyterian Board in Egypt. After splendid preparatory work far into the interior on the high-road to Lhasa, and in other directions, we are now ready to found a new center.

We have in Tibet 12 missionaries, 3 mission homes, a hospital, 6 native workers and a Bible School of 64 members. Recently 34 were baptized.

I heard my mother say one day, "Dear me, how long 'twill be Before this cunning little girl the 'home country' will see."
I wonder what she meant by that? I feel at home right here.
I don't believe another place would seem one-half so dear.
I love the big, round shining sun, that makes my garden warm;
Each time I see its smiling face I feel quite free from harm.
I love the pretty colored flowers, and just the other day
A bird with lovely golden wings flew down but would not stay.
All through the pleasant sunny hours I play, and oh, what fun
When Molly comes to stay with me, and Billy, on the run!
And sometimes there's a neighbor child (I like her smooth brown skin)
Will come and peep at us and smile, and presently come in.
And no one really understands a word she says but me;
But that's not strange, for both of us speak mostly smiles, you see.
Then, when the sun has gone away behind the mountains high,
I love to watch the stars come out and sparkle in the sky.
All cuddled up in mother's arms, before I go to sleep,
I have just one more game with them, a game of hide and peep.
Could ever any little child have better times than this:
A happy day of gleeful play, then mother's good-night kiss?

The Horseless Carriage that Carries the Doctor About His Field

The Doctor Sahib of Hindustan

By BERT WILSON

JUST south of Kearney, Nebraska, is a bridge a mile long that crosses the Platte river. South of the Platte for another mile stretches the second bottom, as level as a floor. Then come the lowly sandhills, parallel with the river.

Across this bridge, and over these picturesque hills, in the year 1878, went an "emigrant wagon," and in it a small, slim boy of eleven. For days over this new, barren country the procession went. It finally came to a halt in Gosper county. A few days later a sod house and a sod stable adorned the landscape on a newly staked-out farm.

It was a country all land and horizon—no trees, no railroad, no houses in sight, and the only houses seen on the overland trip were the "old soddies." The slim, lean, lank boy went to a school in a sod schoolhouse, and his first teacher was minus one arm, but a good teacher nevertheless.

The nearest trading post was twenty miles, and the boy went on horseback eighteen miles for the mail. On these broad, flat prairies and up the pockets of the canyon he herded sheep and cattle. Being an observing youth he picked up many an Indian arrowhead as he rambled over the plains.

Antelope often mingled with the cattle by day, and in the canyon herds of deer would hustle off, always keeping at a safe distance. Prairie dogs, with a staccato yip and a quick flip of their stubby tails, would scurry to their holes, and then peer out tauntingly from their places of safety. A visit to these prairie dog towns always introduced him to the other occupants, namely, owls and rattlesnakes. The music at evening time was the chorus of the coyotes, the most uncanny sound that ever broke the stillness of a Nebraska night.

The next step upwards was the clerkship in a grocery store at Arapahoe. It was a real department store where "everything on earth" was sold that was needed by the sturdy pioneers. One year there was a drought, another year crops were destroyed by hail, and not infrequently the grasshoppers took their toll. The young clerk used his influence with the proprietor to get credit for his customers during those lean years.

The next important act was to carry off a well-earned certificate of graduation from the high school. And of course after that he stood up in Cotner College and received a degree marked M. D. He hung out his shingle for a few months at Firth. Then he was asked to report at Cincinnati.

There was a great need for him in the far-away land of Hindustan. Would he go? Yes. That's typical of him. He had been used to doing the needed thing. Married? No? Then the "Bishop" also did the typical thing for him. Did he have prospects? Well, yes. But if she is not willing, would he go alone? Yes.

Back in Nebraska there was a called meeting with a certain Cotner girl named Elizabeth. She had been a member of the Volunteer Band of which the M. D.-to-be, was president. There was no one to take her home after the meetings, so being chivalrous, and always willing to make any necessary sacrifice, he escorted her frequently at least to the gate. At this called meeting of the two members of the Volunteer Band a certain sly ultimatum was issued, and Elizabeth put up the white flag of surrender.

THIS was in April. Fall found them married and in New York City, where the Doctor took a short course in tropical medicine. In October, 1897, they sailed for India, the first foreign missionaries that ever went out from Cotner. Who followed in their train? The president, ex-presidents, field secretaries, both ex and present, of Cotner, can string out a long list of names, great and near-great, who are following in the footsteps of the man who led the way. Cotner's lines have gone out to the ends of the earth.

It is well to record here an act that may yet prove to be a case of bad judgment on the Doctor's part. He was a Nebraskan by rearing and training, he knew the broad plains, the humble sandhills, the wide, gently flowing flat Platte, but yet when he cast his vote in 1896, it was against the "boy orator of the Platte." With the exchange situation as critical as it is in all parts of the earth, due largely to the high price of silver, it may yet become necessary for the whole world to adopt the great commoner's program so eloquently advocated in his first campaign.

THE first day he landed at Harda he hired a pundit and went to work on the language. The second day he went to the hospital and thirty-five people were there for medical treatment. One was an evangelist trained by "Rajah the First." The Doctor felt that the man had too much equipment, so he sawed off one of his legs. He turned out to be a better man with one leg than he had been with two. No doubt the influence of the one-armed school teacher out in Nebraska had something to do with this operation.

As the new M. D. went up the streets that night a man said, "Salaam, Sahib," and touched his turban in salute. The small boys eyed him curiously, and the bolder said, "Salaam, Sahib," as they brought their little brown dirty hands up to their bright brown eyes in friendly salute. His pundit every morning would salute him with, "Salaam, Sahib." Before many days he was salaamed on every hand, by nearly everyone he met, for Hindustan is the salaamingest land on earth.

In those early days Miss Mary Thompson took him to the homes of the people, introduced him, interpreted for him, and helped him to make friends with the women and children. He was always friendly and sympathetic and helpful to those in distress. Quick of discernment between the false and the genuine, these people began to feel that here was a real friend come among them. And the underground telephone system of India worked overtime. The women would often say to Miss Thompson: "You must bring the Doctor Sahib to my house. I want to see him."

As the work grew the lepers heard of the new Doctor Sahib and came for healing. Hope ever "springs eternal in the human breast," and these poor lepers somehow had hopes that a new man from a far-off land might be able to heal them. They came, and finally to care for them a leper asylum was erected, and they were given as careful treatment as if it had been possible to make them whole. The Doctor Sahib, like his Master, was a real friend to the lepers. He cared for them, he treated them as brothers, he gave them the best medical skill he possessed, he taught them of his Christ, and a number of them, "hearing the word, believed and were baptized."

When G. L. Wharton went home on furlough the Doctor Sahib became the secretary and treasurer of the mission. Then came the famine of 1900. Famine, pestilence, and plague seem to stick to this land and people with everlasting stubbornness. If one is not on a rampage the other nearly always is. In this great famine cattle, sheep, goats, buffaloes, wild deer and even the people literally starved to death by the thousands. People climbed the trees to the topmost branches and stripped them of every green leaf for food for themselves and their cattle. Even the new roots hanging down from the banyan trees were eaten by man and beast. Money came from the ends of the earth. The Doctor acted as treasurer in this district. Should money be given out promiscuously? No. Men wanted work, to earn a living for themselves and families. So work was organized for them. Food was distributed with discrimination, houses were built, roads were staked out and built, and at one time as many as six hundred people were employed. And the Doctor Sahib was the manager and overseer of the whole program, in addition to his growing and necessary medical work. During these days Elizabeth was assisting in the hospital, helping train native nurses, keeping the home cheery, and caring for the little family at home.

Thus eight busy, helpful years flitted quickly by, and the Doctor Sahib bade his Indian friends farewell, to enjoy a well-earned furlough. But being energetic and properly ambitious, he registered as a regular student at Cotner. At the end of that year he stood up in the old halls and had an A. B. tacked on to his M. D.

When he returned there was great joy in Harda. It seemed that every man, woman and child in the whole town was rejoicing to see the Doctor Sahib get back to his task. Some of them came to him and said:

"Sahib, we have been waiting for days and days for your return. We have missed you, we have needed you, and we are now glad to see you back."

The work increased and grew. News of unselfish service travels rapidly in Hindustan. It is pre-eminently a selfish land. That is, there is no public spirit of organized helpfulness or uplift. The Brahman hates the sweeper, and the oppressed low caste hate their oppressors. So it was a new thing to see a man helping low caste, lepers, and the well-to-do, all in the same day in the same hospital.

The Doctor is often called to go out thirty, seventy-five and a few times one hundred and seventy-five miles, at the urgent entreaty of the suffering people. A part of this travel, of course, is on the railroads, but much of it is overland. The overland journeys are not always a thing greatly to be desired.

He has often made trips of thirty or forty miles in a bile gari, a two-wheeled cart without springs, drawn by a yoke of oxen. The gari wallah—driver—sits on the tongue of the cart and pokes up the oxen with a bamboo stick and twists their tails when he wants them to go on high. When they do go on high a good yoke of oxen can make from four to six miles an hour. The average is much less than that. They are certainly some chariots, the bile garis. My anatomy can testify to their stability at least and to the lasting impression a ride in one of them makes on an American tenderfoot.

One Christmas night, at midnight, the Sahib heard an insistent knock upon his door. An English official had been mauled by a tiger, and was fifteen miles in the country. An ox cart had been sent and would the Doctor Sahib come at once? He went at once, through the darkness and solitude of the open country, snatching a wink of sleep now and then between jolts and the Hindi yells at the oxen by the gari wallah. Most of these oxen can understand Hindi better than English. (If these stupid oxen can get the language the new missionary should have no trouble.) He arrived at 4 a. m., but the master of the jungle had been too much for the Anglo-Saxon and the man lived only a few hours longer.

The Hindu Barber Avoids Rent by Going to His Customers, and Considers Nine Cents Ample Pay, Without Tips, Even from the Foreign Sahib, Mr. Wilson

On another occasion the Doctor made a hurry-up call to see a second Anglo-Saxon brother, who was also a nimrod. He had put one shot into a wild boar, only wounding him. The infuriated animal charged him, his great, sharp white tusks glistening in the sun as he came. As the boar made the last plunge the man leaped in the air, his legs apart and landed on the boar's back, his face to the rear, and grabbed it by the tail. Then there was a real merry-go-round for some minutes, and the boar went charging off into the jungle, but only after inflicting some severe gashes in the man's legs. The Doctor said that it was a new experience for the man, and that no doubt the wild boar also had some sensations he had never had before.

The Doctor Sahib is somewhat of a hunter himself. He believes that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." So there is a story out here of the Doctor up a big tree on a platform in the midst of a dense jungle waiting for a tiger to appear. Near the foot of the tree, in an open space, was tied a goat, sweet bait for a tiger. The clear Indian moon was shining down and making the night almost as light as day. Hour after hour he waited but no tiger. Now and then the goat would let out a lonesome bleat as if inviting the tiger to come and devour him. In the gray of the early dawn the Sahib allowed himself to drop off in a light sleep while on duty. Just then a wild, goatish yell broke his slumber and peering down he saw a big hyena butchering his tiger bait. ZIM! One bullet went straight through the old hyena's head. A goat each to the credit of the Doctor and the hyena.

As the work enlarged the hospital had to enlarge also. So the second hospital was erected, where the operations are performed and the in-patients are kept. A trained nurse—native—looks after the patients. On the wall a tablet reads:

THE J. W. MCCLEAVE
MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

The old hospital is used as a dispensary, a drug store, and the compounder fills all the prescriptions there. On the veranda of the old building the preaching service is held every morning. After the patients get their tickets for their medicines they wait for this service. The Doctor thinks they need healing for their souls as well as their bodies. Thousands of people every year hear the gospel message that otherwise would never hear it.

All of this medical work is co-ordinated as far as possible with the evangelistic program of the station. The names of villagers who come are given to the evangelists, so that when they visit those villages they have friends who know something of the work. The Bible women also are informed, and two approaches are thus often possible to the hearts of the people.

The largest record thus far at the hospital was an average of ninety-six patients a day for a whole year, or a grand total of 35,040 treatments. And the records show that the treatments were actually given to 12,000 different patients. And yet there are young M. D.'s in America going through a starvation period of four or five years waiting for a practice. Is it any wonder that the whole town salaams the Doctor Sahib as he goes up and down their streets? The Doctor loves his home. He has a family of four, two boys and two girls, all now in school in America. The oldest was on the firing line in France, in the gas and flame department. The government out here asked the Sahib if he was willing to go to war, and he volunteered his services whenever called upon. But the war came to a close before he was called to go. It will thus be seen that the government has taken note that the Doctor is in Hindustan. His good influence has trickled out of the hospital into the towns and villages, up through the educational circles, and to the highest authorities in the town, and the whole district.

AT the time of the King's visit to India and the bit coronation services held at Delhi, there were durbars held all over India. A durbar is a public official celebration, or official meeting, and in many cases there is a big procession through the principal streets. For glitter and array, and paint, and jewelry, and gorgeous colors, and mixture of the old and the new, the red tape, the durbar takes the cake. Well, in Harda they had a big procession at the durbar in honor of his majesty's visit. The procession was led by a big lumbering elephant, properly and gaily decorated. On the elephant's back was the chief magistrate of the town, and sitting on his right was the Doctor Sahib. It is hard to tell which was the more pleased, the Doctor or the elephant. Oh, for a Graflex and a housetop, for a scene like that!

Later he was asked to report to the capital of the district, at a great durbar to be held there. He went, and the chief magistrate made an address and called seven men forward to receive the durbar medal. Among these seven was the Doctor Sahib of Harda, whose medal was given as a mark of appreciation for his philanthropic work among the poor, and the splendid service rendered during the plague.

In 1913 his second furlough came, a little ahead of time, on account of the wear and tear on his constitution of such a busy life. When the citizens heard of his necessary return to America a public farewell reception was held in the town hall. They presented him with an address, a very fine Oriental custom. The address was printed on satin, and rolled and presented in a solid silver casket. Viceroys and others who have rendered distinguished service are given this kind of recognition. The address was as follows:

"To Dr. C. C. Drummond, B. A., M. D.

"Dear Sir:

"We, the citizens of Harda, having learned about your sudden departure from this place on account of your ill health, meet you this evening with a feeling of deep sorrow which can be better imagined than expressed.

"We are conscious of the valuable work done by you as a medical officer of the mission dispensary here, as well as the philanthropic spirit with which you were always ready to help the rich and poor alike. Your unflinching devotion to duty in time and out of time, when few would have cared to risk their own safety has not only been a source of immense help and consolation to many a poor sufferer, but has set an everlasting example of self-sacrifice which it is impossible for us to forget.

"We have not words sufficient to express the deep debt of gratitude which we owe you.

"We pray to God to bless you with long life and prosperity. We remain, sir, Yours sincerely,

"Citizens of Harda."

This service was shared in by rich and poor alike, high caste and low caste; by Mohammedans, Hindus, and Christians.

A rest in the homeland, a missionary tour among the Ozarks, and some treatment at Battle Creek, sent him back to India for his third term of service.

A small man physically is the Doctor Sahib. When he was married he weighed one hundred and twenty-four. He now weighs one hundred and twenty-five. He says at Battle Creek when they got him fattened up, he weighed one hundred twenty-five and a half. (R. A. D. and A. McL. take notice.)

HE is likewise a versatile sort of a chap. He can sew if necessary, can darn socks and knit, can make a cake or pancake, can paint furniture, and can fix up a house ready to live in, as tastily as a woman. He also preaches as the occasion demands, and such occasions are numerous. Often at the hospital when the evangelists are not present he does the preaching. At the English service he takes regular turns with the other missionaries every two or three weeks. After he had presided at the birth of a new Hindustan baby the mother said: "The nurse did not come, so the Doctor Sahib washed the baby better than I could have done it."

Of course, he cannot cut his own hair, so he hires the town barber at one rupee (about forty cents) a month to keep his hair trimmed and to shave him every other day. The barber goes to his customers instead of having them come to him. He goes to their places of business, or to their homes, carrying his kit of tools with him. I had him come to the bungalow and cut my hair. He was barefooted, wore a dhoti—a sari wrapped around his loins—and a big white turban on his head. The regular price was four annas, about nine cents, and he expected no tip in addition. The Doctor says that in addition to doing the barber work he also tells him the gossip of the town and charges him nothing extra. (In this respect barbers run true to form the world around.)

I have just spent several days in Harda. One day was set apart to accompany the Doctor Sahib on his daily work. We were on the way before seven o'clock. As we went down the street in the tonga a man stopped us. "Salaam, Sahib, come to my house at once, my brother is sick." We went. I went with him into the little front room where the sick man with a fever lay on a little dirty cot. He held out his hand to have his pulse taken. Then the man's sister was brought in with rheumatism, and she too had her pulse taken. Then a girl of fifteen with a swollen neck was ushered in, and she stuck out her hand to have the Sahib feel of her pulse. That's the style out here, everybody thinks they will get better if the Sahib feels of their pulses.

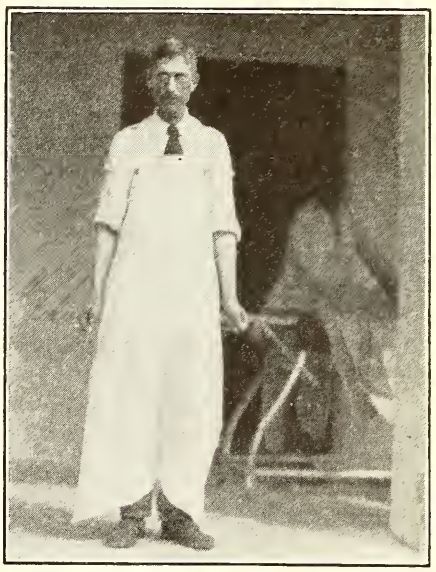
AS we left, a boy stopped us a half square down the street and wanted him to come, a man had the fever. Another boy salaamed who had had a timber fall on his neck. A grain merchant wanted him to go and see his wife. Another man came out of his little mud house and said he had someone sick in his house and that he had been waiting two days for the Sahib to pass that way. As we passed through the bazaar several others wanted help for various ills. There must have been at least a dozen different people on the street that morning asking for help, before we arrived at the hospital.

It happened to be a rainy morning, and when we got on the veranda there were only two men there. In less than three minutes there were a dozen. And what a motley crowd they were! One fellow with his leg off half to his knee, hobbling up on a bamboo crutch; a schoolboy with a big bottle for medicine; another boy with a sore ear. A gray-bearded grandfather wanted him to go and see his wife. A woman with a cataract in her eye; an operation is necessary. Another woman with a nude baby astride her hip, the baby with sore eyes. A Mohammedan patriarch wanted the Sahib to go and pull his wife's tooth. A farmer with an ox cart drove in six miles for medicine for his wife and two children. I never knew before that there could be so many diseases. In a week's time people with malaria, typhoid, smallpox, eczema, sore eyes, itch, leprosy, plague, tumor, dyspepsia, and I suppose a hundred other ills come pouring into the dispensary for treatment.



Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India

The assistant records each person's name, age, caste, disease, and number, and a ticket is given. If a man returns he must bring this ticket.

As the evangelist began his morning sermon everyone present leaned forward. One man sitting on the floor took in every word. The old grandfather seemed to absorb every gesture. The one-legged man had an expectant look as if he hoped to be miraculously healed. The speaker spoke with earnestness and directness on the incident of Christ washing the disciples' feet. He emphasized faithfulness, service and humility. He told of the progress of Christianity in Africa and China, and said that the gospel was not for high caste or low caste, but for all. He urged them to accept the teaching and when they understood it to accept and publicly confess Christ.

To me it was a dramatic scene. The rain pattering upon the tile roof, brown Hindu and Mohammedan men and women sitting on their haunches listening to a Christian sermon. In the yard a half dozen bile garis, beyond them a square away a public well, and women with water pots on their heads coming and going in the rain. By the side of the well a washer woman pounding out her washing on the rocks. Out on the road the herdsman taking the cows and goats to pasture for the day. A man and wife walking up the road, the man under an umbrella, the woman ten feet behind taking the rain. The old Musselman patriarch stirring uneasily as the evangelist pressed home the claims of a divine Christ upon their lives. And then the prayer. I could not understand it, but it touched my heart. And then the crowd at the drug room to get their medicines. When they scattered to go back into their humble homes I am quite sure that they carried more with them than what was contained in the bottles. Their hearts must certainly have been stirred with new sensations of service, and sympathy, and unselfishness, as was mine.

That night I ate dinner with the Doctor in his home. There are flowers in his yard. Great trees luxuriantly green and beautiful surround the house and the yard. While we were eating, a note was sent in. A man wanted medicine. It is impossible to confine all the work to the dispensary, hospital and office hours. I slept that night in the bungalow the Doctor has lived in for nearly twenty-two years. It is on the edge of the town away from the congested part of the population. The night was calmly quiet except for the music of the jackals. As the Aryan and the Anglo-Saxon are first cousins, so also most certainly the coyote and the Indian jackal must be blood brothers. One lone scout sang out his evening bugle call in a long, low, tenor howl. Soon another answered him, and then another. Then it sounded as if a whole jackal symphony chorus had come together for their evening serenade. The sopranos and the altos and the basses came in strong, but when the tenors got to going good they made the welkin ring with their weird, uncanny voices. The Doctor says he often hears them and thinks for the moment he is back again in Gosper county among the Nebraska coyotes.

The next day I saw the Doctor operate on a little girl of about five, removing five tumors as large as quails' eggs. His instruments were carefully sterilized and he was as gentle as the child's own mother could have been. And that afternoon I baptized eight persons in a big cement tank in the hospital yard, two of them a farmer and his wife, patients in the hospital. The people had requested that the new Sahib perform this service.

SOME very amusing things happen to the Sahib, and he has a deal of dry humor and wit. The old Mohammedan patriarch took him over to pull his wife's tooth the week before. When he was all ready, with his forceps out, she backed down. She stood it for a week and then submitted. When the tooth came out the old man was elated with joy. To show his appreciation he shook hands with the Doctor and congratulated him upon the "successful operation." On another day a woman came to the hospital with a queer look in her eye. She walked right up to the Doctor, shook hands with him, and before he knew what was happening she kissed him. The Doctor dryly remarked: "She turned out to be crazy, but it was never quite clear whether she went crazy before or after she kissed me." The day before I arrived his horse ran away and the tonga was upset, throwing the Doctor's head against a stone wall and bruising him quite severely in several places. The Doctor's comment was: "As far as I was able to discover it did no damage to the wall."

I would be unfair to the Doctor Sahib and to the cause of missions if I made him out to be a greater man than he really is. He is not a world beater; he lays no claim to greatness. He frankly says that he is not an expert surgeon. He does honest work on every operation, and he has many of them. He never slights any case whether the patient be rich or poor. Along with the skill of sharp instruments, a steady hand, and a cool, keen judgment, is a warm, sympathetic heart, which gives a touch of confidence to both himself and his patient. The result of this is that many people get well who otherwise might die. What I am trying to say is, that Dr. C. C. Drummond, the Doctor Sahib of Hindustan, is just a good, strong, average man, a good, strong, average doctor, and a good, strong, average missionary. That he is a man without guile and without hypocrisy; that he is, as far as I have been able to learn, unselfish and wholly devoted to one great cause; that he is a man of great humility; that he is a man with a big heart and a big soul; that he believes in his job, and that he has stuck to his job through "thick and thin" for twenty-two years; that he toils early and late, through the hot season, through the rainy season, in fact the year round, to do his best to heal the bodies of his Indian friends, and also to make them understand and know that other "friend that sticketh closer than a brother."

The day I left the Doctor I asked him what was the most hopeful outlook about his work. He replied:

"The hopeful thing is that the people are not satisfied. They are looking for something better. They are reading, thinking, buying literature. They are asking questions."

"But with all the idolatry and superstitions about you, can you still believe that Christianity will prevail in India?"

The enthusiasm of the ancient crusader was evident in his reply: "There is no doubt of Christianity's triumph. It is growing right along. Thousands are being won. There was a time when the government would not employ Christians. Now they are glad to get them. The old things are gradually passing away in India and the only thing that can permanently remain is Christianity, and the wholesome things for which it stands."

He is still a comparatively young man, only fifty-two, and going strong. His friends are scattered far and wide in this beautiful land with its many varieties of trees, its broad plains, its great and wonderful mountains, its sacred rivers and its most interesting people. He hopes before he passes on to see the second generation out here ready to take his place.

Missions and Drink

WE have captured the first line of trenches in the fight for world prohibition. The eighteenth amendment becomes stronger as similar laws are enacted by other nations. Liquor is a world evil and requires a world remedy. We are not secure at home with most of the nations alcoholic. The movement for world prohibition is a part of the world uplift program. If we believe in sobriety and all the other blessings that attend it it is our plain and simple duty to bring to other peoples these blessings. We must hasten to make amends for some wrongs which we have helped to inflict. We have contributed to the misery of some of the backward peoples by debauching them with American liquor.

In April, 1918, when neither flour nor sugar could be bought in the Belgian Congo, and when freight, including a great many of the necessaries of life, was being held up in New York City for months because of war needs, an American vessel discharged at the Congo ports its cargo, which consisted almost entirely of American beer. In August, 1918, when more than seventy foreign missionaries of various boards, anxious to return to Africa and other foreign fields, were held in New York City for months because the Government needed all possible steamer space for war work, a vessel left New York City for Liberia and Sierra Leone, West Africa, with a cargo of whisky, including 30,000 gallons of one prominent brand.

It was incidents like these that led Bishop McConnell of the Methodist Church recently to make this amazing statement: "I am of the conviction that the English-speaking races up to the present have done greater harm to the world through the liquor traffic and the opium trade than their missionaries have done good." We must overtake our mistakes by prosecuting the campaign against drink everywhere. Many nations like China and Mexico are helpless if we do not give them aid.

All missionary endeavor will be quickened and made more fruitful as the hindrance of drink is reduced or removed. Just as here at home intemperance stood in the way of the progress of the gospel, so abroad it presents one of the most troublesome problems of the missionary. Moreover, he cannot turn aside from his definite task to devote his time to this reform. He will do all he can in connection with his other duties, just as thousands of ministers in this country have done for many years. But the cause of temperance must in the main be promoted by agencies that make that their special task just as has been the case here at home. The machinery is already at hand; men and women technically trained in temperance work can very soon create a sentiment that would mean the end of the liquor traffic now so hurtful to mission lands. There is room for every man and for every agency to strike a blow.

As America has set the example it is hoped that other nations will soon follow her lead. World prohibition is not an impossible thing. As Colonel House recently said, "With the United States under prohibition it will eventually influence all Europe to vote dry because it cannot compete industrially with sober America. The United States alert and responsive to this new opportunity will be the religious, moral and economic leader of the world." L. E. SELLERS.

The Call for Leadership

"WHAT is God's call to the colleges and universities of this particular day? It may be summed up in the one ward, the call for leadership—leadership in the sense which Christ had in mind when he taught that he who would be greatest must be the servant of all. There comes to the students of our day a demand for a great and unparalleled offering of lives dedicated to the service of God and man. To use the language of Samuel J. Mills of over two generations ago, 'would that we might break out upon the non-Christian world like the Irish rebellion, 40,000 strong.'

"One loving heart sets another heart on fire," sand Saint Augustine. "For conquest of ideals," says an American Christian teacher, "there must be contact of spirit." That means witness-bearing, communication, propaganda. The past five years have revealed anew what the possibilities of propaganda are. Is it not time to launch a propaganda for the glory of God and for the highest conceivable welfare of the world? In view of the foregoing considerations this closing section frankly challenges students to consider some form of definite, personal, Christian work, as the most effective way of serving their generation and carrying forward the high tradition of the present expectant hour. Why should not the faces of students be turning in directions where the need is greatest, as they seek to answer the question: "What shall I do with my life?"—From "Somewhere in All the World."

"Old Lonjataka Is Dead" *

By STEPHEN J. COREY

I REMEMBER as though it were but yesterday, old Lonjataka's words in the summer of 1912. It was just after the preaching service the day before we left Monieka. It was the Lord's day and the big, mud-walled, palm-thatched tabernacle was filled to overflowing. Inside and out the crude building the people were hushed and tense while that Whitefield of the jungles, Timothy Iso, preached his great sermon on the prodigal son. Lonjataka was on the platform, seated in one of his own crude chairs made from forest sticks and brought from the hut of his favorite wife for the occasion. He had on his Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes—a big, red blanket folded several times and looped around his thighs for a loin cloth, a necklace of leopard's teeth about his neck, a leopard skin belt with a huge sheath knife thrust into it, a long spear grasped in his hand, brass bracelets on his wrists, and an anklet of the same material on one ankle—while he had put on the finishing touches for this occasion by having the exposed parts of his body freshly painted with red camwood powder and palm oil.

At the beginning of the service he sat erect, bearing himself like the chief he was, but as Iso went on with his sermon and swayed his audience with the passion of his appeal, old Lonjataka also became affected. Soon he had lost his dignified, stern bearing and sat rather a helpless figure with his lips apart, an appearance of sadness on his old, scarred face and a look of intense interest and concern in his eyes. Again and again during the discourse Timothy Iso would turn to the old chief and appeal to him to become a Christian. Summoning all of his eloquence and descriptive powers, this fearless evangelist would picture the old ex-cannibal chief of his own village as the wandering, heartsick prodigal. There was no resentment in the face of Lonjataka, but only sadness. As the evangelist finished his message and the people prepared for the communion service, the old man slipped quietly from the platform and went away to his hut. After the beautiful service of communion was over one of the missionaries and I sought him out and talked to him of the things of Christ. Our departure came on the next day and the old man had been a good friend. He had done everything within the power of a pagan chief to make our stay pleasant and profitable. I told him that I would probably never see him again and of the anxiety of my heart that he, the leader of his whole section, should become an humble follower of Jesus Christ. I shall never forget the sad look on the old pagan face and the earnestness with which he spoke of his difficulties in becoming a Christian. He said that he knew the way of the white man was right and that he had already decided he could not be polygamous and was living with one wife, but he said, "I am an old man and the ways of my fathers have been my ways many years. It is hard for Lonjataka to understand this new story. Perhaps if the white man had come sooner I would have been a Christian."

One could not help but love the old chief. In the early days he was a fierce warrior and his tribesmen were unconquered by any of those round about. He even overcame the state troops, led by Belgian officers and with difficulty did these leaders escape his wrath and the cannibal feast in which a number of the black soldiers of the Belgians were slain and eaten. For this crime a price was put upon his head and for years the old man had hidden in the forest when state officers or white traders came to his town. With the establishment of the work in Monieka by the missionaries and the settlement there of Timothy Iso, the native evangelist, the old man had become quieted and had given up his savage, heathen ways. It was our privilege to bear to him a message from the governor of equatorial Africa, that the price was removed from his head and he need no longer hide in the forest at the approach of a white man.

Lonjataka had been generous to the missionaries on all occasions and had shown special attention to me as the visitor from the white man's land. The first evening of our stay in Monieka he had spoiled the dignity of our missionary supper on the steamer by bringing his present, a live goat, and insisting on presenting it to the visitor while he was seated at the evening meal. Discovering that the missionaries like a certain kind of fruit, the nsabu, which grew on a tree in front of his hut, he had pulled with his own hands a basket of this choice fruit and presented it to our group. He had personally conducted us through the length and breadth of his village, showing us with great pains the blacksmith shop, the process of hol-

Paying Tribute to the New Chief

*The following word comes from Dr. L. F. Jaggard, missionary at Monieka, Africa, concerning the great chief of that distant village: "Old Lonjataka is dead. He died of influenza a few days after I arrived. The old men of the town have given me the old chief's proverb, 'We leave our marks,' for my own. Stephen Corey can explain the why of the proverb and its use among the people."

This brief announcement has far more meaning than is evident on the surface, and the heart of many a missionary will be sad because of the passing of this stalwart old heathen chief. Although a great friend to the missionaries, he died without becoming a Christian.

lowing out one of the huge, wooden drums, the vegetable gardens, the making of pottery, the town market, and many other interesting things. We had been struck with the kind, playful nature of the old man from the fact that the little children of the village had followed without fear at his heels and evaded with shouts of laughter the old man's mock attempts to capture them.

As I look back over those brief days at Monieka, two things stand out above all else. The first was the reception which Lonjataka gave us as we landed at the village beach and the second was the farewell to him and to Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard as we sailed away. We had long anticipated our visit to Monieka. It was then the most distant town of real missionary effort in our section of Central Africa. We had sailed up the Busira river for several days to reach our destination and came in sight of Monieka just as the sun was setting. It seemed as though there must have been half a mile of Africans on top of the steep bank, watching our arrival. Their unclothed forms stood out in strange relief against the purple glow of the sunset. As we came up to the beach a large part of the congregation were singing in the native tonuge, "Bringing in the Sheaves." They were grouped on the log steps reaching from the beach to the top of the bank, eighty feet above. On landing, Mr. A. F. Hensey, captain of the steamer, took the two new missionaries and myself immediately to meet Lonjataka. He was standing somewhat apart from the others on the top of the bank awaiting our coming. He shook hands with us gravely and told the missionary to tell us that we were welcome to his town. It is customary for each chief to have a life proverb, or a "losoko," which he gives to every one who addresses him. I asked him for his proverb and his reply was so brief that I immediately asked the missionary to translate it for us. This life text of his was, "We leave our marks." In other words, he stated that whenever he or his men passed through a forest they always broke twigs across the path so that the next traveler might find his way and not be hopelessly lost in the jungle. What a proverb from a heathen man! What a message to the Christian visitors!

Monieka Chief and His Favorite Wife Presenting a Fish to the Missionaries

Finally the day came for our departure. A crude mud hut had been extemporized for Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard, whom we were leaving as the first missionaries for Monieka. They stood by their hut to bid us godspeed and Lonjataka came also to say good-bye. He asked what our plans were for Monieka and we told him that we intended to send more workers, to build a hospital, to give his people medicines and healing, to build a number of homes for the white missionaries and schools for the instruction of the young, and to make Monieka a strong station for the teaching of Christ. Then we sailed away. Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard in front of the little hut, wave their good-bye, the old chief standing in the village street watched us depart in quietness.

How well have we kept our promise to old Lonjataka and his village? Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard were obliged to stay on alone for a long while, until her health was undermined and she came back to America never to return. Her lonely husband is now back at Monieka doing his best to carry on the medical work after the hospital had been closed for two years. Mr. and Mrs. Hedges and Miss Smith are his only companions from America. More than seven years have come and gone while Lonjataka and his people have waited for more messengers from the white man's land.

We wonder what the message of the old man will be as he stands before the judgment seat of Christ. Will he who died a heathen man be more accused than we who withheld the Truth from him and his people? Lonjataka always made his mark in the forest so that the next man passing through would not lose his way. How have we marked the path to Christ so that his people in neglected Africa might reach the great goal? Upon the Disciples of Christ rests the responsibility of evangelizing Lonjataka's tribes along the equator in the dark continent. How long, O God, how long will his people wait for our coming?

Post-Victory Problems

The time may come, in our warfare against the great evils, when we can, metaphorically speaking, turn our swords into ploughshares, and our sabers into pruning hooks, but it will not be in the year 1920. It is a striking oratorical stunt to say that John Barleycorn is dead and buried beyond hope of resurrection, but as a matter of fact it is not the strict truth. He is still very much alive and actively working to defeat the purposes of the prohibitory law of the nation.

Post-victory problems are fully as serious as those with which we have theretofore been compelled to grapple. For one thing, there lies before us the task of making people who are superficial thinkers realize the seriousness of the law enforcement question.

All such ideas are shallow and fail utterly to grasp the fact that a full generation must pass before all the blessings of the victory we now are celebrating can be fully secured for the generations that follow. With perhaps ten millions of foreign-speaking people among us who do not know why prohibition is here and why they are denied their liquors, with millions of dollars in the whisky treasury to be spent in agitation, with our nations' childhood to be taught through our public and church schools the blessings of abstinence, with vast quantities of liquor stored in the homes of drinkers for private use, with press and political leaders generally chary and skeptical, it is the evident task of temperance agencies to quicken and arouse the national conscience on the whole matter. The nation must not simply be brought to obey the law; it must be brought to believe in the law and to stand for its efficient operation.

Along with this the temperance forces must also undertake to deal with the questions of the social evil, Sunday observance, gambling, and other forms of lawlessness. But above all the challenge of world prohibition is ringing in our ears and we must hasten to set the world free from the bondage of drink. Only so can we guarantee to future generations this freedom for which we have fought. "He that saveth his own life (whether nation or individual, and leaves the rest of the world alone) shall lose it."

Ministry of Healing in the Philippines

By DR. C. L. PICKETT

THE program of our Lord coupled the ministry of healing with that of preaching, teaching and casting out the spirits that kept men from doing and being what God meant that they should. Manifestly, therefore, the program of the church today cannot be complete if it omits this important form of service. The work in the Philippines is no exception. The need for help is great. We are trying to meet it.

Why Medical Help Is Needed

First, it is needed because of the indifference of great masses of people toward disease and the spirit of fatalism that prevails all but universally toward death. Skin diseases prevail everywhere and little attention is paid to them. Often children are literally covered with itch before the mothers will seek a remedy. It is no uncommon thing for them to refuse help absolutely when offered gratuitously on the ground that if that is cured the child will probably get something worse. Blood diseases like yaws and syphilis they do not understand and take no cautions to prevent. One of the most popular midwives of Laoag is an active syphilitic. A favorite wet-nurse in former years was the wife of a leper. I found her serving in the home of the governor; at another time in the home of a prominent lawyer, and again she was nursing the child of my best medical helper. People ridicule the idea of using a mosquito net to prevent malaria, of boiling the drinking water to prevent dysentery, or of getting a young child vaccinated to prevent smallpox. If they get sick and die "It is the will of God" and that settles all argument.

Second, because of the theories prevalent concerning the cause and origin of disease. They need to be taught. One common idea is that disease is caused by an evil spirit getting into the body. Another common cause is an evil genii that lives in trees and throws something at you when you pass by unless you can somehow manage to keep its good will. Water must not touch the body of the sick, for if it does the patient will die. The oily substance on the top of the head of the new-born babe must not be removed else the child will get air or tetanus through the anterior fontanel and die.

Third, because of the inadequate medical help everywhere. In many provinces there are only a few native doctors and these are often indifferent toward the masses. There are many towns of ten and fifteen thousand inhabitants with no representative at all of either the medical or nursing profession. Midwives are almost universally of the ignorant class and the child death rate remains very close to the 50 per cent mark all the time.

Fourth, the program of the Roman Catholic Church and the Spanish government was altogether inadequate to meet the needs of the islands. At the time of American occupation there were but three hospitals to meet the needs of about 8,000,000 people. One of these was for lepers, one for the insane and one of a general nature. People living in the provincial districts either died or got well without assistance.

Fifth, because that everywhere there are thousands who are willing to be helped and to be taught-if only the helper and teacher is near at hand and can demonstrate his ability. In the Laoag medical work the number of treatments has increased at the steady rate of thirteen hundred a year for fifteen years. Other hospitals have had the same experience. There is little prejudice against the relief of human suffering.

Missionary Methods of Meeting the Need

In the beginning of the work it was found that a sympathetic interest in the afflicted was all that was necessary to establish the helpful contact. This done, each patient brought others. It was sometimes necessary to conduct a free clinic, thus giving a practical demonstration of what could be done. The street services of the doctor and the evangelist were often conducted together, when medicines would be distributed gratis to certain groups or for particular ailments. This free work, however, has never been considered wise or necessary to follow to any extent in the Philippines. Enough people are always willing and able to pay to keep the doctors busy. Charity work has been, therefore, very largely confined to those in actual poverty, while those who were able to pay have been charged sufficient fees to meet the expenses of all. A reasonable charge for a reasonable service has met with all but universal favor with the people. Medicines are appreciated more when paid for than when they cost nothing.

Dr. Pickett and Staff of Hospital, Laoag, Philippine Islands

Another helpful type of work is the open dispensary located so that it is freely accessible to the public with the doctor where he can be seen without a great deal of trouble. If it is convenient many people will have their troubles cared for, whereas if it is not they will let them go on indefinitely. The dispensary and open clinic is also the natural feeder of the hospital. And right here let me introduce you to our Philippine hospitals. There are three of them. The first one established was the Sallie Long Read Memorial hospital in Laoag. Medical work was begun in the station in 1903 and the hospital built in 1911-12. The hospital has a capacity of forty beds and the clinic runs about twenty-two thousand treatments a year. The writer has been connected with this work from the beginning.

The second hospital is the Mary Chiles hospital in Manila. This was built by Dr. W. N. Lemmon in 1912-13. It has a capacity of seventy beds and a clinic that runs over twenty-five thousand treatments a year. The hospital is well located in the most cosmopolitan city of the islands and cares for many Chinese, Japanese, and Indian patients as well as Americans and Filipinos. Mrs. Alice Agnew joined our forces last year and acts as matron of the hospital and superintendent of nurses. The third is the Frank Dunn Memorial hospital in Vigan. This was organized by Dr. L. B. Kline in 1913, who has since resigned and been superseded by Dr. P. C. Palencia, one of our early converts, who went to the states and graduated in medicine and then returned to work with his own people. The hospital has a capacity of forty beds and a clinic of about twenty-three thousand treatments a year.

In connection with these hospitals a nurses' training school is maintained and at present fifty-nine girls and five boys are taking the four years' course outlined. The nurses change hospitals in May of each year and in this way get the broader experience afforded by provincial and city conditions and by coming in contact with the methods of different doctors. Twenty years ago there was not a graduate Filipino nurse in the islands. Today there are hundreds of them and they are all busy. We strive to combine the idea of Christian service with that of the healing art so that as our nurses go out they can be a real help to the churches religiously as well as to the public professionally. We are rendering no more gratifying service today along any line than that being rendered in the training of these splendid girls.

One day, while driving through a nearby village, a woman came running out and, calling me by name, implored me to stop and see her child, who, she said, was bleeding to death. Examination revealed the fact that a small artery had been cut by a fall and for thirteen hours the little stream of blood had defied all the bandages and wisdom she could command in the town. A pledget of gauze saturated with a little Monsell's solution and a bandage properly applied produced the desired results at once.

Malaria, like the poor, is always with us. One day, in 1906, we either treated or dispensed medicine for ninety-six different persons suffering from this one disease. Every year this record during many days of the rice harvest in November and December is all but duplicated.

A mother not long ago brought her child to the hospital suffering with spasms. She said the attacks were frequent. A few doses of santonin and calomel relieved the youngster of forty-three round worms and a veritable menagerie of other intestinal "fauna." The spasms stopped.

A man with a tumor on his foot was brought to the hospital for an operation. While convalescing he was given a New Testament to read. At first he was quite indifferent toward it, but before the end of the week he only laid it down to eat and sleep. Before he went home he was baptized and asked for a copy of the book to take home with him as, so far as he knew, none of his neighbors had ever seen it.

Last March I was called to a town twelve miles away to see a woman suffering from eclampsia following childbirth. For thirty hours she had been unconscious and had had a number of spasms. A nurse was put on the job with instructions to enforce cleanliness immediately and persistently. In six hours without any medicine at all she regained consciousness, her fever subsided and she had no more trouble.

During the epidemic of influenza every bed in the hospital was occupied and twice as many more patients were laid on the floor in the effort to care for as many of the suffering as possible.

Tropical yaws is a disease very prevalent in our district. No adequate remedy was ever known for it until about seven years ago. I am giving you a few pictures so that you can see what it is like. The medicine is injected into a vein. The cure is immediate. In a few weeks all traces of the disease are gone. Our record of cures is now above two thousand.

But why continue. We are simply trying to meet the needs of the people each day as they come to us and thus serve them and our Lord as he gave us the example.

Under the Cherry Trees

NINE years ago Miss Armbruster and Miss Asbury conducted the first campaign for Christ at the cherry blossom season in the beautiful park at Akita. These meetings have been held for a week or ten days yearly since that time and have increased in usefulness each year.

The cherry blossoms bring out all the people. The country people have few holidays, but all find occasion to visit the park at least once during the days when the flowers are at their best. The park is one of the five most beautiful in Japan. This site was once the citadel of the lord of Akita, Saktake. Besides, here are to be found the temples nearest to the hearts of the people and the festival days are so arranged that they fall during this gala week. Thus are we always assured of an audience.

During these busy days we attempt three things. First, we emphasize telling the "story." This year, besides our own pastor and the pastor of the local Methodist Church, we had one of our experienced older men from Tokyo and one of our younger men from the country. These men delivered splendid messages full of life and power. Generally they would speak for some thirty minutes, but often they would hold their audience for an hour or two or longer.

Then we sang the "story." The Japanese are very fond of music and so between the speeches we would sandwich in one or more hymns which were written on cloth and hung upon a kind of easel of our own design just behind the speaker's stand. This served to center the attention of the people. Many who heard for the first time could not understand these songs, but they knew they were different from those of the dancing girls who were singing here and there in the park.

Last of all we sold the "story." Until this year we had done quite a bit of free distribution of literature, but we were sure that it was not the best way to get at the people. Through the kindness of Miss Clawson and Charles S. Medbury's church we had a fund for literature in hand. With this we bought hundreds of sermons and addresses in tract form. These we arranged in packs of ten which we sold for a little less than cost—but we sold them. At first we were anxious, but after a day or two a spirit like unto that of other days was hovering near—we were book agents once more with a regular canvass and many a farmer and merchant and student and child went away with at least ten sermons of eight pages each tucked neatly beneath his "kimono," to be read by himself and shown to others at his leisure. Besides this special, which was an experiment, and which proved such a success, we made splendid gains on Bibles, hymnals and devotional and inspirational books. We also had another innovation in offering tracts on temperance for sale. One old woman with her merry-making bottle grasped firmly in her right hand said when approached, "Well, I am now seventy-two and I have been drinking even until the present time, but here are the two pennies. I want to see what you have to say." One of the pastors of the city who was away on some work in the country at the time of our campaign, said that nearly all he met had heard the sermons and the singing and many of them had made some purchase of literature.

Next year will be the "tenth." The Japanese are strong on anniversaries. Add your prayers to our efforts, that it may be golden.

Is China a Republic?

By ALEXANDER PAUL

CHINA is facing the greatest crisis in her history. The life of the country is at stake. Until the revolution in 1911, which resulted in the dethroning of the Manchurian emperor and forming the Republic of China, there had always been a ruling dynasty which kept the nation together. When the Republic was established, this was done away, and, as one of China's greatest statesmen said at that time, "China will either progress rapidly under the republican form of government, or disintegrate." That she has not progressed rapidly and that at the present time it would seem she is on the verge of disintegration, is primarily not the fault of China, but is largely the result of the inhuman way in which China has been treated by the outside powers. Some of the very best parts of the country have been wrested from China by the strong powers for no legitimate reason whatever.

One of the first of these aggressions was that committed by Great Britain in 1839, when she declared war against China because the Chinese government, after protesting fruitlessly against English merchants shipping in opium, destroyed $12,000,000 (gold) worth in Canton. It did not take long for the British arms to defeat China and in 1841 Great Britain tried to force her to cede to her the Island of Hongkong and to pay $6,000,000 in return for the opium destroyed. To his credit be it said that the Chinese emperor refused to sign the treaty and the war was renewed. In 1842, however, a still more drastic concession was forced from China in which she had to pay an additional $15,000,000 for the expense of the war and debts claimed by British merchants, owing to the war. Thus China lost Hongkong.

Still the Chinese government protested against the British merchants forcing the opium trade upon her people. The Chinese people were rapidly becoming slaves to the drug and, in 1857, after another strong protest, and the refusal to allow opium to be landed from India, Great Britain again declared war on China. Again she was defeated, and the Emperor once more refused to sign the treaty drawn up by Great Britain which was to legalize the opium traffic, but in 1860 both the British and the French soldiers captured Tientsin and fought their way to Peking, burned down the summer palace, routed the Chinese army and once more China was forced to sign a treaty in which she had to legalize the opium traffic, pay 8,000,000 taels and cede Kowloon, a most important island across the bay from Hongkong.

The one redeeming feature of this page in the history of England's dealing with China is that the people of Great Britain were opposed to the actions of the East India Trading Company. The Christian people were always opposed to the forcing of opium upon China.

France, seeing how successful Great Britain had been in securing concessions from China, determined to follow suit. The excuse for her invasion of Cochin-China was the murder of a French priest in 1856, and complications which grew out of this. As a result of this invasion China was compelled to recognize the validity of the treaties entered into between France and Annam in 1864, and to cede Tonquin, China, to the French.

One of the most persistent of these encroaching nations was Japan and when China would not comply with all Japan's demands, Japan declared war in 1894. As a result of China's defeat one of the most disastrous treaties in her history was forced upon her and in 1895 she had to cede to Japan the Liatung Peninsula and the island of Formosa, pay an indemnity of 200,000,000 taels, and Korea was given absolute independence. To offset this, in 1897 Count Muraview, on behalf of Russia and in order to protect her against Japan, demanded Dalny and Port Arthur, and adjacent territories.

In 1897 two German Catholic priests were murdered in Shantung. As an indemnity, Germany demanded Kiaochow and about 120 square miles of territory surrounding that port, exclusive of coal-mining rights in Shantung, and the payment of 200,000 taels. In 1898, after protest by China, she was forced to sign the treaty.

Now that Russia had secured the lease of Port Arthur, Great Britain determined to offset this and so leased from China the port of Weihaiwei, including a strip of territory ten miles wide surrounding the bay. During the next two or three years the older statesmen in China came to realize that if something were not done to check the inroads that were being made upon their country, China would be divided among the great Western powers. These men were determined to rid the country of the foreigners. They got the support of the empress dowager, who dethroned the young emperor, took the reigns of government herself and by working secretly with her statesmen, planned the Boxer uprising, which broke out in 1900. The cruelties perpetrated by some of the Chinese officials upon the foreigners are too well known to need recounting here. The tremendous amount for indemnities which China has had to pay and which has kept her in financial straits ever since is also well known. As a result of this outbreak, religious liberty was declared and the whole country opened to commerce and the spread of the gospel.

In 1904 the Russo-Japanese war occurred. Japan won the sympathy of a large part of the western world by declaring that she was fighting Russia in order to champion the cause of China and Korea. As a result of Japan's defeat of Russia, she at once took her place among the great nations of the world. After several years' dickering between Japan and Russia as to the fate of Korea, Japan, who was supposed to fight for Korea's independence, annexed Korea in 1910, thus making her a dependency of Japan.

During these years there had been growing among the student class in China a spirit of discontent and suspicion both of the Manchurian government and the western powers. The young manhood of China blamed the reigning dynasty for the loss of so much Chinese territory. To save their country the younger generation of China overthrew the reigning dynasty in the revolution of 1911.

When peace was declared the leading statesmen, as well as the leading diplomatic representatives of the foreign powers expressed the opinion that it would be a great mistake to try to establish a republic, that a constitutional monarchy would be much better suited to the needs of China at this time. Dr. Sun Yat Sen was made provisional president and after months of deliberation as to what should be the form of government, it was decided that China should become a republic. Yuan Shih Kai, who since the death of Li Hung Chang, had been China's great military statesman, was elected the first president. It was well known that he was opposed to China becoming a republic, but he was prevailed upon for the sake of peace to accept the presidency. The next great step was to elect the members of the house of representatives and senate. This was done in a haphazard sort of way. When these men took office in Peking their first duty was to elect a committee to draw up a constitution. This parliament was elected with the understanding that they were to be in power until the permanent constitution would be adopted by the country.

From the very first, parliament and the president differed very greatly as to what power should be vested in the two houses and the president. The members of parliament, as they were called, wanted practically all the power to rest with the legislature, whereas the president was determined that the power should be vested in the president. Very little progress was made and the sentiment against the president was growing so rapidly among the ultra-radical party in parliament that a deadlock was reached and resulted in what was called the second revolution, which broke out in June, 1913. "The outcome of the rebellion was the loss of great numbers of lives, the extinction of an untold amount of fixed capital in devastated cities, towns, and villages, banks looted, merchandise plundered, crops destroyed, and in general throughout a wide region, an impartial dissemination of rack and ruin. Nanking was captured and the city looted and ravished in such a way as to be a standing disgrace to the president and to China."

As the result of the failure of this revolution, President Yuan had more power than ever and on November 4 took a step which perhaps has been unparalleled in the history of nations for many generations. By a mandate he dissolved the radical party in parliament and drove them from the city of Peking. At once there arose the cry that this was unconstitutional and by the expulsion of these members it left parliament unable to function as they could not get a quorum. Conditions went from bad to worse and it became evident that it was going to be impossible for the president to hold the country together. The governors of the provinces, who in most cases were developing large standing armies, did very much as they pleased and only listened to the president when it suited their interests. "Within about six weeks the whole machinery of government had been remodeled. The cabinet was shorn of its power; the post of prime minister was abolished. All authority was concentrated in the hands of the president, the control of the army, the navy, the national treasury. In a more absolute sense than Louis XIV was the State, Yuan Shih-kai is the Chinese Republic."

IT was the opinion of the majority of foreigners in China that President Yuan was sincere in his trying to govern the country for the best interests of the people. These foreigners acknowledged that the president had become a dictator, but said he was driven to it. The progressive Chinese, especially the students, put a very different interpretation upon the president becoming a dictator. They maintained that it was a part of the scheme he was planning to make himself the first emperor in the new monarchy which he hoped would be established. It became noticeable that throughout the country, with the exception of the southern provinces, and the western provinces of Sze Chuan and Kwei-chow, there was a growing opinion that a republic for China would not be a success. This opinion grew so rapidly that definite overtures were made to the president to abolish the republican form of government in favor of a constitutional monarchy. These requests became so insistent that the president called what he termed a meeting of citizens' representatives who were to vote on the question whether China was to remain a republic or to change to a constitutional monarchy. The vote was practically unanimous that a constitutional monarchy should be established, with the president as the first emperor. In the opinion of the progressive Chinese, this vote was nothing but a farce, as they contended that the agitation for the change of government from that of a republic to a monarchy was worked up by the military and reactionary officials, in order to retain their power in the country.

Events moved rapidly. The date was set when Yuan Shih-kai was to be crowned. He had already changed the calendar which had been adopted by the new republic and everything seemed to be in readiness for the establishment of the new form of government when word reached Peking that the province of Yunnan demanded that the monarchy be canceled. This was refused by the president and Yunnan Province immediately seceded from the government and was quickly followed by the provinces of Kwei-chow, Kwuang-si, Kwang-tung, Chekiang, and Sze Chuan. The central government at once despatched military forces to the South to subdue these provinces, but it was soon found that this would mean a long-drawn-out civil war, and the president thought it the better part of valor to renounce the monarchy and once more establish a republic, which he did. This, however, did not appease the southern provinces, which took the position that the president was a traitor, and demanded his overthrow. This complicated things more than ever and as the president would not yield, the southern provinces united and formed a central government with Canton as the capital. This led to a complete deadlock. Union between the North and South was possible in one of two ways —the North must subdue the South or the president must retire from office. The president, through lack of money and equipment, saw it would be futile to go to war. He could make no foreign loans, the treasury was empty, and the South was more determined than ever that Yuan must go. Trade and commerce were at a standstill. The financial condition of the country was desperate. There seemed to be no way to relieve the distress. But when things looked blackest, the sudden death of Yuan Shih-kai in the first week of June brought relief.

This proved to be only momentary, however, for when the parliament was reassembled with Li Yuan Hung acting president, the same old fight as to where the power was to be lodged was revived and became so acute that the president was forced to dissolve parliament. Once again the progressive party gathered in Canton and, under the leadership of Sun Yat Sen, established an independent military government and declared a state of war between the South and North. This gives us an anomaly, the country having two parliaments in deathly opposition to one another. For months fighting of the most desperate kind went on. In the meantime, the acting president, Li Yuan Hung, resigned, thus leaving the country without a head.

This was the great opportunity for which the military parties throughout the land had waited. They took over all the powers that had been invested in the civil authorities, and ruled the people with a rod of iron. The fighting continued, lawlessness reigned supreme, and the people were powerless, being burdened with enormous taxes which had to be paid to the military party. Schools were closed, railways in the process of building were stopped; in fact, every new project had to be given up and China became chaotic. There was scarcely a province in which fighting was not going on. The suffering of the people was terrible. It looked for a time as if the lawlessness would result in driving the foreigners from China, but so far this has been avoided. In the meantime it is well understood that the money to finance the two parties which have been at war has come from Japan. Sun Yat Sen and his leaders in the South, it is reported, borrowed large sums from Japan with which to equip their army to fight against the North. At the same time the military party in Peking has been borrowing hundreds of millions of dollars from Japan. In one year alone it is said they had borrowed 300,000,000 yen, at a very high rate of interest, for which has been mortgaged some of the best iron and coal mines in the country. Constant pressure has been brought to bear upon China from outside sources, as when in 1915, when internal conditions were reaching a crisis, Japan made her notorious Twenty-one Demands upon China. When China refused to accede to these unjust demands, Japan sent her the now world-famous ultimatum.

IT is at this time when conditions are at their darkest that the work of Christian missions stands out supreme; it has been the missionary to whom these people in their desperation have turned. In many instances when everything seemed hopeless it was the missionary who was asked by the people to intercede for them with the invading hosts and many a missionary has taken his life in his hands in doing this, as the following incident taken from many will show.

"Throughout a wide belt of country extending from the Hupeh borders to the capital, say one hundred miles from northeast to southwest, and anywhere from five to twenty miles across, there is not a town or hamlet, hardly a house that has not been robbed." When they, the northern victors, re-entered Chuchow, a little town of no importance in Hunan Province, they wiped it out. Not a house was left unburnt, not a man, woman or child who had failed to flee was left alive. And so it happened to Liling as the following account will show. "After the northerners re-entered it was treated the same way as Chuchow had been treated. The railway station and two of the foreign houses of the United Evangelical Mission were burned. One of the missionaries was shot at his own door by a soldier standing in the compound. Everyone was taken away from the city compound of the mission to the hospital compound, which is on a suburban hill. After considerable trouble and delay, the missionaries were allowed to interview the general in command, who had his headquarters in a saloon carriage on the rails. He consented to a special train being got ready to carry to Changsha the remnant of living folk left in the city and suburbs; the railway staff, foreign and Chinese, the missionaries, the hospital staff and patients; the school staff and scholars; the church members—at least such of them as had been able to take refuge in the compound. When the train drew out of Liling with its freight of close on to six hundred there were no beings left in the city except northern soldiers together with an old woman of seventy and her 'natural' son, who were discovered two days later hiding amidst the ruins of the mission compound."

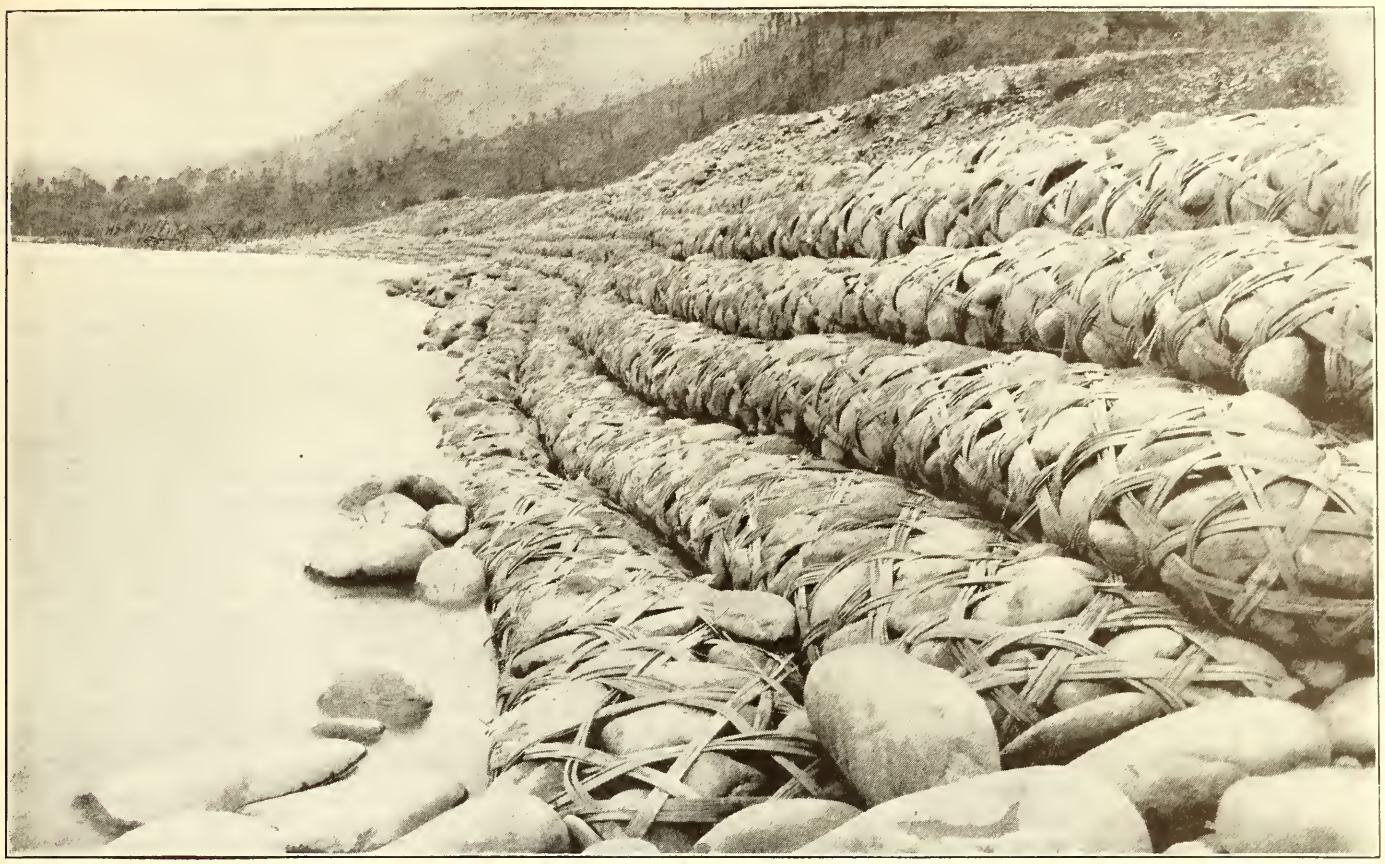
Famine! Trees Stripped of Bark for Food by Starving Chinese

In addition to the devastation caused by the civil war, China since 1911 has passed through three great famines which were caused by floods. In 1911, just before the revolution broke out, the Yangtze valley district, owing to the floods caused by the overflowing of the Yangtze river, suffered one of the worst famines in its history. It was to the missionary societies and the Red Cross that the Chinese government turned for assistance and it was America that helped out in a most generous way through large contributions. It was the missionaries and foreign business men in most cases who had charge of the construction and relief work. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent in giving assistance to the starving people and rebuilding the dikes.

IN 1917 the province of Chili was visited by one of the most disastrous floods experienced for generations. Thousands of persons are said to have lost their lives in an area of twelve thousand square miles, and the crops were partially or wholly destroyed. The loss cannot have been less than $100,000,000. At a very conservative estimate it was said that about two millions of people lost both crops and houses. Although the Chinese government was in a chaotic condition, nevertheless they responded in a most generous way to the needs of the people. Fortunately they were able to appoint Mr. Hsiung, who had the confidence and respect of the people and who handled the relief work in a most worthy manner. The missionary societies were once more appealed to and again responded not only with money, but with men and women to give their time to the active work of relief. For the first time, perhaps, an actual Christian Chinese Relief Society was established, which consisted of both Chinese and foreign Christians. Through this society large sums of money were contributed as well as gifts of grain, clothing, and other necessities. The work of this Christian society made a tremendous impression upon the Chinese. Mr. Hsiung, who had charge of all the relief work, entrusted to this Christian committee the building of a dike eighteen miles long on the important southern bank of the Taching river. Over two thousand of the flood refugees were employed. When this work was completed other sections were entrusted to this same committee, which continued to do a high type of work. In addition to this line of work the Chinese government wished to put into effect a colonization scheme. In order to have it carried through it was Professor Baillie of the University of Nanking to whom they turned to do the work. He was set free by the university for two years and is at present engaged in this great work of colonization. As a result of this line of work large sections of the people, rich and poor, as never before have appreciated the wonderful assistance rendered by the church. This has also given a great opportunity for direct evangelistic work. The churches have been crowded to overflowing and many of the leaders in China who before had been nominal Christians have come right out to take their stand on the side of Christian work with firm determination to advance the cause of Christianity, as they realize that is the only power that can save their country.

Another effect that this chaotic condition is having upon the younger leaders in China is that for the first time since the revolution in 1911, these young men and women, Christian and non-Christian, are getting together and formulating plans which they are determined to put into effect to save their country. Until now the Chinese have been excusing themselves by saying they are helpless owing to the aggressiveness of the foreign powers in appropriating to themselves the best parts of China. Already these young men and women have taken a firm stand against the corruption in high places in the government and through concerted action with the leading merchants of the country succeeded in having three of the leading men in power in Peking, who beyond a doubt had been selling out their country, dismissed from office, and in a number of the provinces committees have been formed to work together to eliminate corruption in politics and business methods.



Flood! Dike of Boulders Held Together by Interwoven Strips of Bamboo

ONE of the greatest moral victories that the young progressive party has gained was on January 17, 1919, when twelve million dollars' worth of opium was publicly burnt. This opium had been stored in Shanghai for several years by British merchants. These merchants demanded that the Chinese government pay for this opium, which the government did, and the people understood that it was to be destroyed. The military party, however, were in dire need of money and so instead of destroying the opium they privately formed an opium syndicate, legalized the sale of the drug in three provinces and sold three hundred chests to the syndicate. As soon as this became known to the public the best people in the country rose up in indignation. Mass meetings were held, petitions were sent to the government in Peking, and so much pressure was brought to bear upon the government that the remaining twelve hundred chests, amounting to $12,000,000, were publicly burnt. Twenty-one organizations, patriotic and religious, sent in requests to Peking asking that they be allowed to have representatives at both the examination and burning of the opium. At that public burning, in addition to the Chinese officials and representatives, there were the British consul general, the American consul general, and several of the leading missionaries in Shanghai.

The public burning of so much opium has had a tremendous moral effect upon the people of China, and shows to the world what China is able to do once she is aroused to her great moral needs. The growth of the Republic has been so handicapped by outside influence that until very recently it has been impossible for the Chinese to work together to any great extent. In face of the great fight to rid the country of opium these men who have been leading the people, have had the opposition not only of the military power and the merchants who were getting rich from the sale of this drug, but had also to fight opium being shipped in from outside the country. To quote from an address delivered by Dr. C. T. Wang, one of the leading delegates to the Peace Conference in Versailles:

"The great fight against opium, for instance, should be a sign of encouragement to our people, but there are forces that are very great against us. There are on one side some of the military generals who encourage poppy growing. This must be stopped. In this way some of our people possessing military power are undoing the work that has been done during the last decade, and we must put a stop to that. We must also put a stop to the channels through which foreigners have been able to bring in opium, morphine and cocaine. There is a regular channel, there is a post office of a certain nation that deals with this particular drug. I tell you it pains me to think there is a regular government agency through which parcels are being sent and distributed in large areas. I understand that the net profit from the traffic in 1918 amounted to $800,000 —just from that traffic alone, through that channel alone. How shall we fight that—or shall we let it go? Can we leave it alone?

"After you see the necessity of such a fight we must ask the question, What is the dynamo of this great fight for freedom? What is the thing that enables nations to fight for liberty? I always consider the words of Christ, 'I am not come to give peace but a sword.' Most people conceive of Christ as a most tame sort of a man. He is far from that. He is certainly kind, He is certainly full of love, but when He comes to the question of right or wrong you know that He is a fighter. He fights the wrong, and never allows any injustice to continue—whether it is injustice between individuals, one class against another class, or one nation against another nation. Christ's message is to bring a fight against injustice, against wrong, against oppression, against tyranny: for light, for life, for liberty. So in all this fight you will find that the basic or dynamic power that is behind the world's fight for liberty is Christ's conception of equality for all, equality among all classes, equality among all races, equality among all nations. That is a great fight, and that is a fight everyone of us is engaged in for life."

TO emphasize how this moral problem is getting hold of the young educated class, we quote from an article by Mr. Y. C. James Yen of Princeton University. "Will anyone who knows at all about China deny that nearly all our troubles, internal as well as external, are brought about through the corruption and selfishness of our national leaders and public officials? To be sure, the aggressive policy of a certain Prussianized power is diabolical and condemnable, but I regret to say that the party that is chiefly responsible for the present state of affairs in China is we ourselves. The foreign robber could not have broken in from without had not the national thieves opened the door from within. Unless we first break China up ourselves, no power under heaven can break her up. Fellow Christians, the fundamental solution for China's problems, political or moral, domestic or foreign, is not to be sought from without, but from within. The day is approaching when the religion of Washington, of Lincoln, of Gladstone, will produce in China the type of statesmen and public servants that she direly needs. Will you not help to hasten it? One student won to Jesus Christ is one good soldier enlisted for the cause in China. As such soldiers increase in number and in influence, the old corrupt party will suffer a natural selection and our country will then be in the clean hands of these men and women who love her, who will live and die for her."

These are the type of men that the Christian schools in China are producing. It is to these men, as well as to the missionaries, that China in her hour of travail turns. And in the final analysis it is these men who are going to win the fight against corruption in their own country and the aggression from outside nations. Never has there been a time in the history of missions when such a challenge has come to the church and especially the church in America. For generations, China has trusted America as her friend and even though President Wilson and the American delegates at the Peace Conference could not safeguard China's interests, yet the thinking people in China know that America is her friend. The Shantung incident is but one of many. Japan's attitude is logical. She wonders why she should be compelled to give up her spoils in China when Great Britain, France, Russia and other nations are allowed to retain the large tracts of China which were taken by force. It is only when President Wilson's Fourteen Points shall have become an accomplished fact that we need hope for a readjustment of the great nations with China.

In the meantime our duty is clear. The Church must press forward with ever more zeal. As China stands before the world in such a helpless condition today, and makes her appeal to the Church of Christ, we cannot betray her. Has not the Church been responsible for bringing the new civilization to China? Has it not been through the work done in the schools, hospitals, and churches, that China was brought to see her backward condition and to make the change from the old to the new? About thirty years ago, just such a challenge as this came to the Church from Japan and the Church failed to answer the challenge, with the dire result that Japan is perhaps the most agnostic nation on earth. God forbid that it shall be said thirty years from now that when China made her appeal to the Church, the Church also failed, but rather let us face the issue squarely and in His name who commanded us to go into all the world, go in and take possession of China for Him. That this is being done in a most helpful way, and as seen by those living in China, who are not engaged in what we call mission work, but who are keen students of conditions, we quote from Thomas F. Millard, editor of the China Press, who has written several of the most authoritative works on present conditions in China. The testimony is of the greater value, as no one will accuse Mr. Millard of being a churchman or in fact a mission enthusiast, although he has always been fair in his interpretation of mission work in China.

"About the religious results of foreign missions in China I am uncertain, as I am uncertain about spiritual forces in America. Statistics of conversions to Christianity manifestly cannot tell the story of foreign religious influence in China any more than church attendance can give the measure of morality in America. It is easier to estimate the work of mission schools and hospitals. The practical results can be seen everywhere. There may be uncertainty about the spiritual effect of Christianity with Chinese, but it is evident that modern education helps Chinese boys and girls to become better citizens, and that to relieve physical suffering and improve the public health and living conditions works out in China much the same as elsewhere. These schools and hospitals send out thousands of young Chinese into the modern professions, or with some degree of Western education, to spread their knowledge among the people. The civilizing force of foreign missions in China is incalculable, and in this work America has taken a leading part. Tremendous human effort and hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended in mission work, in providing facilities and in preparing for its extension. Missions in China have almost driven their original enemies—superstition and ignorance of strangeness—from the field, with great results accomplished, and greater results ahead."

Christian Unity and World Missions

WE live in the world's supreme missionary hour. The great Interchurch World Movement through its wonderful series of surveys has laid the needs of a lost world at the threshold of the Church. And the Church is rallying to meet those needs. This is the hour for which the "Spirit of Missions" has long been yearning and waiting. It is therefore the supreme Christian unity hour of the Church. Missions and unity are inseparable. They stand or fall together. The success of the missionary enterprise depends in the last analysis on a united Church, and the missionary enterprise is slowly and irresistibly bringing about the union of Christians. There can be no doubt that foreign missions is and has been for a long time the most effectual of all the forces at work for the final union of the Church. Nor can there be any doubt that the world missionary enterprise will require, demand and achieve the reunion of Christendom.

Missions make for unity by uncovering the inconsistency of our divisions. Indeed it can almost be said that the original demand in the modern movement for unity came from the mission field. The argument with which Thomas Campbell closed the "Declaration and Address" a century ago is the missionary argument. The incident he related then still illustrates the facts. "The following reply to the Rev. Mr. Cram, missionary from Massachusetts to the Senecas, was made by the principal chiefs and warriors of the six nations in council assembled at Buffalo Creek, State of New York, in the presence of the agent of the United States for Indian affairs, in the summer of 1805: 'I am come, brethren,' said the missionary, 'to enlighten your minds and to instruct you how to worship the Great Spirit agreeably to His will, and to preach to you the gospel of His Son, Jesus Christ. There is but one way to serve God, and if you do not embrace the right way, you cannot be happy hereafter.' To which they reply: 'Brother, we understand that your religion is written in a book. You say that there is but one way to worship and serve the Great Spirit. If there be but one religion, why do you white people differ so much about it? Why not all agree as you can all read the book? Brother, we do not understand these things. We are told your religion was given to your forefathers; we, also, have a religion which was given to our forefathers; it teaches us to be thankful for all the favors we receive; to love one another, and to be united. We never quarrel about religion. We are told you have been preaching to the white people in this place. Those people are our neighbors, we are acquainted with them. We will wait a little to see what effect your preaching has upon them. If we find it does them good, makes them honest, and less disposed to cheat Indians, we will then consider again of what you have said.' "

Mr. Campbell's exhortation is still applicable. "Thus closed the conference. Alas, poor people! How do our divisions and corruptions stand in your way! What a pity that you find us not upon original ground, such as the apostles left the primitive churches! Had we but exhibited to you their unity and charity; their humble, honest and affectionate deportment toward each other and toward all men, you would not have had those evil and shameful things to object to our holy religion, and to prejudice your minds against it. But your conversion, it seems, awaits our reformation; awaits our return to primitive unity and love. To this may the God of mercy speedily restore us, both for your sakes and our own, that His way may be known upon earth, and His saving health among all nations. Let the people praise Thee, O God; let all the people praise Thee. Amen, and amen."

Furthermore, the urgency and difficulty of the missionary enterprise makes for unity by revealing the necessity of union. On this point missionary leaders are of one mind. It is said over and over again, "A divided Church cannot evangelize the world." In the preface of a recent missionary book the author writes, "Amid the solemnities of the closing weeks of the life of our Lord on earth, two desires for His disciples stand pre-eminent, Unity and Missions. Many other duties were left to be developed from His teachings, but these two were among those that were specifically emphasized. But while His immediate followers were characterized by Unity and Missions, their successors soon lost both. It is significant that with this loss came the decline of spiritual power. Now the followers of Christ are turning again to Unity and Missions. Some experience in missionary administration has convinced me that the two subjects are indissolubly connected. In proportion as the Church becomes missionary, it feels the need of unity, for it is futile to expect a divided Church to evangelize the world."

Another great missionary leader has recently said, "A real united Protestantism, filled with the Spirit of God, may undertake anything, but a divided Protestantism with all our communions in separate compartments must stand with hands palsied in the presence of the needs of the world today. . . . The Foreign Missionary Movement itself, looked at in a broad way, has been one of the very mightiest agencies for bringing people together. I myself felt the power of it instantly when I got to India in 1893. The appalling chasm between Christianity and all non-Christian religions is so overwhelming that all the friends of Christ are drawn spontaneously and irresistibly together. One can understand Macaulay when he said that is is impossible to discuss open or close communion or different forms of doctrine with people who are in the habit of worshiping cows.

"There is a mighty unifying influence on all the missionary field that has been drawing all our representatives in every far-flung battle front of the world into a great spiritual unity. They were the first people to conceive the idea of dividing up territory and allowing one denomination to occupy adequately a great section of a nation. They were the first people to conceive the possibility of uniting in great educational institutions. They were many years the first people in the world to dream of the possibility of training the native workers of all denominations in a single institution. The foreign missionary forces of the world have been pioneers in the matter of a spirit of unity and cooperation. It is necessarily so. All the spiritual laws of the world compel it to be so, for away back in His great intercessory prayer, our Lord asked that 'they all may be one that the world may believe,' and it would be a strange thing if those who give their lives to helping the world to believe could be divided in their sympathies one with the other."

FINALLY the vast magnitude of the missionary problem and enterprise makes for unity by giving us a true perspective of our differences. Dr. A. J. Brown's great book, "Unity and Missions," emphasizes this point. "In the white light of the nearer Christ, some of the obstacles to union that now appear to be so formidable may look considerably smaller. Mr. Nolan R. Best reminds us that the world weighs 6,500,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons; but that we would not quarrel with anybody who insisted that this figure was wrong by several millions of tons. We would say: 'A small discrepancy like that amounts to nothing. If we found out, though, that our grocer was weighing fifteen ounces of butter and calling it a pound, there would be trouble over that missing ounce. How much difference it takes to make a difference depends altogether on the size of things we are interested in. The bigger the interest, the less difference even a big difference makes. To be sorely troubled by matters of petty dimensions means simply that men have been weighing religion in scales of petty size. With bigger scales, their worries would be smaller. If a Christian has never thought outside his own peculiar church, then every item of that church's practice and theology will count with him as essentials, every least detail worth fighting for. But if he has looked out far enough to see Christianity encompassing the faith and hope, the contrition and the aspiration of millions of hearts who perhaps never heard of his denomination, the vision takes on a vastness that dwarfs himself and his special kind. Once a Christian gets that broad and far sight, the only things in the religion of Jesus which still look big and consequential are the elements of it comprehensive enough to include those millions.

"Any little wavering segment line can cut one group or another from the rest; but it takes a circumference like the orbit of a star to sweep the whole host into one. And the eye that has traced that mighty circumference has trouble afterwards in seeing the diminutive dividing lines. That arch of the sky, under which big facts so naturally take command over little, men never appreciate till they look aloft. Isaiah in his visions was granted sight of God spanning the sky with His hand, comprehending the dust of the earth in a measure and weighing the mountains in scales. Then the prophet understood that the nations are as a drop in a bucket and are accounted as the small dust of the balance. Even so, if we Christians can but have a little sight of the greatness of God, our theologies, our policies, our distinctions of name and custom would be with us also "accounted as the small dust of the balance."

Counting the Cost

By C. W. PLOPPER

OF the many perplexing problems of administration of the work on the foreign mission fields, probably the one giving the Executive Committee of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society the most concern is that of preparing the annual budget of expenditures after the estimates have been received from each of the mission fields. It is found each year that the Lord has abundantly blessed the efforts of our workers, opening up new opportunities for advance far in excess of the increase of funds made available by the church at home.

Each year the missionaries on the various fields work out estimates of what they feel to be absolutely necessary for the coming year. These estimates are carefully scrutinized by committees, passed upon by the missions as a whole and then forwarded to the office of the Foreign Society for use in preparing the annual budget.

The officers of the Society spend much time in preparation of the budget, of necessity cutting here and there until the amount approximates the receipts of the past year, with a conservative estimate of increase for the new year added. It is almost heartbreaking to the Society to notify a mission that a long desired plan must wait another year. Imagine the discouragement to the missionary. The following paragraph from one of the missionaries will illustrate:

"The mission had definite plans made for the funds asked for under the regular work, and it will be worse than pulling teeth to pare down the work to keep within the sum available. We thought we were planning for the least advance we dared, in the face of the commands of our Leader when we were asking for only $40,000 for 1920, and now to find it is only to be $25,000! A small community in our country would spend more than that on the running expenses of a single school, and any one of a hundred or more hospitals in a city like Boston wants more than that to run a single department of its work. Not to mention the hundreds of thousands being spent in many communities for single school buildings or hospitals or churches, and millions in many cases, and like sums for playground work and many other charities. But on the fields, we have to get along with $25,000 for running expenses for the Lord's work in a field as large as two Nebraskas, and work with a few hundred dollars for running expenses, hospitals that require three thousand, and carry on schools in the open with no, or almost no, equipment, and have to refuse to undertake many lines of activities for which there are crying needs in our communities, in our communities among the heathen which look to the missions for all that is best in our Christian civilization. Many times I know that the large-spirited missionaries feel all bound around by prison walls built of the pennies, so to speak, which the Church in its large magnanimity doles out to support their soldiers in the far-flung battle lines of the Kingdom of Christ. The missionaries 'launch out into the deep to cast their net' and almost ere they are started out they feel themselves pulled back by the invisible lines of limited contributions of the Christian Church. May the day soon come when the Church will hear it as it's command: 'Launch out into the deep and cast your net,' and 'Go into all the world.' I know the men and women on our home boards are doing their best to arouse the Church to a sense of its obligations, and that they feel the hurt as do the missionaries, so as we receive the offerings of the Church, we will say, 'Thank you,' through our tears, and 'We will make it go as far as possible.'"

The original General Fund Budget passed for 1919 amounted to $476,696.15 (This did not include special funds for buildings, etc.) The General Fund expenditures for the year amounted to $529,464. The added amount was due to added emergency appropriations by the committee through the year. The General Fund receipts for the year closing September 30, 1919, aside from amounts raised and expended on the mission fields, were $537,869.13. Adding to this the cash balance in the General Fund October 1, 1919, $43,332.29, gives $581,201.42 as a basis. On adding the estimated amounts from the various fields, and the necessary administrative and education home expenses, the amount totaled approximately $717,000 or $136,000 more than the basic amount. After careful study, cutting down $103,000 here and there, the budget aside from special items, was brought down to $613,976.83, or $32,775.41 more than last year's receipts plus cash balance. After due consideration by the Executive Committee of the Society, the budget was approved with the earnest hope and prayer that the brotherhood will provide not only this amount, but the $103,000 additional, that the amounts asked for by the field committees may be fully provided.

The High Noon of Missionary Opportunity

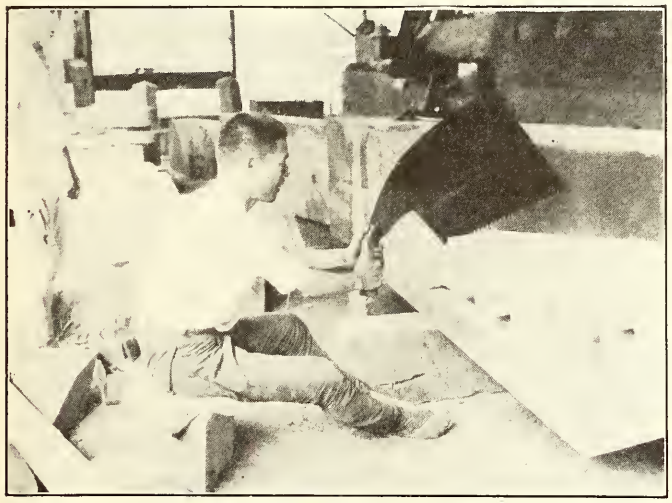
A Symposium

"NOW when old things are passing away is the time for us to make the one supreme gift in which we believe the safety and future hope of the world lie—a knowledge of the life and teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let Christianity go as a beneficent power with new thoughts and new hopes, to be a link between all the races of mankind."

These words by Lord Bryce emphasize the fact that the high noon of missionary opportunity has come. The political changes which the world war has wrought, the crashing of hopes based on false beliefs, and the opening of the springs of human sympathy and benevolence make this of all times the day of supreme opportunity in the foreign fields.

Of the opportunity in Japan Miss Mary Lediard writes as follows:

Some think the high noon of opportunity in Japan has passed, but opportunity big and compelling still awaits the efforts of the Church.



Building a Buddhist Temple in Japan

More than any other non-Christian nation, Japan is in the limelight. Criticism, often harsh, unkind and thoughtless, is being hurled at Japan from all sides. The Korean trouble, her rule in Shantung and the ensuing boycott, her opium trade, her craftiness and dishonesty in business, her terrible social conditions and the immorality rampant on all sides, her superstitions and her lack of any real religious life—these and many others, true and untrue, are heard everywhere. If they are true (I don't say they are), but if they are, where can there be found a greater opportunity since opportunity is where there is the greatest need?

Japan is not yet Christian. Japan's Christians do not equal in number her licensed prostitutes, not to mention the hundreds of thousands of unlicensed ones. Japan has civilization; Japan has electricity, gas, street cars and railways. Japan has education—primary and high schools, colleges and normal schools and universities. Japan has an international standing, being the one non-Christian country under an autocratic military rule to sit at the peace table of the democratic world. But Japan has not Christ. She repudiates Christ with one hand while with the other she expects to greet on an equality the Christian nations of the world.

Now Germany's influence is gone. Democracy is on the march. Japan stands at the parting of the ways. Will she be autocratic or democratic, militaristic or peaceful, Christian or pagan? Now is the time for the forces of Christ in America to awake from their slumber and in all their wonderful power make Japan decide for Christ.

Is Japan "The Rudder of Asia?"

Is Japan "The Key of the Orient?" Is it right to say, "As Japan goes, so goes the Orient?" Or is Japan a menace? Is it right to term her "The Hun of the East?" Whichever be true our duty is imperative. We must give back to Asia, from whence He came, the Christ. Now is indeed the high noon of missionary opportunity in Japan. Send us money, men and women, and the prayers of a united Church.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon presents the opportunity in the Philippine Islands in the following paragraphs:

When the Americans reached the Philippines they found the word "home" had no place in the mind of the people.

In the three thousand islands there was not an operating room equipped for a modern operation. The first operation performed by an American surgeon was known far and wide and he was hailed as the "Americano who could make people die and bring them back to life again."

A black dog running down the street is thought to be the cause of smallpox and the signal for assembling the "saints" —idols—to appease the oncoming evil.

In less than twenty years forty per cent of the rising generation have learned to read and write. Five out of six of the health inspectors of the public schools of the city of Manila are nurses trained by the Nurses' Training Schools of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

Bible Class of College Students in the Philippines

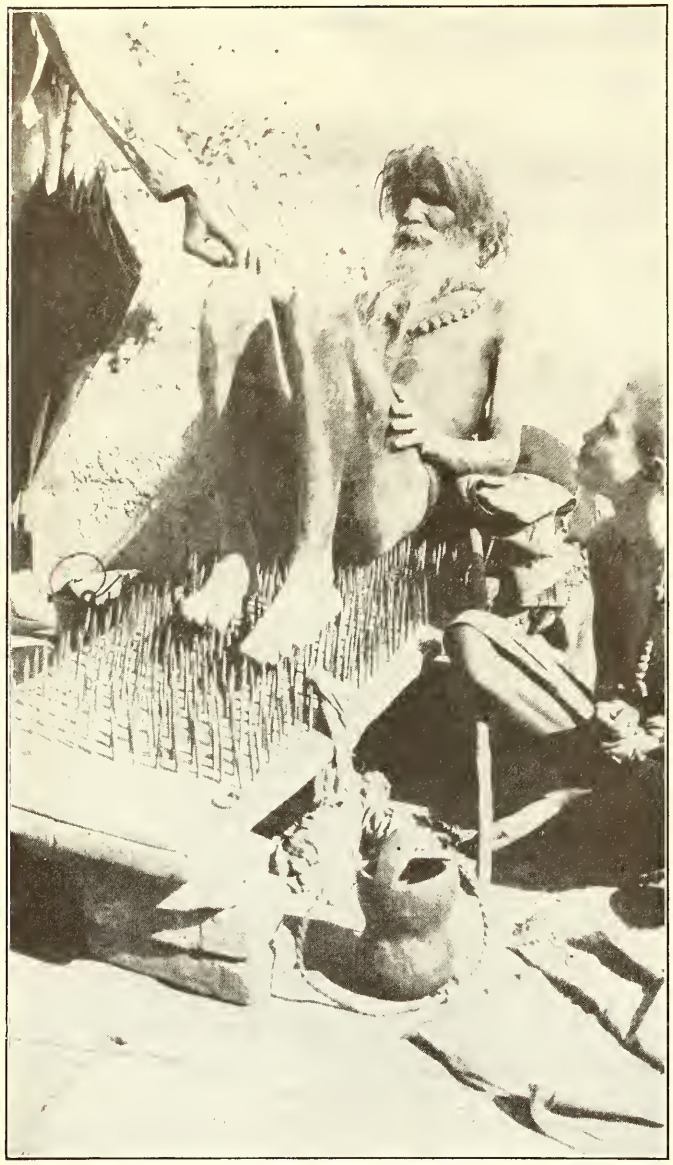
In 1913 Miss Mary Jane Chiles of Independence, Missouri, gave seven thousand dollars to build the Manila hospital. In six years this has gained a property worth more than thirty thousand. Last year the Mission received through this investment over twenty-six thousand dollars, which enabled us to maintain fifty beds and treat twenty-five thousand patients.

During the years of 1917-18 a member of the church at Bonham, Texas, gave three hundred dollars, which enabled the Mission to place Juan Baronia, a graduate of our Bible College, at the disposal of the united missions in war work, resulting in the conversion of one thousand soldiers of the Philippine National Guard. When the armistice was signed these returned to the various Islands to spread the light of the Gospel.



A Hindu Idea of Religion

A dollar given now will do more to stem the rising tide of materialism than ten given later. Who will "throw out the lifeline"?

India's readiness for the Christian message cannot be doubted after reading what E. C. Davis has written:

A missionary panther experience is very rare. The incident as related in January WORLD CALL is terrible. Terrible in the sufferings of Dr. Longdon and in the cost in missionary service. However, in the course of years in India very few missionaries are called upon to chase prowling panthers as sapolio chases dirt, or kick bears out of their dens with one's boot leg as C. E. B. did. Don't let such incidents scare you away from India. In the words of J. N. B. to his fretting daughter, "Forget it." Read further in WORLD CALL and listen to men and women who know and then answer this summons for doctors and nurses and evangelists and teachers in India. Who will take the Bilaspur hospital work when Dr. Crozier comes on furlough this spring? No one, positively no one, is in sight to continue that work. The nurse can't do it for there is no nurse. There has been none since Miss Minnie Johnson was invalided home after trying to do double duty as nurse and doctor in war days. Who will guard the health of the two hundred and fifty girls in the school and orphanage in that station and do the larger work in the Christian and non-Christian communities? Echo answers, "Who"?

Who will take the place of Dr. Longdon in the Pendra sanitarium to stay the hand of "white plague" among their own and the wards of other missions? Please don't ask Miss Andrus to try to do it alone for she is nurse and not doctor. Who are the doctors among our lady physicians here at home who will offer themselves for these two places? Will not others volunteer for other stations in India to reopen dispensaries long closed and obey the call of Christ to heal and teach the people? India is appealing for thirty-six missionaries and the means to support them in the several departments, not for purposes of enlargement, but simply to use more fully the equipment we now have in carrying out the command of our Lord to evangelize the nations.

That Tibet is waiting is evident from Mr. Baker's words below:

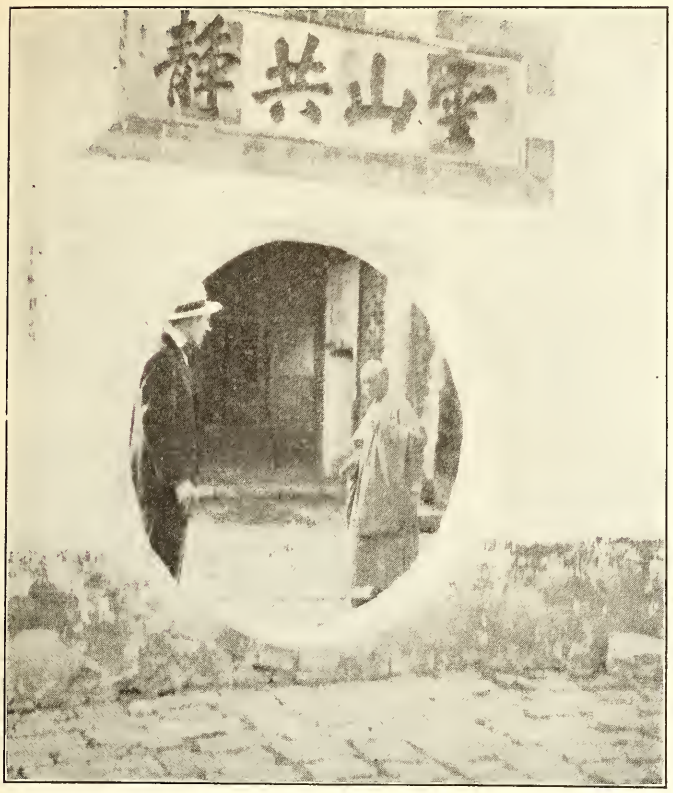
When the sun is pouring forth his greatest heat and light in America at the noontime, the "Land of the Lamas" is shrouded in darkest midnight. It has been thus for ages. In like manner for these many centuries while America has been living in the noontime light of the sun of righteousness and has been blessed and quickened by the Light of the World, this great, mysterious land on the other side of the earth has lain in an utter midnight of moral darkness, corruption and superstition. But this old, sin-cursed earth is turning on its axis. Lands that have lain in darkness are one by one being turned to the light until at last this far-away land of the midnight can already see in the eastern sky harbingers of the dawning of a day that shall bring it life under the noontime rays of the Light of the world.

These signs indicate that the political forces now at work may at any time open the doors of the "closed land" to the outside world. In fact it is not certain but that the missionary could even now establish a work within this great unoccupied land. Men must be prepared and equipped to enter in and turn these people from darkness to the marvelous light in Christ.

Who will question that China will cherish the gospel of Christ after reading the following paragraph by E. P. Gish:

China is today where Japan was fifty years ago. If the materialism that threatens to ruin Japan today is not to crystalize in China, it will be because enough capable. Christian young men and women, to mould her life, take her the gospel.

Beginning our Tibetan Sunday School



China's Door Is Wide Open to America!

Last spring the whole student constituency of China arose in a great burst of patriotic enthusiasm. They would be free men! Their faces are turned away from oppression and darkness toward freedom and light. Never a more pathetic picture, this hoary, decrepit giant among nations rising out of the mire on the backs of her young. Put in juxtaposition our own young, virile, God-favored nation. Think of her trained Christian constituency! Never a "Macedonian" cry like this!

Never were all classes so receptive as now, never so convinced of the integrity and power of the Church. For more than a month before I left Nanking every church was packed every night. In these meetings the most ignorant coolie sat beside the most venerable seer. They both had questions that only the Church was prepared to answer.

"O God, make us like the United States," is the prayer offered by a Chinese official in a little group. It is the prayer of millions in China. Our President's great utterances were like healing balm for the wounds of China. We must make them good! Who but the "Christ in us" is equal to these things?

That Africa is anxious for the message of life is clear from Dr. G. J. P. Barger's statement of the case:

Now is the time of supreme opportunity in Africa.

The trader is advancing faster than the missionary. Has the trader articles of greater value than the ambassador of Christ? The Catholics with State aid are endeavoring to preoccupy the land. The Mohammedans are going down the Sanga and Ubangi and Congo rivers into the district where we are working.

For less than 35 years have the natives of central Africa had missions among them. Shall we not make up to this generation for the long neglect?

The African is in a receptive mood.

Have we forgotten that this generation of natives cannot wait for the next generation of missionaries?

Their aged are waiting for the kindness of Christianity.

Their youth are waiting for the energizing power of Christianity that they may contribute a worthy part to the world's good.

May their innocent children not have to tread the road of superstition, fear, ignorance and uselessness trod by their fathers.

Their babes are waiting the tender ministry of Christian parents and doctors.

The greater part of two millions still waiting in our field.

The greater part of twenty millions in Belgian Congo, waiting, and as many more in each of the surrounding countries of the tropical belt.

It is our God-given ambition to place in every one of our three thousand villages a Christian teacher, a school, and the Bible, in our generation.

The missionaries are coordinating, unifying and organizing their efforts along efficient business lines that they may be the most useful possible instruments in the hands of God in this work.

Shall the Church lag behind business in carrying on its propaganda and work in a big way, with the most efficient methods? Can the next generation of the Church do your duty?

In Africa's tropical belt lies one of the largest superfertile, noncontributing areas of the earth. Its development and contribution to the world's needs awaits the Church. Christian industrial missions is one of the great needs of these times.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society is at work in all these fields. Much has been accomplished in the past, but never were prospects so bright or burdens so heavy as now. Now is the accepted time. Today is the day of salvation.

THE TEN LEPERS

Luke 17:11-19.

"UNCLEAN! Unclean!" This pitiful, hopeless cry of the leper has echoed throughout the ages, awakening in the heart of man at the same time the human feeling of loathing at living death stalking abroad, and the divine thrill of sympathy at human suffering and misery at its greatest extreme.

"Unclean! Unclean!" The harsh, dull cry rang out suddenly on the clear morning air, as Jesus and His disciples approached the outskirts of one of the villages along the borders of Samaria and Galilee, on the last sad journey when He had "steadfastly set His face to go to Jerusalem."

This was not the first time in His ministry that lepers had appealed for help to the Great Physician. Matthew and Mark had already recorded what seemed to be typical cases of healing of leprosy, and these no doubt had become so numerous by this time that they did not deem it necessary to record this miracle. Luke, however, had not mentioned such healing before, and this wonderful restoration of ten lepers at the same time no doubt seemed of the deepest importance and significance to the "beloved physician."

The narrative is true to fact, for these men indeed "stood afar off" from Jesus, not daring to draw near, as such approach meant pollution according to Jewish law.

But this mattered not to Jesus, for scarcely had their piteous cry been uttered, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us," than He called aloud to them, "Go and show yourselves unto the priests."

They knew at once the significance of that command; they understood that it bade them hurry off to claim from the priests the recognition of their cure, and their right to take their places once more amid the ranks of their fellows.

Suddenly, at the sound of the Master's voice, they felt the stream of a new life flowing through their veins and as they went they were cleansed.

Those who have seen the horrible spectacles of the ravages of leprosy by the roadside of some eastern city; our missionaries who labor among them and yearn for healing power to make their bodies whole, can conceive how wonderful was the boon which these ten received at the hands of Jesus.

Those who can only picture their misery can yet join with the others who really know, in thinking that no obstacle should have hindered the expression of a passionate gratitude by these ten to the Great Healer who had given them a gift more precious than life itself.

What selfishness, what Jewish prejudice, what shameful ingratitude prevented this expression? We do not know. Luke tells us that one of the ten, as soon as he felt the healing power, turned back, with a loud voice glorifying God; and he fell at Jesus' feet, giving Him thanks; and he was a Samaritan.

One can imagine the deeper sorrow in the heart of the "man of sorrows" pictured in His face as He said with infinite pathos, "Were not the ten cleansed? but where are the nine? Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?" And He said unto him, 'Arise, and go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole.'"

The "stranger" had his recompense, for he was healed in both soul and body. The others were cleansed outwardly, but still had the leprosy of selfishness in their hearts. "Are we of the nine? Are we accepting the gifts of love and healing from our Great Physician today without pausing to give expression of our thankfulness to Him in lives of consecrated service?

Facts for the Busy Woman

"Some of the primitive Philippine tribes preserve an interesting legend which explains to their satisfaction the formation of the group of islands they occupy. According to their belief the earth was for centuries carried about on the shoulders of a giant. One day, in a fit of anger, the tired giant threw his load into the ocean, where it broke into many bits and formed what is now known as the Philippine Archipelago."

"There is no Filipino nation. Instead there are about 8,000,000 people who belong to the same race and are known collectively as Filipinos. But they do not speak the same language; they are divided into many groups which are bound together by no common traditions, ideals or interests. It had been the work of the American administration to weld these people into one, to give them one language and through that language make them familiar with Anglo-Saxon ideals. Roads have been built, breaking down the barriers which set the hillmen against the plainsmen, or the residents of one valley against the residents of another. Through American sanitation all are being given the heaven-sent blessing of health. Slowly the nation is building."

"It should be the pride and business of every American that this great undertaking be a success and that the Filipino people should finally take their place among the progressive and enlightened people of the world. But the work is only begun. It would be tragic for the Filipino people and humiliating to America to stop before its success is certain."

"Magellan himself probably did not realize the vast extent of the Philippine Archipelago which he had made known to the world, and apparently Americans do not yet appreciate it. Within the area of approximately 800,000 square miles, bounded by the fourth and the twenty-first parallels, and the one hundred and sixteenth and the one hundred and twenty-seventh meridians, there are, according to some Spanish charts, 1,725 islands, though several hundred of these are small and uninhabited."

"Upheaved from the deep waters of the Pacific by stupendous volcanic forces, many of the islands have bold outlines, mountains sometimes rising almost from the water's edge, while almost everywhere hills and valleys and streams diversify the landscape. The soil is fertile and the genial warmth of the north torrid zone and an abundant rainfall clothe the land with exuberant vegetation. Hills and mountains are covered to their summits with forests of teak, ebony, mahogany, camphor and rubber. Tropical vines twine about the mighty trunks. Rare flowers bloom in profusion. On every side 'fronded palms' 'lift their heads in air'. The bamboo waves its feathery tips from every hillside, while the ground beneath is thickly carpeted with grasses of many varieties. The Philippino Archipelago is one of the most beautiful of all tropical lands."

"The trying character of the Philippine climate is not due so much to high temperature or to particularly unhealthy surroundings as to the steadiness and humidity of the heat. The thermometer in the shade seldom rises above ninety-two degrees, but it hardly ever falls below sixty-one degrees, while the annual rainfall ranges from a minimum of eighty-four inches to a maximum of one hundred and fourteen, most of this occurring between June and December. It is a land of perpetual summer, with comparatively little variation from month to month."

"The people are divided into three main classes. The first is the Negrito, whose members are probably the aboriginal inhabitants and who have been driven back by the stronger tribes until they are practically confined to the wild mountain regions of the interior of Luzon, Mindanao, Negros and Panay. They are an ignorant, degraded race, comparatively few in number, leading a wandering life and subsisting chiefly on wild fruits and the results of the chase.

"The second class is the Indonesian, which is found on the large island of Mindanao. The people of this race are the tallest and strongest of all the Filipinos. Nor are they wanting in some virile qualities of character. They are aggressive and for many generations have carried on a predatory warfare with the tribes of neighboring islands.

"The third class, and the one which forms the bulk of the population of the islands, is the Malayan. It occupies nearly all of that portion of the archipelago which is best known to the world, including the great islands of Luzon, Panay, Cebu, Negros, Bohol, Samar, Leyte, and several smaller islands. Whereas the Negritos are quite dark in color and the Indonesians quite light, the Malays are brown of an intermediate shade. In physical development they are also between the two races, being larger than the Negritos but less robust than the Indonesians."

"The Philippine Archipelago is not a region of large cities but of villages and plantations, with here and there a town of ten or fifteen thousand inhabitants. Manila is the only city of considerable size, its population being about 300,000."

"The unwillingness of the Filipino to work is a serious problem in the development of the Islands. He does not lead 'the strenuous life.' Rich soil, perpetual summer and simple wants are not conducive to hard labor. Little toil is necessary in a land where bananas, cocoanuts and hemp grow spontaneously, and where sugar cane, once fairly started, thrives so vigorously that the weeds cannot compete with it. A few hours' labor with a bolo will construct a hut of bamboo, and the leaves of the abundant nipa palm will thatch it. Clothing is an equally simple matter in that soft climate."

"I believe that Christian work among Americans is not only a legitimate but an absolutely necessary phase of our enterprise in the Philippine Islands and that we cannot ignore it without betraying a part of the trust which we have assumed."

"Nor is it in education to produce the requisite change in character. Education is as necessary as government. But there is no power in English, drawing, engineering and physics to make bad boys good. The first use of English by an Asiatic is usually to say 'damn'. It is notorious that all over Asia, missionary work is easier in the interior away from the treaty ports, where the natives have not been contaminated by contact with irreligious foreigners and their 'civilization.'"

"Our free institutions cannot rest on atheism. A republican form of government cannot live in an atmosphere of impurity and dishonesty. A stream cannot rise higher than its source, and in a republic the source is the people. No one sees this more clearly than the Christian men who are in the Philippines. Major Halford of the Army unhesitatingly declares that the Protestant missionaries 'are worth more than brigades and divisions of troops in the habilitation of the Islands.'"

"Calls for money to send out and to maintain missionaries and to equip Christian schools and hospitals should be received and heeded in the spirit of a moral obligation which is involved in our occupation of the Philippines, and which is none the less binding because it is not enforced by law."

"The Hon. John Barret, after a year's residence and study in Manila, said: 'I believe the Philippine Islands offer, perhaps, the most interesting and the most fruitful opportunity for missionary work in any part of the world at present. The people are wedded to old habits and customs of the church; yet, on account of these changes that are coming in, and this new life, they are looking out for what may be better along the line of religion. There is imminent danger that this vast population, dissatisfied with the conditions that existed before, will become agnostic, unless the great evangelical churches of the world will master the situation by using the opportunity offered by this unrest and willingness to change that form of worship which the people have been following.'"

"The Christianity of the Philippines is only a veneered heathenism. It will not be easy in such circumstances to build up a church of truly regenerated souls to make the people realize that a Christian must not gamble or be immoral, or spend Sunday afternoons at cock fights, but that he must seek to know and to follow Christ in his heart and life. Missionaries in other lands understand what a weary task this is. But it must be faithfully persisted in here as elsewhere. Our work in the Philippines is to preach a vital religion, which changes the heart and controls conduct."

A Christian Chinese Christmas Celebration

NO message of the many that have passed through our hands has touched our hearts more deeply than the one that follows, bearing its message of greeting and of Christian love from the Christian Chinese children, to the homeless American children:

"I am sending to the little homeless ones whom you have in your care a Christmas gift which the Chinese children from the San Francisco mission gave at our Christmas party. We wanted the Christmas to be a very blessed one this year and we knew that it would be if it were a time of giving instead of receiving. The children were very happy as they gave for we had told them of the joy their silver dollars would bring to some motherless little one. The forty-three dollars and fifty cents was all given by the kindergarten and first grade children.

"The workers at the Institute send their best wishes to you for a happy, prosperous new year. May God richly bless you and your work is our prayer. Yours in His glad service. DORA D. WING.

Won to Win

By JESSE M. BADER

THESE are days of extending horizons and enlarging visions in the church of our Lord. Christian people everywhere are beginning to take more seriously the carrying out of the Great Commission of the Christ, "Go make disciples". At this particular time the Disciples of Christ are challenged anew with a great sacred task that demands united effort, ready hearts, prayerful spirits and deepened consecration, if we are to win 100,000 to Christ and the Church in the six weeks from February 22 to April 4. This means that each local church should strive for a ten per cent gain in local membership as a minimum goal. The campaign will fail in its purposes and plans unless we stress very often and very strongly that each one won should strive to win at least one. This great goal is not impossible. The Methodists after a loss in membership last year of 55,000 are seeking to win 1,000,000 in six months, from December 1, 1919, to June 1, 1920. Our people are seeking to win at least 100,000 in six weeks. This glorious task should have the right of way. In every church among us everything should be set aside that does not lend itself toward this great end. In our individual life, pleasures, social engagements, and even business, all should give way and become absolutely secondary. We dare not in these days limit or hinder God in the salvation of the lost. Every Christian among us should become a conductor of power, should become a vessel to convey the water of life to others; a channel through which the streams of life flow out into every corner of human society.

As a people we have always stressed evangelism. Our preachers have always sounded the evangelistic note in their presentation of the gospel. This was the secret of our early growth. It was not an uncommon thing for each disciple of our movement to carry the New Testament in his pocket, ready to draw that spiritual weapon in self defense or to show another the plan of salvation.

I think that all of us will confess that even though we have a rich evangelistic heritage back of us yet we are not as faithful in soul winning as we should be. There are scores of elders and deacons among our churches who have never won a single soul to Christ by individual effort. They are not taking the time nor making the necessary personal preparation to do this work committed to each Christian by his Lord. Part of the blame can be placed at the door of the pastor and evangelist who has not put forth the effort to definitely train the laymen how to go about the work of winning a soul for Christ. Men are trained to meet other men one by one to sell life insurance, to sell goods, to solicit members for lodges and to make political converts. These same men if trained for it, if fired with zeal to do it, if filled with a passion for and a sense of obligation to the unsaved, they would go out and convert their fellows with a success hitherto unknown. A new Christian boldness would come into the life of the personal worker, an unbounded joy would spring up and the church would receive a new spiritual power. It does not take any Christianity to turn an ice cream freezer but it does take Christianity to win precious souls to Jesus Christ. Those who are won must win; those told must tell; those saved must save another.

A Task for All

In our New Testament Evangelism we must go back one step farther, and put more stress on the obligations of each member of the church preparing for and doing personal work. In every church as large a group as possible should be in training for this campaign in the art of soul winning. The pastors and evangelists alone can never win this world to Christ but if the whole church would arouse itself to this duty and if each disciple of the Master would tell another and that one should tell another and so on, it would not be long until the last person of this world would hear the story of redeeming love.

Personal evangelism was the method used by our Lord. His first disciples were won to Him one by one as He called them by the sea or from the seat of customs or talked with them by the way. He called Peter and Andrew, James and John from their nets and said, "Follow me and I will make you fishers of men." He preached to the masses, but very much of His noblest teaching was in personal conversation. He talks to the woman at the well, to Zaccheus in his home and to Nicodemus at night. His disciples imitated Him in this method. At the house of Cornelius Peter preaches to a household; Paul and Silas preach to the jailer; Paul preaches to Lydia and to the little group of women with her.

In the early church the same method was used also. Every convert to Christianity became a flaming evangel to tell the "sweetest story every told". History records that during the first 300 years almost the entire known civilized world was taken for Christ. Why? Because each member saved, saved others and each one won, won others. "They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." Acts 8:4. Soul winning is the finest of the fine arts, but today in the average church among us, it is a "lost art". Few Christians take seriously the obligation of soul winning. They depend upon the preacher. Everywhere at this special season let great emphasis be placed on the necessity of each one winning at least one other. Unitedly let each church give itself to the task of not only winning souls but training soul winners. The church evangelical many times means the church on ice, but the church evangelistic means the church on fire. The gospel is contagious and goes from soul to soul and from heart to heart. Wesley's motto was "Tell it to the man next to you." and because his followers were consumed with a mighty passion to win others to Christ, the movement grew most rapidly.

The Place of Prayer

Prayer should have a large place in the whole campaign. Prayer should permeate and dominate so that the entire movement is kept on a high spiritual plane. Spiritual work is done in a spiritual atmosphere. Prayer changes things. Mighty things are wrought by it. Many Sunday school teachers follow the wise plan of making a prayer list of their scholars that are not in the church, and remembering them each one by name in daily prayer.

A new interest should be awakened in the study of the Scriptures during this campaign. Especially should the church be studying the accounts of the conversions as they are recorded in the Book of Acts. Preachers should preach the message of salvation with a new zeal and power. The reading of tracts and books on personal work and evangelism should be greatly encouraged in all our churches. God's remedy for this needy hour is His healing gospel of salvation.

Every Sunday of the campaign should be Decision Day in the Bible school. The most careful preparation should be made for the invitation. There should be an atmosphere of reverence and great earnestness while this service is being conducted. Many churches will form study classes for the junior boys and girls especially, during the regular Bible school class period, when definite instruction will be given on how to become a Christian. It is the writer's experience that few parents object to their sons and daughters becoming Christians if they feel the boys and girls are taking the step intelligently. The pastor or some consecrated leader in every church should see that this instruction is given most carefully. While seventy-five per cent of our conversions come from the Bible school, yet it is a deplorable fact that a large per cent of the Bible school are never converted.

One of the powerful spiritual forces growing out of this entire campaign will be a group of Christian men and women trained in personal work, who will mean much to the church in the future. No work so vitalizes and spiritualizes a congregation as that of personal evangelism. We have four gospels in the New Testament which we designate "The gospel according to Matthew, according to Mark, according to Luke, and according to John." But the personal question for each one is "what is the gospel according to me".

These are significant and encouraging days for evangelism. Many denominations and communions linked together for cooperation in the Interchurch World Movement are all planning similar campaigns such as ours at this time culminating Easter Sunday. This encourages and stimulates us all to know that many others are planning for great ingatherings at the Easter season. We predict that the Easter season of this year will see the greatest ingathering in membership for the churches of Protestantism in all the history of the church.

A Compelling Need

The need is terrific and compelling. One-half and more of our America has never acknowledged the authority of Christ and knows nothing of the gospel saving and keeping power. Many will not be reached at all, if the church fails to respond to the challenge of this hour.

Let us take then our message to a needy, sinful world; those who have received are under orders to go and give that that is more precious than silver or gold. Men wait. "Say not ye there are four months and then cometh the harvest? Behold I say unto you, lift up your eyes and look on the fields that are white already unto harvest." The call is for reapers. Are there any who dare not respond? One human soul is worth more to God than all the planets cast into a single jewel.

"We must win them one by one
As the Master did of old,
When He said to His disciples,
Follow Me.
Stooping down from heights of ease,
Seeking only God to please,
Pointing ever to the Christ
Of Calvary."

A Call from the Pan-Handle—A Typical Case

IN this article I am giving a sample of the letters and appeals which are continually coming to our Board of Church Extension.

P. R. Huckleberry is the pastor at Clarendon, Texas, and the substance of his appeal is given to remind the Disciples of Christ of the waste and peril in delay. The congregation at Clarendon has been much in meditation and prayer over the problem of a new building. The congregation is forced to have more room. Their present building is one of those ancient, ill-arranged, no-class-room buildings, utterly inadequate. The main auditorium is only 30x36 with an annex 10x18 for choir and pulpit, with a baptistery in the center of this annex. This inadequate building has an ideal location just one block from the business section of Clarendon but not on a business street. The church is out of debt and has the fine reputation of paying all bills promptly. Their resident membership is one hundred.

About eight years ago, the church at Clarendon faced a similar condition with a growing Bible school, additions to the church by primary obedience and crowded for room. The neighborhood saw that this church had a wonderful opportunity and a campaign was inaugurated for a new building, but for certain reasons the campaign failed. Result, the church became sadly disorganized. The Bible school diminished to a handfull and nothing good was accomplished.

In 1918 Mr. Huckleberry came to Clarendon to preach two Sundays out of each month while he was working as a salesman. The conditions were discouraging and heart-breaking, but by the faithfulness of the pastor and the congregation, the average attendance of the Sunday school was increased from twenty-three to one hundred and ten. There have been fifty-nine additions to the church, and since November last the church is paying for full-time preaching, paying $150 per month and furnishing their minister with a modern parsonage. Good fellowship prevails, the preaching has been in love and simplicity and additions are had almost every Sunday. The members are wealthy but are the finest kind of church workers.

On January 1, 1920, the church comes up to the same situation that it had eight years ago. God has given them new faith and opportunity. Shall we help them to use it? They are proposing to build a modern church which will be a real workshop. This is their moment. The hour was struck. With an overcrowded Sunday school on January 25, a friend of the church, who was present, offered $500 for a new church building which would be a religious educational plant for Clarendon. Several members immediately promised $500 each for the new church building. Some thought the old building could be remodeled, but the wisdom of Christ prevailed, and it was decided not to put a new patch on an old garment. Therefore, a new church building is to be erected if the Board of Church Extension will furnish $2,500. They are building for the present and for the future.

The Junior College of the Methodist church is in Clarendon. The Methodist church has one thousand members but at present they are not willing to lend any cooperation. The young people are continuously coming to the Christian church and the brethren propose to make it very attractive for them to continue to come, that they may be instructed in the way of the Lord.

The Pan-handle district has been sadly neglected by the Disciples of Christ in fields which had great opportunities and promise. The preacher writes:

"My heart's desire and prayer to God is that Clarendon and vicinity may have an opportunity to hear the pure gospel of our Lord and in order to this end we must have an adequate house in which to worship and teach the multitudes. May the wisdom of the Holy Spirit attend the deliberations of your Board and distribution of the funds in your care. We have tried to make our appeal in an unselfish way and do not want to rob Peter to pay Paul. Awaiting with much hope the decision of your Board, I am faithfully and obediently, yours in Christ's name,

"P. R. HUCKLEBERRY."

This appeal should be blazoned in WORLD CALL because it shows in such a fine way the appeal from a real American church in a growing little city of America, where the people have a mind to do Christ's work.

A Red-Letter Day

April 4 will be a red-letter day in the calendar of our Bible schools, and in the National Benevolent Association, and in the lives of the 550 or more persons in the homes of the National Benevolent Association. It will be Easter Sunday, the day on which the Bible schools celebrate the triumph of our Lord over death by bringing life in larger measure to those who suffer. It is the day when the happy, home-protected children make their free-will offerings for the care, protection and support of the children who are homeless. It is the one day in all the year on which the young and old of the church unite in providing the bread-and-butter fund necessary for the support of the children and old people in our homes. It is a red-letter day, therefore, in the lives of the members of our great family because on that day they are assured of comfort and support for the year. The Bible schools have for 28 years observed Easter as Orphans' Day. The National Benevolent Association will this year, as it has always done, furnish a program for use by the Bible schools, and will furnish literature and collection envelopes. Order supplies early, make ample preparation that the offering may be generous as the need is great.

Church Extension and the Rocky Mountain District

IT is a wonderful story here in Colorado to hear about what Church Extension has done for the cause. Of our more than fifty church buildings, forty of them have been built with the help of the Church Extension Board. But in the organization of the Rocky Mountain district, and in the work that has been carried on here in the last four years, the contribution of the Church Extension has been an indispensable factor. In four states in four years we have had the privilege of building six churches, and in each of these cases the loan made by the Church Extension has been the deciding element, and it is the simple truth to say that the work of building would have been impossible if the Church Extension Board had not been ready with the loan. And the nicest thing about it all is the promptness, and the efficiency with which the board always comes through with all their obligations. I have found them always ready to listen to a real appeal, and ready to extend the credit that was needed for that particular field, to meet a particular building problem. At Ogden, Utah, in 1916 we asked for $4,000, and though just at the moment the loan seemed a bit large, the board said that if this amount is necessary to insure the building, then go ahead. We did go ahead, and as a result the property that was made possible was at dedication day easily worth $11,000, and the cause in the second city of Utah was made secure. At Limon in Colorado, at Carpenter and at Burns in Wyoming, and at Las Vegas in New Mexico, it was always the same. None of these new buildings would have been at all possible without the financial security given by the Church Extension loan.

The last of the churches to triumph, and a mission of the Colorado Board that has had a full share of the ups and the downs that come to a new community, the church at Montrose, is nearing completion, and is able to say that its fine new $16,000 building was only made possible by the splendid loan that put the building program on its feet. The Tabernacle you see in the picture was built in one day—in 1910. In it these people have prospered, they have prayed much and waited long, and when the time came for the supreme test of all the years that they had struggled, the Church Extension heard their call, extended them a credit that has made possible the new building which they will be ready to dedicate in March.

Church Extension has a real business basis. It has a real business management. And is now entering upon a time when it will have a real business experience. Today we have more need of Church Extension than at any other moment in the story of our brotherhood. We must build educational institutions in which the church must work. We must build community centers, adequate to become the base center of the religious life of a modern community.

Church Extension is ready and able to help our brotherhood do this. The west faces a vast building program. It cannot do all that is needed alone. In the Rocky Mountain District our mission churches must have the help of the Church Extension loans.

Sunday School Secretary of Great Britain

THIS will introduce J. Flisher of Manchester, England. Brother Flisher is secretary of the General Sunday School Committee of the Churches of Christ in Great Britain. We have one hundred sixty-seven schools in Great Britain enrolling 17,393 scholars, and 1,921 teachers. There were three hundred forty-one scholars reported last year at the Annual Meeting held in Glasgow, who had united with the Church.

When I was in London last summer I had a very pleasant conference with Mr. Flisher and also with T. H. Fraser of London, who is chairman of the General Sunday School Committee.

Mr. Flisher has given many years of faithful service to the Sunday school work for people in Great Britain and is held in highest esteem by all the brethren.

That New Building—Don't Wait Any Longer—Build Now

BRETHREN, I want to talk to you about that new building! As you know, many of you have been laying plans for a new building for a long time. You have been waiting for prices of materials and labor to come down. Possibly you were justified in postponing building operations while we were at war, but the war is now over, and has been for sixteen months. Don't be like our deadlocked and do-nothing Senate. It has put our nation to shame before the world by its inaction. Do not put the cause of Christ to shame in your community because of your inaction. Our delay in ratifying the treaty and entering into cooperative relationship with our allies has delayed the world reconstruction processes and meant death to millions of innocent ones.

The Church's delay in these after-the-war days will mean spiritual death to many people and communities. To continue to wait, merely for prices to come down, is a mistake. Some of you have waited so long already that you have sinned away the day of opportunity in your community. While you have waited, the brethren of other communions, especially the Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists have pushed their great forward movements to completion and are now building, in many communities, modern churches, and are thus meeting the new demands of this new day.

Prices are high, but money is cheap! There never was a time when money was so easily secured as now. The past year has been the best in the history of the Board of Church Extension for the return of loans. Many long-standing loans, loans that were in bad condition, if you know what that means, have been paid in full in recent months. There is a perfect orgy of spending today! It seems that everybody, both rich and poor alike, have acquired the habit. The November report of the Federal Reserve Board says, "Never has there been so much spending, so much demand for expensive articles, and such disregard of prices. This condition applies in both small and large cities alike."

Two of the members of the Board of Church Extension, with many years' experience as builders in Kansas City, feel that building and construction work of all kinds should proceed, and to delay building, merely on account of high prices, is a calamitous mistake. The old saying, "While the getting is good, get a plenty", still has wisdom in it. Brethren get your money now and begin that new building. If you need help, remember the Board of Church Extension is still doing business at the same old stand, 603 New England Building, Kansas City, Missouri.

Radicalism Not the Cure for Unrest

Statistician Says Religion Is the Vital Force Needed—Address by Babson—Motive Power Which Sent Out Pilgrim Fathers Is Necessary

"WHAT is the need of the hour? What is the 'something' which seems to be lacking today? As a cold-blooded statistician, I believe that 'something' is religion. We have the resources, the intelligence, labor and capital, but we lack the motive power which drove the Pilgrim fathers to these shores three hundred years ago and which has been the inspiration of all forward movements of the centuries. We are like a wonderful watch with a fine case and perfect wheels, but without the spring."

Roger W. Babson, widely known statistician, was very serious in his recent address to the Rotary club at their luncheon in the Hotel Sinton. His subject was "America's Undeveloped Resources" and he discussed in connection with these things his views on the present unrest in the world. "We are actually drowning in undeveloped natural resources and opportunities," he said. "The great masses of our people are only from three to five per cent efficient. Better conditions will not be brought about by any revolutionary system such as socialism, I. W. W.-ism or any form of radical legislation. Conditions will be bettered only as you and I help more individuals with whom we come in contact; the members of our family; the people who work with us and for us and the neighbors who live on our street. We must substitute faith for fear and service for covetousness.

"We make the labor problem by not understanding it. Let us give as much thought to developing the latent power in labor as we have given to developing steam and electricity. Then there will be no labor problem and the cost of living will be only a fraction of what it is today."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

The Gospel of Mark in Picture and Symbol by a Chinese Woman

The above was made by one of the women in the Wuhu, China, church. Following straight through Mark's gospel, chapter by chapter as numbered in the drawing, and using the key given below, it will be found a remarkably clear interpretation of the incidents related.

Star = Miracle. Dagger = Opposition. Cross = Christ's suffering. Entrance = Christ enters a home. Oblong building = A synagogue.

Note chapter four: The star symbol denoting the miracle of the calming of the sea; the picture of the boat in which Jesus sat as He told the parables to His disciples; the parables of the sower, the mustard seed, the lamp and the bushel.

"Cast Thy Bread Upon the Waters"

By ESTHER MacLEOD

SUNDAY, August 10, was a great day for the Tibetan Christian Mission, for our friends and supporters at home, and especially for some of the people at Batang. On that day thirty-one people were baptized here. Two of these you know—Doris and Dorothy Shelton. Besides these, there were five full-blooded Tibetans, seventeen Chinese and seven of mixed Tibetan and Chinese parentage. I want to tell you about the events of the whole day, as they came to us, and see if, with the account, I can pass on some of the happiness which all felt on that day.

I wish you might have been with us in the church that morning. We had one service instead of our usual Sunday school and church. After the opening exercises the very young children were dismissed, to make room for the older ones who could better understand what was to follow.

Mr. Ogden and the native evangelist, Lee Gway Gwan, both spoke, and explained to all present the meaning and importance of the stand those about to be baptized were taking, and the meaning of the baptismal ceremony. They spoke with great feeling, for both had worked and prayed years for the results of that day.

After this came the confessions of the candidates. In addition to the formal confessions, most of them gave their own individual testimony, and it was certainly delightful to listen to these Most of the people present were not Christians. They were well acquainted with the people who stood before them and told them of their religions experiences, and all seemed greatly impressed. Each one spoke straight from his heart, in his own words, and in the simple, natural way these people have of putting things.

One Chinese of the number had formerly made his living by fortune telling, a thing in which most of the people of Batang put great faith. He confessed that he had known this was false when he practiced it, but that he had done it merely to make money. Then he took his fortune-telling book and tore it to pieces before the crowd, saying, "You are foolish if you believe this, for I don't believe in it myself." We hope this demonstration may have shaken the faith of many in such things.

The men who were to be baptized were seated on one side of the platform and the women were on the other. The men testified first, and then the women.

Here I want to say a word about these young women. There were nine of them with Doris and Dorothy, most of them about the age of our high school girls at home. Tibetan girls have much the same sweetness and charm about them that is common to girls of this age at home. Almost all summer these nine girls have met once a week with Mrs. Ogden and the evangelist, studying the Bible, finding out what it means to be a Christian and learning to pray. They are not one bit long-faced or "sanctimonious" about their religion, but speak of it more naturally and freely by far than western girls can do. I speak of the Shelton girls with the others, because, besides being real American girls with American culture and refinement, they are real Tibetan girls, so far as all the good qualities of Tibetan girls are concerned.

At the church that day Doris Shelton stood before her many friends. All of them, from the youngest child up, love her and Dorothy, and are much more interested in them than they are in the grownup missionaries. The missionary children have a way of getting next to the hearts of the Tibetans, which older folks can't learn altogether. The children don't learn it. With them it is natural. Speaking in their own language, which she speaks as they do, Doris gave her testimony for Christ.

A sixteen-year-old girl who has lived with the Ogdens almost from babyhood, spoke sweetly and earnestly. One other Tibetan girl I want to mention. Her name is Della. Her father is dead and her mother is our Bible woman. Della has been under the influence of foreigners and in the Mission school most of her life. She has been living in our home since Christmas. Her father and mother were among the first to be baptized here, and so it was touching, especially to those who had known her father, to hear her testify. She said: "I love Jesus and am glad that I can be baptized. I want to have my sins washed away and go to heaven when I die."

The New Day in Tibet. Lee Gway Gwan Baptizes Thirty-one

Tibetan and Chinese Men and Boys of the Batang Church

Among this crowd of girls was the evangelist's young wife. She has been thinking about "coming to Jesus" for a long time, but for folks here, the way is not made so easy as at home. Instead of encouragement from friends and relatives, they receive ridicule and threats. This young woman's parents were especially bitter against the foreign religion. However, she believes in Jesus, and so she came in spite of opposition. She told Mrs. Ogden that her courage wasn't very big yet, but she thought it would grow all the time. I think, myself, that she showed great courage in this first step. Lee Gway Gwan, her husband, had said to her that he loved her so much that he wanted to be with her in the next world. "How would it be," he said, "after we die, if you were in one place and I in another." He said it would be the happiest day of his life when she became a Christian, and it must have been, for he surely was happy. His face was beaming with joy. He said the next day that he was tired, but it was a "blessed tiredness."

When the girls were through with their testimonies they sang together "Jesus Loves Me." The people here all love that song.

At the close of this service we went to the big pond back of Dr. Shelton's house. There we stood on the banks, a large crowd—not many believers, but all were respectful and interested, as they witnessed a sight many had never seen before.

Lee Gway Gwan did the baptizing, Mr. MacLeod assisting. On the shore we all sang, "Oh! Happy Day" as one by one the happy ones stepped down the Tibetan ladder into the water. The song never had such meaning for me before.

There were two old men baptized. It was a miracle indeed for these who had passed their lives under the lama's power, to have their heart changed when they were old. One old man said he was very sad because he had nothing but a wasted, worn-out body to bring to the Lord, while others were young with long lives before them. One man was blind, and it seemed that if there was one who was happier than all the others, it was he. Others were well and strong. This crowd was a demonstration of the fact that Jesus is able to save men and women of all ages and conditions.

Lee Gway Gwan with Doris and Dorothy Shelton, Whom He Baptized Along with the Group Mentioned in this Narrative

The spectatore were a large and interesting group—Americans, Tibetans and Chinese—completely surrounding the pond. Among the Americans let me mention Dr. and Mrs. Shelton, who were probably the most interested persons there. Their two daughters were being baptized, and by whom? By the man whom they had befriended years ago, before Dorothy was born. Dr. Shelton took Lee Gway Gwan from the streets into his home, when he was almost a beggar. He has grown to be a very excellent preacher to his own people, a great power for Christ here in Batang. He was one of the first converts whom Dr. Shelton baptized, and now, in return, he is baptizing Doris and Dorothy. No wonder the doctor is touched.

Among the spectators were some travelers from Lhassa with their fine robes and aristocratic airs. They happened in just at the right time to see this sight, which must set them to thinking about this new religion.

The day of our baptizing was also a big day with the native priests, for on that day they were to bring out their idol and all the people must hasten to the place and worship or else they will be in trouble with the priests. We hoped this would not happen during the baptizing lest our crowd might suddenly leave us. However, when we were about half way through the gong sounded; but to our surprise and joy not a person moved, and we heard that there were more with us than with the others. This respectful attention, even to the point of neglecting their own religion and incurring the wrath of the priests is a sign that a new day is dawning in Batang. "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light. They that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined."

At the baptizing we thought of the Bakers and wished they might have been there to witness the fruits of their own labors. Although they are away from Batang still they are having their part in the work. Some time ago the evangelist had a letter from Mr. Baker in which he said he was praying for the church every day. Lee Gway Gwan was much moved by this, and he said: "Now the Spirit will surely come with power."

The Christians had a meeting after the baptizing, in Dr. Shelton's house. It was a delightful meeting, every one happy, and every one speaking informally, as he pleased, of the events of the day, and the new joy of being a Christian.

I wish I might tell you all the things that the evangelist said to the new Christians, but I shall only mention a few. He told them that they were soldiers of Christ now; that tomorrow and the next day, Satan would be after them, trying to tempt them to fall, and that they must be prepared for him. He told them how their former friends would become their enemies; how some would invite them to do wrong things just once, and what would be the result of complying. He told them to pray for themselves, for one another and for their enemies, and to pray hardest for the very ones who were persecuting them most. This man is such a shepherd to his flock. He will be watching and guiding and helping them all the way.

It is thrilling to see the Tibetans beginning to come to Jesus. Heretofore they have been unresponsive, but they will make fine Christians. One of our Chinese Christians said of them, "They are slow to become Christians, but they will make much better Christians than we Chinese, when they do come, because they will come with all their hearts, and they will stick to it better."

One of the results of the day is that many others are becoming interested—people who have never given Christianity a thought before. A great many have joined our inquirers' class, among these some of the most influential men of the town, who witnessed the baptizing. These will likely be baptized later.

One Tibetan boy was much interested in what he saw and heard on that day. He wants to learn more about the religion, and he says he is going to be baptized as soon as they will let him, and that he will preach Christianity all over Tibet.

"I Was a Stranger and Ye Took Me In"

SHE came to the door of the community center and asked for work. I could not help but look at her and wonder who would give her work. She wore a skirt of gray mixed cloth that had a large rent in the front almost the length of it; and a black tight fitting jacket that was covered with lint and filth; and a dirty scarf on her head and a dirtier white one around her neck. Her face was dirty and her unkempt hair was hanging down in her face.

Who would want to give her work? Yet, there was a spark of something worth while left; she has asked for work not charity. She went on to explain that she did scrubbing, but it was a rainy day and they did not want any scrubbing done where she scrubbed. One knew where she was accustomed to scrub—in the saloons.

I asked her in. We did not have any work for her, but there was plenty of work in the city if she could only present a better appearance. The problem was to make her aware of it. I thought that probably the thing most apparent to her would be the long tear in her skirt. I told her that we had a needle, thread and thimble, and would she like to use them to sew up her skirt. "I would," she replied. When she took the thread, she said, "I will make it double this time, because I sewed it up this morning with a single thread and it did not hold."

She sewed very industriously and made it firm. Then I asked if she would not like to wash, and gave her a towel and soap. She washed, then getting the spirit she removed her scarf and fixed her hair. I got the brush and started to brush her jacket. It was too much for her. Her expression softened, and she said, "You know you can't keep your coat nice when you have to throw it on the floor or anywhere while you work."

Now that her appearance was more presentable I said that I would send a note by her to the woman in charge of the Federal Employment Bureau whom I knew personally, and we would get some work for her. I asked her to come to our Mothers' Club meeting. With the mention of the word "mother" there seemed to be an awakening. She was a mother, but had almost forgotten—then she told me about her daughter. I gave her a note to the Employment Bureau, and she left. It was just for us to sow the seed.

The reason we have the name Disciples' Community House over the door is that we want it to be a vicarious home for all those in the neighborhood, or for anyone passing our way; and find satisfaction for their needs, but above all, that sympathetic understanding and help that makes life worth while. Some adults, failures in life or broken wrecks of humanity, coming into the Community House and finding the children so happily employed, learning something useful to help them better in the struggle of life have said, "Oh, if we had only had a chance, if only we had been taught such when we were young, life would be different now."

The boys and girls do come who try our patience, and cause us to wonder if it is worth while, but if we go far enough we can win the confidence and change the attitude. Rodrigo annoyed all of us so. When he came to Daily Vacation Bible School in the summer he never wore a waist, but just a little undervest. His face, arms, back and neck were tanned almost black from the sun. With his boundless energy he was always waving his hands, and made one think more of a monkey than anything else.

I wanted to call in the home. I knew the mother worked, so I asked Rodrigo if it would be all right to call Sunday afternoons. Immediately he became suspicious and wanted to know why I wanted to come. I told him that I wanted to know and see his mother; and asked him if he did not want me to know his mother. He did; he seemed to think his mother was all right but was afraid that I was going to tell her of his conduct. Finally I thought he was convinced of my good intentions and quite enthusiastically gave his consent for the visit. I went on the Sunday afternoon at the appointed hour and no one was home. Just before Christmas I called at the home quite unexpectedly and found them all there. The father was tubercular and feeling miserable, the mother had a bad cold. After exchanging greetings and expressing my sympathy and words of heartfelt interest in their welfare I won their confidence. Then they asked if I would not like to see their Christmas tree. Rodrigo was especially proud of it because he had helped trim it. As we passed through the bedrooms into the front room, I saw that everything was immaculately clean and neat. I admired the tree. There seemed to be a warmth of feeling as we stood around the tree and noted the trimmings and their significance and above all what it stood for. I left feeling that we would be fast friends. The next time Rodrigo came to the Community House, despite the fact that he was a real boy all the way through, he came and put his arms around me, for he had an affectionate nature. Now he is very near me in story hour and every place and likes to put his hand on my shoulder or in some way express his affection.

We are all one big family and forget that we are Americans, Italians, Greeks, Hungarians and all the rest. A Greek mother came to me and was so distressed. She was old and gray—her only son, the pride of his father's heart, was sick and anemic and had a weak heart. The doctor had said that he must be quiet and not have too sudden changes of temperature. He had been coming to the manual training, story hour, swimming and Sunday school. She wanted him to come every afternoon and learn something useful and something about God. She was willing to pay anything, money meant nothing where the life and welfare of her boy was concerned. She would pay anything, a dollar a week, if he could only come. We talked it over and of our plan to open a reading and game room every afternoon for the boys on the street that come to the doors every afternoon and wanted to come in. As she left she looked up and with heartfelt feeling she said, "I am praying to you, just like I would to God, to help me."

I am praying to you just like I would to God. Are we going to fail to answer that prayer? The Disciples must answer it with a Community House down in New York's East Side, with facilities for recreational, educational and vocational work, and a Chapel with a worshipful atmosphere where these immigrants from the lands of Cathedrals can come and find God and the Christ.

The Minister's Wife

By F. E. Smith

WE make a plea for the minister's wife. How great is the number of woman souls who share completely their husband's prayers and service. How very important is their place. Her power is behind the throne, usually not seen, frequently not realized or appreciated. There is here a type of humble devotion and high service that often is not recognized for its full worth to the Kingdom.

She looks after the physical welfare of the Messenger of God. She gives advice and counsel he can well afford to heed and is a valuable part in his greatest success. It is her poise that keeps the church on an even keel many times when a storm breaks. Every recognition that gives him credit and praise should see to it that her name is linked with his.

There are not a few cases where our churches receive the service of two people of equal worth for the salary of one. It does not seem fair that the wife should count in the service and production of church values without in her own name participating in the financial recognition.

During the war when so many of our leaders were in overseas service a number of our churches were left in the care of the wives, who rendered unusual service. These women forgot themselves in their new-found service, upholding the good name of the men away and adding to the glory of their ministry by their faithful watch over the flock.

All honor to all the women of this class who served so nobly. One of these was Mrs. Alice L. Cole, Huntington, Indiana. Of Iowa birth and training, a leader all through her school life, receiving the A. B. of her Alma Mater at the youngest age of all the alumnae. She married Elmer Ward Cole in 1900. For twelve years they have led the Huntington church in its splendid achievements.

He was in service seven months, during which time she, having been ordained to the ministry, conducted twenty-nine funerals and twenty-seven weddings and made eight hundred pastoral calls. She preached every Sunday morning and four Sunday evenings. She had general command of the work and retained her position as C. W. B. M. District Secretary. With all this she kept her own home, with the two children, a daughter of fourteen and a son of eight. During her leadership the attendance on all services was sustained, the interest was even greater, because the men in a very definite way, got back of the work. In recognition of her devotion and worth, the salary was substantially increased.

Mrs. Walter M. White

Another case was that of Mrs. Walter M. White of Memphis, Tennessee. She has always been the chief counsel for one of our most successful ministers. She is also the youthful mother of five daughters who reflect their mother's grace and usefulness in the church.

During the ten months' service of her husband, she looked after all the needs of the work. She has the remarkable record of not missing a single committee, or other kind of meeting during the time she had charge. She did not undertake the pulpit ministrations, which were supplied by Dr. Austin Finley to the profit of the church.

She carries into the church at all times a wonderfully fine missionary spirit. She is regularly seen in our conventions and is chairman of the Disciples' Lake Geneva Summer Conference group. The church gave her credit for the fine spirit that was maintained in all departments of the work and this was publicly expressed by the officers of the church. She visited the sick, made all arrangements for funerals and weddings, prepared copy and edited the weekly church paper. It was not so much by the things she herself actually did, but what she inspired others to do that she presented to her husband on his return a better church than he left.

Another interesting case is that of Mrs. Pearl Schell Harmon, Lincoln, Nebraska. Her husband, Harvey H. Harmon, was in the service in France twelve months, nine months of that time right at the front as Divisional Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. and Assistant Chaplain of the famous Second Division. During this time her gracious personality directed much of the life and activities of the church. Lawrence Dry, assistant pastor, continued his work as leader of the church in a very successful way. Mrs. Harmon, because of her long acquaintance and intimate knowledge of the work, was most valuable in the church during those stressful days. She gave constant attention to the sick and the details of the work that fell to her as the minister's wife. No occasion, small or large, was complete without her presence and previous preparations necessary for its success. Her good cheer went beyond the lines of the church in her enthusiastic service. She was especially valuable in Red Cross work and the other community war activities.

Of her work her husband says, and in it speaks for all others of her class, "No one will ever be able to give just the credit that is due to the women who sent their companions to the front and stayed by the stuff through those most trying days. Such confidence and trust was enough to make a fellow go through anything. Notwithstanding that I was on the battle line, her letters were always strengthening and full of faith and confidence in my return."

Her optimistic personality is a tower of strength to the cause. This she maintained above the anxious thought for her husband, which every wife likewise shared, and the care of the four children. Her hospitality is known to every representative of our organized work. Who can forget Lincoln, the church and the Harmon home, having once received the gracious courtesy and hospitality that live in the heart of this preacher's wife? She herself comes of preaching stock in Pennsylvania. R. A. Schell of Topeka, Kansas, is her brother, and Charles E. Cobbey of Omaha, Nebraska, her nephew.

All honor and praise to all these noble women with all of their class who help maintain the work of the church in the regular program and during the emergency calls.

Christian Woman's Board of Missions

Easter Week of Prayer

CONSECRATION and service, mingled with joy and thanksgiving, should mark the Christian's Easter observance. For women the season is most significant. Only because of the Christ and His victory has woman found her emancipation.

All Woman's Missionary Societies and Young Woman's Missionary Circles everywhere should unite to make one glorious victory in the spirit and service of the Easter time.

The plans suggested for observance of this week are in keeping with the great Interchurch World Movement campaign. The four outstanding points being emphasized by the Interchurch World Movement are Spiritual Resources, Stewardship, Consecration of Life for Christian Service and Evangelism.

The women of the local missionary society should plan for prayer services for two afternoons during the week preceding Easter, preferably on Tuesday and Friday, using programs outlined if possible.

Other afternoons of that week should be spent in calling on the unchurched women of the local community. The local church will doubtless be holding evangelistic meetings at this time, and the women will be able to assist materially in winning people for Christ and the church, in cooperating with their pastor in this calling campaign. In churches where there is no pastor the Executive Committee of the Woman's Missionary Society should select a list of names of people who should be visited and brought into the work of the church. Such names should be given to women who are vitally interested in building up the church and who should go out two by two in His name. If all who make such calls would meet together for a brief season of prayer before going it would strengthen and prepare them for effective service. Prayer should permeate and dominate the whole campaign.

Easter Sunday should be the greatest day in the history of our Christian Churches. Boys and girls, young men and women, older men and women should take a definite stand for Christ. This is a time when people should be earnestly urged to come into the church and to become stewards. Stewardship implies ownership. God is the owner, man is the steward.

At the service on Friday afternoon, Thank Offering boxes and envelopes should be opened. Gifts of love and thanksgiving should be made "according as the Lord hath prospered you."

Special attention is called to Mrs. Caroline Atwater Mason's story, which has been running as a serial in WORLD CALL. Is now published in book form, "Conscripts of Conscience."

This timely book is a story plea for world missions, and is full of heart interest and appeal, especially for those making decisions as to life work.

As a plea in story form for volunteers for Medical Mission Work, a review of this book will be a happy addition to the monthly program of the Missionary Society or Circle.

The Interchurch World Movement

The tremendous importance of the Interchurch World Movement is becoming increasingly manifest. That we as a people undertake our proportionate share of the great program of the Protestant Church for the evangelization and uplift of the world is imperative. The Church of Christ, which is scattered among the churches is sweeping on. Widened horizons, deepened realizations of stewardship, together with increased spiritual life and power should be brought to every congregation of disciples in America.

At the Atlantic City Conference, held in January, it was decided to inaugurate the intensive field campaign for the first year of the Interchurch World Movement with a nation-wide series of Preachers' Conferences beginning in February; Laymen's Conferences in March; County Conventions in every county in America in March; special Evangelistic Campaigns in all great centers in March; Metropolitan Conferences in March, and Community Conferences and Mass Meetings in April, with the great financial campaign to be pressed in April and May.

The four lines to be constantly stressed and promoted in all Interchurch activities are Spiritual Resources, Life Enlistment, Stewardship, and Missionary Education. Doubtless the sweeping and intensive plans to be carried out will bring an immeasurable lift to Christian consciousness and conscience throughout the whole Church.

The Executive Committee of the United Christian Missionary Society has taken action for the fullest possible cooperation in the Interchurch World Movement. Since we have preached Christian Union from the beginning of the Restoration Movement we now have unique opportunity for united effort with all Christian people to press forward the message of the Living and Sufficient Christ to the dying nations of the world. In the Interchurch World Movement the Restoration Movement has nothing to lose of the things for which we have prayed and striven. We are asked to give up nothing of the great plea of the Church of Christ, but to intensify our efforts to bring the gospel to every living man. We enter with zeal into this great Movement for united prayer, united appeal for people to accept Christ, united call for consecration of life for Christian service, and united effort to bring all Christians into a realization of their stewardship under God and to secure adequate funds to advance the work of the kingdom throughout the earth.

Cooperation in Interchurch activities on the part of missionary organizations now auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions will be promoted under the direction of its International Executive Committee through state and provincial, district, county and local organizations.

That fullest cooperation may be given in the Interchurch Movement, that the organized womanhood of our churches may assist pastors and leaders in carrying forward plans as adopted in the local church, and that the aims and plans for regular Christian Woman's Board of Missions activities may be correlated with the Interchurch Campaign, a general conference of field workers was held at St. Louis in January. At this conference plans were formulated and aims enlarged to make the woman's activities commensurate with the scope of the Interchurch Movement. All members of Missionary Societies, and all others in every official capacity are asked to join in this unparalleled movement with a new consecration to the work of Christ, and to undergird every effort with prayer.

It should be noted that the first year's work in the Interchurch World Movement will complete the Five-Year Campaign of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

According to plans as adopted during the months of February, March and April, systematic effort will be made to bring information and inspiration to every local society and church in the brotherhood, also to enlist the interest and sympathetic assistance of all members of all local Missionary Societies. Cooperation along the following lines is asked:

1. A key woman to be responsible for looking after interests of the Interchurch World Movement in the local society will be appointed. Let such appointment be considered as a draft for imperative service in the Christian army. Such local representatives will receive the Interchurch Bulletin and other important communications, and will bring all necessary matters to the attention of the local Executive Committee and officers of the society.
2. All societies should plan for the reading of Interchurch World Movement literature on the part of their entire membership. The Literature Secretary of the local society should be responsible for securing such literature and seeing that it is circulated. (Literature provided from Headquarters.)
3. All communications from district, state, or regional, and international officers should receive most careful consideration. They should be read to the society when so requested.
4. Every society should see to it that the requested representation is provided for the county conference of the Interchurch World Movement. Every society and every church should be represented.
5. Plans for observance of Easter Week of Prayer are found in this issue of WORLD CALL. Most congregations will be engaged in the winning of unchurched people at the Easter season. Women of Missionary Societies will have unique opportunity for service in this great evangelistic movement. Prayer and work for the salvation of others are the dominant notes of Easter Week. Every society is asked to assist the whole movement through the most effective possible observance of Easter Week of Prayer.

FINANCIAL AIM AND PLANS

Recommended:

1. That the financial aim for funds from local missionary societies, auxiliary to the United Christian Missionary Society, be $1,000,000 for 1920-21, beginning July 1, 1920, ending June 30, 1921.
2. That the $1,000,000 aim be apportioned among states and provinces.
   (a) That state and provincial development funds, plus all other funds sent to the treasury of the United Christian Missionary Society be counted on this aim.
   (b) That all individual gifts be credited through the local auxiliary society when donors so desire.
   (c) That a campaign be pressed for charter Life Memberships in the United Christian Missionary Society at $1,000, which may be paid in five annual installments; for Sustaining Memberships at $100 a year, and for Annual Memberships at $25. That the larger gifts of $25,000 for Stewards, $10,000 for Fellows in Perpetuity, and $5,000 for Life Patrons also be sought.
3. That state and provincial executive committees release such officers as may be requested by the International Executive Committee to give full time for the next three months in promotion of Interchurch World Movement activities within the state or provinces, and that they make arrangements for other workers to carry the responsibilities of Extension Campaigns and other regular development work as may be necessary.
4. That in addition to the services of designated officers, the International Executive Committee provide additional workers in states and provinces as the interests of the campaign may demand.

Boy's and Girl's Department

This year Easter Sunday is to be the culmination of the great soul-saving campaign in which the churches of all communions will be engaged through the efforts of the Interchurch World Movement. In every possible way we desire to cooperate in this. No doubt in most of the churches the pastor will have special plans and a regular Easter program will not be desired. For this reason we are not in an especial way recommending such a program.

It is the plan to prepare an Easter program for the regular meeting on Easter Sunday, April 4. This will appear in the usual program department in the April number. On this day the boys and girls will bring their special Easter offering. It may be made a day full of meaning for the children. It is sincerely hoped that Easter Sunday will be a great decision day for our boys and girls, that many hundreds of them will give themselves to Christ.

For the churches that wish to put on a special program we can furnish a beautiful one prepared by Jessie Brown Pounds, called "In Old Jerusalem". This program calls for eight adults who do the reciting, a Junior choir and a group of small children. The general theme is, "What Think Ye of Christ?" The program is to be concluded with a talk by the pastor on that subject.

Temperance—A World Task

INSTEAD of lessening their activities the Temperance agencies of the United States are speeding up their forces. It is a mistake for many temperance advocates to feel that as national prohibition is now an accomplished fact there is nothing more to do. Strange as it may seem, exactly the reverse is true. The liquor men, defeated in the field of legislation, are continuing their efforts looking to the overthrow of the law by direct appeal to the voters of the country.

Two new organizations have been formed, one the "Organization Opposed to National Prohibition", and the other the "Organization Opposed to the Eighteenth Amendment." They will make a direct appeal to the voters not to support any candidate who is not opposed to national prohibition. It is their hope to return to Congress a group of men who will move in the direction of nullification. Not only this but there are millions of foreign people in this country who do not understand the reason for prohibition, and, while they have had their liquor taken away from them, must be dealt with as a part of the general problem of Americanization.

The backwash of the liquor business is still with us and the work of reform along the lines of respect for law, Sunday observance, gambling, social evil, and the Bible in the public schools must be promoted as a part of the general policy of toning up the nation. In addition to these we must turn our attention to temperance in other lands as a part of our general international program.

America is leading as a nation of ideals among the nations of the earth. It was this spirit of idealism and unselfish devotion to the principles of world welfare that enabled us to make the contribution that we did to the prosecution of the war. Moreover, America's missionary arm reaches around the globe. So it is in keeping with this world interest that we are to promote world temperance. Missionaries tell us that the liquor interests have obstructed and made very much more difficult their work in other countries. It is not only good business for our nation to promote international temperance, but it certainly is good business to protect our missionary activities by removing the chief obstacle to the missionary cause in many lands.

Here and there some overenthusiastic friend of temperance feels that the work is all done and that temperance agencies should close up their offices and go out of business. A mere glance at our own national, as well as the world situation, ought to convince one that this is the time for churches and all others interested in missions to do greater work than ever before. Temperance Progress in Belgium

CARDINAL DESIRE MERCIER of Belgium, whose recent visit to our country was a national event, is a bitter foe of the liquor business. In the midst of the life and death struggle which his people were making during the war, Cardinal Mercier, in season and out of season, waged relentless warfare against the great enemy at home, Alcoholism. Here is a paragraph from one of his numerous addresses on the subject:

"You who hold the Christian faith look around you at those who suffer from the effects of alcoholism. Can we be insensible to the spectacle of this misery and pass by on the other side? No, indeed!

"I am discharging my duty as a Catholic, as a priest, as a Bishop, in coming to cooperate with you in the struggle against alcoholism."

In this connection it is interesting to note that some temperance progress is being made in Belgium. Recently her Parliament has passed a law prohibiting the sale of spirits in public houses, and even prohibiting the owner from keeping liquors for his own personal consumption. For the time being the sale of beer and wine will be permitted. The bill was strongly supported by the Liberals, and especially by the representatives of the working classes. One delegate described the Belgian people as having been "gangrened by alcohol". There is one public house in Belgium for every thirty-four inhabitants. The measure had been recommended by the Special Committee on Temperance, composed of scientific experts and headed by M. Vandervelde, who was Premier of Belgium at the time of the German invasion.

Our Orphan Family, Aguascalientes, Mexcio

MISS ELMA C. IRELAN, Aguascalientes, Mexico: "It is wonderful to be at home at last, though much is lacking in our arrangements yet. God has been good to us, and we are here with pastor and teachers. Counting our girls we now have about seventy-five enrolled in kindergarten and day school, and about thirty in night classes—English. We still have the prospect of receiving more pupils. Our classes opened the 7th of January. Did Mr. Cornelius tell you of the young man who was baptized on New Year's Day, and of his fine prospects? Maria Diaz, a cousin of Professor Juan Diaz, is one of our teachers here. She had become a Christian in Mr. Diaz's home. She has brought her mother and sisters from Zacatecas to live with her. The three sisters have made the good confession since coming. We have taken one little girl into the orphanage. She is about eight years old, and a bright child. She was an orphan in care of an aunt, who was also caring for the child's brother. All three were being taken to Torreon by a Christian family for which the aunt had worked. Strange to say Mrs. Cornelius, whose death occurred at San Antonio some months ago, had met this Christian family in Kansas City. The mother and boys had been baptized by Mr. Small of Hyde Park church. They knew Mr. Estill and Mrs. Latshaw. They seemed to be trusting God for ability to care for the poor family of which I have spoken, but they were very anxious to leave the little girl in school. We saw the child's need and took her into our home. Vicenta is a little taller than Marta. They make a very happy little pair. Already another case has presented itself—little sisters of eight and ten or nine and eleven. They have no parents and live with their grandmother, who is distressingly poor. Her own daughter she has to send to school sometimes without breakfast and dinner. Sometimes they have just parched corn to eat. These little granddaughters were not in school until the grandmother's sister sent for her to bring the children here. We are letting them come to day school until we can hear from you. Their great aunt will see that they are cared for until then. Her work is such that she cannot keep them all the time. They are cute-looking, big-eyed little folks. These children are from Zacatecas."

All who have visited Central Mexico will understand that appeals like these will come frequently. Shall we miss such opportunities to do good and to train future workers? It will cost $100 per year simply to provide food for these orphan children. Clothing will have to come in excess of this amount. To give them mother love and care will cost the best there is in our splendid missionaries. They willingly give of their very lives. Shall one not stand ready to supply material support? This home for orphan children is the only one in Mexico under Protestant care.

Mary and Martha

WE are familiar with the story of Mary and Martha who ministered to the Christ when He dwelt among men. The following is the story of a Mary and Martha, twin sisters, to whom He recently ministered through His church.

A good man, but poor, died last winter of influenza. He left a widow and a family of children without support. The mother in necessity took employment in a shoe factory at nine dollars per week. By close application and rigid economy she was able to keep her family of little ones together. However, as she toiled for the children God had given her she was consumed with anxiety over the one that was yet to come. She knew full well that she could not leave a young baby at home while she went back to the shoe factory to earn the support for herself and her little family. She reasoned that it would be better to turn the new-born babe over to the care and affection of some good childless woman, and to do it before she became attached to it, than to undertake the impossible, and perhaps lose them all by having her home broken up and all of her children scattered.

In her necessity she entered into a conspiracy with a childless neighbor woman to place the new-born babe upon her doorstep. The neighbor woman's husband had refused to let her take a child to raise. She reasoned, however, that if she found a homeless, helpless babe at her door she would overcome his objections. And so the plan was made. The babe came, not one but two, and both girls. They were deposited, according to agreement, upon the neighbor's step; but providence intervened.

The day before, the neighbor's wife being taken suddenly ill, had been taken to a hospital. The neighbor himself found the babies. He at once called the police and they took charge of them. It was the province of the court to determine what should be done with these little mites of humanity adrift in the world. Instead of sending them to some Roman Catholic institution as is so often done, they were sent to one of the homes of the National Benevolent Association. Here they remained for a few weeks. They were strong and healthy and so responded rapidly to the affectionate care they received. They became interesting, attractive. They were nameless, so the good Christian woman to whose care they were committed named them Mary and Martha, for she said "The Master is ministering to them as the sisters of old ministered to Him." They are today basking and growing into a promising childhood and womanhood in the affection of a Christian home of their own.

Progress Among the Churches

WHEN the size of the War Budget was determined and the amount of the Liberty Loan was decided upon, the United States Government had no precedents to follow and no standards to guide it. The officials charged with the duty of determining the amount of money needed did not inquire as to how much Americans had given or loaned on previous occasions that they might base their requests on past records. They first determined the probable cost of our participation in the war, announced the amount necessary to meet the bill and boldly asked the people for the money, though the amount well nigh staggered the imagination of the wildest dreamer.

The time has come for churches to make their missionary budgets in the same way, basing them upon needs and opportunities. Too long have we been bound by past records. Too often have unworthy standards been set before churches because their last year's offerings were small.

Many churches are shaking off the shackles of an unworthy past, and are honestly seeking to have a worthy part in meeting the expenses of "evangelizing the world in this generation." The H Street Church, Washington, D. C., has increased its offerings to foreign missions one hundred per cent this year. The Clearfield, Iowa, congregation, conscious that their old record was not sufficient to justify pride, raised their March Offering three hundred per cent over last year's gifts.

Imperial, California, a small congregation of thirty-six active members, studied the needs of the fields, pondered God's blessings to them, measured their ability and decided that they were able to support the work of a missionary in Africa. They have become a Joint Living Link in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Such a standard in some of our larger churches would make them responsible for whole stations in heathen lands.

The church at Tullahoma, Tennessee, has its efficient pastor, W. R. Holder, who spent a term of service in Africa and returned because of ill health. The first fifty people canvassed for missions pledged $2,150, and there were one hundred more members to be visited. The first payment from their budget has already been made to the Foreign Society. It amounted to $63.30, a gain of four hundred per cent over their offering of last year and more is to follow.

The church at Harrison, Ohio, which is now without a preacher, has elders and deacons who function. Unsatisfied with old standards, they faced the world's need and increased their offering for foreign missions five hundred per cent.

W. C. Timmons of Glenwood, Iowa, challenged the church of that city to assume its just portion of responsibility for world evangelization. So, forgetting that which was behind, they made an offering which was a 1025 per cent gain over their best previous record.

Space would fail us to speak at length of New Union, Kentucky, a church of fifty members, whose budget for self is $1,000, and whose offerings for others amounts to $2,500; of Wabash, Indiana, whose offering of $200 this year is almost three times last year's report; of Loveland, Colorado; Christopher, Illinois; Washburn, Iowa, and a worthy host of others who have heard the call and seen the light and are determined to give in the future as "God hath prospered them" and as the world hath need, rather than as their report in last year's Year Book might suggest.

According to the need, we gave to make democracy secure. But the root conception of democracy is thoroughly religious; its foundation lies in the fact of the Fatherhood of God and its corollary that all men are His children. We cannot now make the whole world safe for democracy for more than half of it is ignorant of the fundamental fact of democracy. One half the world is yet impossible for democracy and will continue to be until the churches of Christ measure their offerings by the need.

Life Work Recruits at La Porte, Indiana

A Life Enlistment Service

THERE was recently held a very interesting church service at La Porte, Indiana. A. L. Stamper is the minister. Life enlistment was part of the closing day of a two weeks' successful evangelistic effort. The preacher had spoken of it and prayed about it much. He was successful in creating a favorable atmosphere for the surrender of life. No personal appeal for decision had been made. Each came up to the great hour free of mind and soul before the plain, simple call that was made.

Some thirty young people responded, more boys than girls, when the call for definite Christian service was made in the last moments of the morning hour of worship. The janitor's boy led the way. A half dozen boys came before the girls started. The preacher's son, Allen, who has a brother in Transylvania, was in the group, to the joy of his father. In the group he stands at the opposite end from his father. One boy was followed by his father, a business man, who has been seeking opportunity to give his life in some special form of service. One girl of Bohemian family, with unusual talent, out of her faith, laid down her life as an offering to her Master. She had been compelled to quit high school to help make the way for her two small brothers and her mother. The church has put her back in school and by help given the home means to see her through. The minister says that they mean to guarantee the education of all in the group making sure that they go on in complete fulfillment of the covenant made. At the close a prayer of dedication was made by the visitor.

It was a great service. It went home to the heart of the church with a strange new sense of responsibility. One young man, a member of the school, but not a Christian, was so impressed with the service that he came at the close and wanted to be counted in. He was asked if he knew what it meant, to which he not only replied "Yes", but took his place before the camera to make a record of his decision. No great challenge for service had ever before been placed squarely before him. To such he responded with his life in the promise to serve. The act of these young people will start new currents of spiritual life in the church.

With some of the younger, it was a declaration of intention; with the older it was a serious decision; for all present it was an experience to be remembered for a lifetime.

Supplemental to what the minister did, superintendent King had the plan of appointing young people of the school to take assignment as missionaries to various lands and write back letters which were read before the school. This touched the imagination of the young. Many of the letters were thrilling in interest; they were all surprisingly true to the land and work of which they wrote.

When our preachers prepare and have such services and the churches stand back of the young people for their education, there will be a great increase in the number of servants of the King. There is nothing spectacular here. Just a great heart leading his young folk to life consecration. What sharp contrast to a well known church of which it was recently said that in fifty years not a single preacher or missionary has been sent out from its membership.

In the program of the Interchurch World Movement, Life Enlistment Day comes on February 29. Every church should have plans already under way to make this a very significant day in its history. The Interchurch surveys show that one hundred thousand new workers will be needed in the next five years. We must furnish our share and will, if in every church there is given the life call as it was in this service at La Porte.

The Pension System proposes to reinforce the life of all our ministers so as to relieve the anxiety and care that hinder them from their best work. Every preacher must be free to work with abandon. The assurance for himself and family as he faces the future is a great asset to him and the church. The Board of Ministerial Relief takes joy in the ministry of providing for all our leaders the reserves they need, and calls upon the churches to provide full assurance for every one of our workers. F. E. SMITH, Secretary.

Statistics of All Religious Faiths

"THE Year Book of the Churches" for 1920, the official volume issued annually by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, contains the usual annual statistics for all the leading denominations as furnished by their officials. In the case of some of the smaller bodies it was necessary to take the United States Census figures for 1916.

For 1919, in spite of disturbed social conditions due to reconstruction, the various religious bodies of the country report a total growth in membership of 2,861,182 over the census of 1916. There is also an increase of 3,519 ministers and of 6,347 church organizations. The total number of churches now stands at 233,834. There are 195,315 ministers, priests and rabbis with 44,788,036 members of these various organizations. The total Roman Catholic membership is reported as 17,549,324, which includes baptized members, both children and adults, while the Protestant figures are simply for the communicant members. The report of the Jews who hold membership in various synagogues is only 260,000. This is accounted for by the fact that membership in Jewish congregations is, in most cases, restricted to heads of families and these only are reported in the table. The two Mormon bodies report a membership of 494,388. The Greek Orthodox Church reports 119,871, while the Russian Orthodox Church has a membership of 99,681. Another Oriental body, the Syrian Orthodox Church, has 50,000 members in this country. The total Protestant church membership reported is 25,980,456.

The membership of the bodies making up the Federal Council has increased 816,922 over that of 1918. This is in part due to the admission of the Christian Reformed Church and the Churches of God in North America (General Eldership), but represents also a very considerable gain by many denominations reported last year. The total membership of the Federal Council bodies is given as 19,504,102 this year as compared with 18,687,180 reported a year ago.

The new figures show an increase of 5,013

in the number of Sunday schools reported, but a loss in the number of persons under formal religious instruction amounting to 596,534, the present number of Sunday school pupils being 21,291,987.

The expenditures of the churches have fallen off during the year $2,522,048, the total for 1919 being $326,287,951. Church leaders account for this chiefly through the decrease in local church building enterprises due to disturbed conditions and high prices. While no figures have been reported to show the increase for missions and other general benevolences, it is known that on account of the enormous sums raised by Methodists, Presbyterians and other bodies during the past year, these figures have far outstripped those of any previous year.

The membership of the larger Protestant bodies is as follows: Methodist Episcopal, North, 4,175,502; Southern Baptist Convention, 2,887,428; Methodist Episcopal, South, 2,152,974; Presbyterian in the U. S. A., 1,603,033; Northern Baptist Convention, 1,502,341; Disciples of Christ, 1,193,423; Protestant Episcopal, 1,065,825; Congregational Churches, 808,122; the newly-formed United Lutheran Church in America, 782,807 (the membership of the twenty Lutheran bodies in the United States totals 2,451,997); the four leading colored denominations, National Baptist Convention, African Methodist Episcopal, African Methodist Episcopal Zion and Colored Methodist Episcopal total 4,191,257.

For the Interchurch World Movement

TO ENCOURAGE every church to put WORLD CALL in every home at once, and thus get full information about the Interchurch World Movement, the subscription price will be kept down to one dollar a year until July 1. Then it will have to go to a dollar and a half.

The Magazine Committee feels that it is only fair to our present subscribers whose subscription expires before October 1, 1920, that they be allowed to renew at the old rate. No subscription, new or renewal, can be taken for more than one year at the dollar rate.

Ginling College

IT is gratifying to know that our Mission in China steadily grows in appreciation of Ginling College. We are glad to quote the following from a recent letter of Mr. Frank Garrett: "The Mission more and more recognizes the value of the work which Ginling College is doing, and the value it will be to our Mission to have a few of our best school girls take the full college course offered there. This will give us a type of leadership which will command respect in the most influential circles and will give us trained counsellors for the direction of the development of the work, as it relates to women and girls."

Our readers noted in the last issue of WORLD CALL that two of our Luchowfu graduates of last year are in Ginling College this year. Miss Minnie Vautrin, who has served a term in China under the Foreign Society, and has recently returned after furlough, is our representative on the faculty of Ginling College. She is acting as president of that institution during Mrs. Thurston's furlough.

We hear constantly that Ginling is full this year, and that the faculty has had to turn young women away. We have not our new equipment yet. It is hoped that in a few years we may be able to take care of all who come. One of the missionaries has written that there are about thirty freshmen in the college this year, and they have not a class room that will seat that many. She further says: "I have heard all my life about mission schools being crowded and having to turn away students, but when it's yourself that does the turning away, it makes a deeper impression. You go over and over a list of candidates, and you say perhaps this girl is a little weaker than the others in English and you'll turn her down, and you do. Then ten days later along come four or five letters from people who have heard that you turned the girl down. One is her teacher and she says she doesn't mind having another girl turned down but————is different. She is a perfectly splendid girl and such an earnest student that she is sure to make good. The second letter is from a dear friend of the college begging us to reconsider————. She knows the family and they are very conservative. It is only after months of pleading that they have given their consent, and it is now or never they say. The third letter is from one of our Alumnae and she knows ————. She also knows better than any one else what preparation is needed for college. She corroborates the before-mentioned letters and begs us to reconsider————. The fourth letter is from————herself and she tells us of her hopes and ambitions, of her eagerness to come, and how her father and mother have at last given their consent. She'll work as no student has ever worked, but she must come. That is one example and there are various others. Every girl that is recommended is 'a jewel', 'the best we have', 'has a wonderful personality,' 'the first Christian in her family and represents an entirely untouched field', 'wants to come and examine Christianity', 'we are sending our best teacher. I don't know what we'll do without her'.

"But if they come, they must be taught. We wonder how many boats can bring how many teachers to us."

From such information as this it is evident that we who have undertaken responsibility for this new and growing college among China's millions of women must be faithful to our undertaking. Ginling must meet the need for which she was brought into existence.

Complete Cooperation in the Interchurch World Movement

A SERIES of representative meetings, January 20 to 23, gave earnest consideration to the needs, both of men and of money, revealed by the surveys of the Interchurch World Movement of North America, to the budgets necessary to meet these needs in all fields and departments and to the means by which workers and funds are to be secured.

First came joint and separate conferences of the Executive Committees of the United Christian Missionary and the Board of Education. Many other members of the latter and representatives of the International Convention and of the Temperance Board and Christian Unity Association also took part in this joint conference.

The following budgets were unanimously agreed upon as the smallest sums with which the responsibilities of the Disciples of Christ can be met. Indeed these figures are less than the least, concession being made to what some called common sense and others unbelief.

Following the conferences three days were spent by those who had attended them and by state, district and national secretaries and field workers, men and women, in earnest consideration of everything involved in the Interchurch World Movement. The net results of prayer and deliberation were embodied in the reports of the Joint Committee on Promotion and the Committee on Findings. As revised and unanimously approved the former report follows in full and such parts of the latter as are not embodied in that and are of general interest.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON PROMOTION OF THE INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT FOR THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

The four members of the Committee, two, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater and J. H. Mohorter, chosen by the United Christian Missionary Society, and two, H. O. Pritchard and J. C. Todd, by the Board of Education, feeling that an outstanding pastor on the Committee would add materially to its strength, chose George A. Campbell of the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, as the fifth member.

Mr. Campbell was elected chairman, Mr. Mohorter secretary, and Mr. Todd treasurer.

1. The Committee voted to recommend that members of this conference declare that it is their purpose to the extent of their ability to promote the Interchurch World Movement campaign throughout our brotherhood, and to promote it as a united campaign in which the United Christian Missionary Society and the Board of Education are equally interested and for which they are equally responsible.

2. The Committee voted that it shall be the policy of this Committee to relate and utilize all available existing organizations now in use by our brotherhood.

3. The Committee voted that while it hopes to effect an organization that in the end will reach and serve permanently every church in our brotherhood, it recognizes the necessity of forming a temporary organization for immediate action, and that it will seek to enlist the services of our outstanding laymen and to secure the release of pastors and of organization officers for this temporary service.

4. The Committee voted that it will be its policy to utilize to the fullest extent the assistance of the organization, machinery, literature and such other aid as the Interchurch World Movement may be able and willing to render.

5. The Committee recommends that all organization, state and national, recognize that all of our educational and missionary agencies are passing through a process of expansion and reorganization, and that they adjust their work and their programs to the Living, the Minister Gave His Life to the Church; Dying, He Left His Family to the Church Through the Board of Ministerial Relief.

Interchurch World Movement as rapidly as courses of action are revealed.

6. The Committee voted to select a place of business as headquarters for its campaign at as early a date as possible and at such a place as the convenience of the workers and the needs of the work may seem to require.

7. The Committee voted to recommend that the expense of the campaign be borne by the organizations participating, advancement of money to be made on the basis of budget askings, and final settlement to be made on the basis of receipts.

8. The Committee voted to recommend that in this campaign a single form of pledge be used with provision for designations, and that all undesignated funds shall be divided equally between the United Christian Missionary Society and the Board of Education.

9. The Committee recommends that in securing pledges we respect the principle of designation and that there shall be no leveling up.

10. The Committee recommends that in the drive to be put on April 21 to May 2, it be for funds in addition to the budget of $3,000,000 already provided for in the present budget and in existing subscriptions, and that adjustments of future budgets and campaigns and the date for opening and closing the fiscal year be referred to the International Convention.

11. The Committee voted to enlarge the Committee on Literature appointed by the United Christian Missionary Society so as to enable it to serve the interest of education as well as missions, and to continue that committee as the Committee on Literature for the Interchurch World Movement campaign.

12. The Committee voted to recommend that in this Interchurch World Movement campaign emphasis be placed upon the action taken by the International Convention recently held at Cincinnati recommending the following increase in minister's salaries: 25 per cent to those receiving salaries of $1,500 and under; 20 per cent to those receiving salaries from $1,500 to $2,000; 20 per cent to those receiving salaries from $2,000 to $3,000; 15 per cent to those receiving salaries above $3,000.

13. The Committee voted to recommend that David Teachout of Cleveland, Ohio, be secured as Executive Secretary of our Interchurch World Movement promotion campaign.

14. In view of the fact that details of organization have not been fully worked out either on the part of the Interchurch World Movement or on the part of our own promotional department, we recommend to all our field workers that they stand ready to respond to every call for assistance that may come directly from the Interchurch World Movement or from our own promotional department, and that they lend every possible assistance. To be more specific, we recommend:

(a) That the secretaries of State Missionary Societies take the responsibility for securing the attendance of all our preachers at the state conferences for preachers to be held February 16 to March 12 in every state and that they serve as the conveners of our own Disciple group, and that they handle the literature for the group.

(b) That all our field workers lend assistance, as they may be called upon to do so, in securing attendance at laymen's and women's meetings to be held in March.

(c) That they cooperate with national, state and local representatives of the Interchurch World Movement and with our own promotional department in securing a maximum attendance of our people at county and metropolitan conferences to be held in March and April.

(d) We recommend the fullest and heartiest cooperation with the Interchurch World Movement headquarters, our own promotional department, also with the local representatives of the Interchurch World Movement and with representatives of other communions in securing the largest possible attendance at community conferences and mass meetings and in all community efforts.

(e) That all our field workers encourage and assist to the extent of their ability the ministers of our churches in the most effective organization of the individual church for the accomplishment of all the objects of the Interchurch World Movement.

Parts of Report of Committee on Findings.

1. That money secured for education through the Interchurch Movement be handled in accordance with principles adopted at our last International Convention with respect to the educational budget; and that all money for the United Christian Missionary Society budget be sent to the treasurer of said Society with the understanding that certain agreed budgets be returned to the states for state work.

2. We recommend to the Promotional Committee that it organize a sub-committee, who shall seek to correlate all present financial campaigns with the Interchurch campaign.

3. We recommend to all State Secretaries that hearty cooperation be given to the Men and Millions Movement in the collection of outstanding pledges. The Committee feels we will be much better prepared to enter a new campaign if we first conserve fully the fruits of our first campaign.

4. We recommend that the Promotional Committee prepare a budget to cover expenses in the projected campaign of the Disciples to be conducted in connection with the forthcoming Interchurch World campaign April 21 to May 2, and present same to the Board of Education and the Executive Committee of the United Christian Missionary Society for their approval.

5. It is the profound conviction of this Committee that we have great reason for rejoicing in the increasing spirit of unity and harmony which grows from year to year as we pray, confer and labor together in our common task.

6. In view of the mighty efforts now being put forth to husband the spiritual resources of the church, we heartily endorse the "Each One Win One" campaign being directed by Jesse M. Bader and pledge our untiring efforts to promote the plans suggested. It seems providential and very significant that we are a united brotherhood in this the heart of our work for the Master and we rejoice in the same ideals which prevail throughout Protestantism in this regard.

7. We recommend that the churches cooperate fully in the preparation for and observance of Stewardship Sunday, February 22, using in the most effective way the stewardship literature and the enrollment cards and having one or more sermons on Stewardship.

8. We approve the Life Enlistment campaign which will bring into play every form of our organized work and local churches in securing the large number of missionaries needed for the home and foreign fields and in securing recruits for the ministry, especially emphasizing the Life Commitment Day, February 29.

9. We recommend that the items of stewardship, evangelism, and life recruits be given all necessary consideration and action by the Promotional Committee.

The New Jacksonville Home

IN the purchase of the new home for old people at Jacksonville, Florida, J. H. Mohorter has made a statesmanlike move in the benevolent work of our brotherhood. This is unquestionably the finest equipment for the purpose that we have ever yet acquired. It was my good fortune to go over the property on my return from the recent Florida Convention and I can testify to the fact that we have secured a genuine bargain from a real estate standpoint alone.

Its fine location in balmy Florida and its close proximity to the good churches in Jacksonville are assets of value. J. T. Boone and his great hearted people have already taken this enterprise under their loving protection and guardianship. It is going to be one of the most popular and serviceable homes that we have.

It is to be hoped that immediate steps can be taken looking toward its furnishing and equipment that it may soon be occupied by those whom we should all seek to honor. Generous financial assistance should be forthcoming from the very outset, to what I hope may be known as the Florida Mansion for the Aged.

Notes and News

Theatrical performances are being used by the Turkish nationalist government to spread hatred and incite massacres of non-Moslem residents of Asia Minor, according to reports received by Near East Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, the organization which has for its motive the saving of the lives of more than a million starving people in Turkey and neighboring countries. As fast as the British withdraw their troops the Mohammedan population is aroused against the Christian residents with massacres and destruction of property as a result.

Throughout the interior of Asia Minor government controlled theaters are presenting the Tragedy of Symrna, the Tragedy of Aidin and similar semi-religious productions calculated to spread the hatred of the Mohammedans against persons of other religions. A report from Angora says thousands of Armenians are following the British troops out of that region, traveling in caravans because the troops took all of the available railroad equipment and locomotives with them when they withdrew. Angora is one of the terminals of a branch of the Berlin-Bagdad railroad.

Self-government has been successfully established in many of the orphanages established by Near East Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York City, where that organization is caring for thousands of children whose parents have died during the deportations and massacres of Armenians and Syrians. In the orphanage at Jerusalem the judges are an apprentice in the carpenter shop, a boy of fourteen, and a blind girl. A native teacher presides over the court. With punishment administered by their own associates, little difficulty is found in having the orders of the court carried out, and it is seldom necessary for the director of the orphanage to intervene in settling disputes, for the court realizes that "with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged and with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again.

Not only death from starvation and exposure, but actual murder awaits hundreds of thousands of Armenians, according to Rev. Dr. Kunzler, a missionary who was in Turkey during the war and who has just returned to his home at Geneva, Switzerland. Since the allied troops have left the region he says the Turks have resumed their persecution of the people and robbery and slaughter faces all of them who attempt to return to their homes. Near East Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, is speeding food, clothing and industrial supplies to these people to prevent, as far as American benevolence can, the extermination of this long-martyred Christian people.

Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Perry write of their joy in reaching Porto Rico, and meeting the new friends there. They picked them out from the crowd at the dock as soon as they were near enough to distinguish Americans from Porto Ricans. When Miss Mills held up a WORLD CALL, they had that as the final mark of identification. They are very appreciative of the splendid work being done by Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter among the people of the rural districts as well as in Bayamon, and of Miss Mills' fine work among the women and young people. They enjoyed very much the confer-

SIGNING THE COMPACT ON THE "MAYFLOWER"

THE signing of the Mayflower compact nearly three hundred years ago was the beginning of free government in the new world, and marks the second great step in individual liberty. The Mayflower compact was the first written constitution in the new world. It was an agreement by which all citizens pledged themselves in the presence of God and one another to enact such laws as they might need and to which they promised strict obedience.

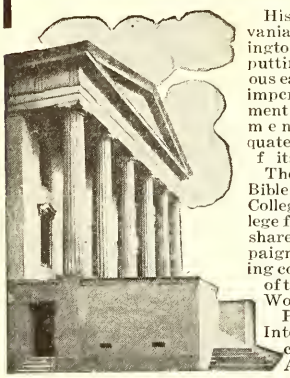
Transylvania's Big Plans

College of Bible and Hamilton College to Share Results of Campaign



Entrance to Main Building

Historic Transylvania College, Lexington, Kentucky, is putting on a vigorous campaign for the imperative enlargement of its equipment and for adequate compensation of its faculty.

The College of the Bible and Hamilton College (Junior College for Women) will share in the campaign, which is being conducted as part of the Inter-Church World Movement.

Previous to the Inter-Church financial drive in April, Transylvania and its friends will conduct a campaign of education among the 130,000 members of the Kentucky Disciple Church, and the former students and the alumni, in order to inform them concerning the urgent needs of these institutions.

Hon. Champ Clark, a product of Transylvania

A reasonable increase of the salaries of the faculty is absolutely necessary. They must have enough for a decent living, which they have not had since the doubling of living expenses. One of the first needs is a fire-proof building to house its library of rare old scientific works and other books of priceless value, the loss of which would be a real calamity.

Funds are also needed for additional endowment, to pay off indebtedness, to provide new buildings and repairs to old ones, and for an adequate athletic field with stadium, in order to maintain its rank and the progressive policies maintained since its founding, 1798.

James Lane Allen, noted author, graduate of Transylvania

The approved askings for these needs are $2,454,953 for the five-year period, $588,124 for 1920.

Among the noted men who have been connected with this institution are the two whose cuts appear, and Henry Clay, Jefferson Davis, Albert Sidney Johnson, Major General Duncan, Senator Mark Smith, Dr. Virgil Gibney, and John Fox, Jr. Dr. Richard H. Collins, the historian of Kentucky, characterizes its graduates as "statesmen, jurists, orators, surgeons and divines among the greatest in the world's history—men of mark in all the professions and callings of life."

In order to secure the addresses of all former students, it is hoped that those seeing this will at once send their present address to the Registrar; this will also insure their receiving full information regarding the campaign.

Requests for information regarding the campaign should be addressed to ence of the Evangelical Union of Porto Rico, which was held in Bayamon soon after their arrival. It enabled them to meet workers from all over the Island at the very beginning of their work, and to get in touch with the people and problems of Porto Rico.

In the article, "The Healing of China," by Dr. G. L. Hagman, which appeared in the January issue of WORLD CALL, the statement regarding Miss Nina DuPee is incorrect. She has finished her work in language study at Nanking and has been in the hospital at Nantungchow for some time.

The American Christian Missionary Society has secured the services of Jesse M. Bader, minister of the Jackson Avenue Christian Church, Kansas City, Missouri, to lead the Easter Campaign for Decision Day in our Bible schools. Mr. Bader has already entered upon this work for which he is well qualified because of his successful use of the campaign in his own church.

While Dr. Ada McNeil Gordon was in the hills with her children during the summer she wrote of her joy in being back in India among the people she loves and longs to help. It hurts her that she is not able to do more for them, she says. She wrote: "I am getting something of a practice up here. At present there are eight eye cases that come twice a day for drops, a case of pneumonia, and a few others. Four of the children who come for their eyes are hill children, one a girl wife; all are sweet and attractive. One day when the little girl came alone I brought her in and played the Edison, which dear Mrs. Gates of Coleman, Texas, gave us. She had never heard one before and was so delighted that she brought a neighbor boy, then her little brother, and then a sister-in-law, to hear it. Every day now they come and want to hear the music. I am wondering if I may not be able to start a little Sunday school with that as the primary attraction. There is a live W. C. T. U. here. Miss Campbell, the national secretary, is in Naini now spending a month. She is an American U. P. missionary, loaned for the work, and doing fine work, I think. She has been able to organize a society among the educated Indian men.

"There is only an Indian woman doctor for the big zenana mission hospital in Jhansi since the doctor went on furlough. There will be plenty of medical work there when we go down."

The Canadian students of Spokane University have organized a Canadian Club with sixteen charter members. The purpose of the organization is to foster the natural interest of the members in Canadian affairs and to interest prospective students from the Canadian Northwest in Spokane University. Charles W. Simpson is president of the club. Young people in Canada interested in Spokane University would do well to write the corresponding secretary, Merald J. Simpson, Box 231A, Opportunity, Washington.

Of the many Christmas gifts received by the several institutions of the National Benevolent Association perhaps none of them represented more to the giver and the receiver than the gift of $5 from Ruth Musgrove, missionary at Lotumbe, Africa. This gift was for the Valparaiso Christian Hospital in grateful recognition of its beautiful ministry, especially to the students of Valparaiso University.

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Reign Scoville have a warm spot in their hearts for the children. They always remember them at Christmas and Thanksgiving. This year just before Christmas a letter was received from Mrs. Scoville from Oklahoma saying, "Here's our check for $25 for a Christmas treat for the kiddies." It is needless to say that Scoville stock went up when the children learned to whom they were indebted for some of the good things they were enjoying.

The same mail that brought the Scoville special gift brought a letter from Mrs. Dr. Thompson of Union City, Indiana, in which she said: "I am the widow of a preacher. I am 87 years old. I have a small pension. I am conserving every penny. I have saved $5. I am sending it to you and I will trust you to place it. I want it to be spent for the children that are needy." Thus it is that youth and old age, strength and weakness, unite under the inspiration of the Christ in their effort to bring joy and gladness to the lives of the homeless and loveless.

No friend of the Association is more constant than Mrs. A. J. Craig of Charleston, Illinois. Her sympathy and support has not failed in 20 years. Her Christmas message this year brought with it a gift of $100, designated for the special benefit of "the dear old people in the Home for the Aged at Jacksonville, Illinois."

We are just in receipt of a letter accompanied by a check for $100 from Mrs. Rose S. Rains. This is another evidence of the breadth of the sympathy of Brother Rains, who so recently left us. He heard the cry of distress in pagan lands and gave the strength of his great life to their relief. However, the mighty chorus of their grief and misery did not shut out from his heart the cry of need in the homeland. We are using this gift of our departed brother to furnish in his good name a room in our newly acquired Home for the Aged in Florida.

The annuity department of the National Benevolent Association is enjoying a high degree of popularity these days. It has issued six bonds within the last thirty days totaling $8,250. This patronage is worthily bestowed; the bonds are absolutely safe; the interest rate is good; the payments are always on time, and the cause is a Christlike ministry to the poor.

The Union Avenue Bible school of St. Louis is strong for the children under the care of the National Benevolent Association. It always holds a great Christmas celebration and makes a great Christmas offering. Its offering was never greater than it was this year. The children of the school had a great time; the children of the home a greater.

The home in Cleveland, Ohio, is insistently crying out for a new, modern building. Little wonder they cry, for they are almost daily turning widows of our own church and their children from their doors for the lack of room. The Cleveland home must have a building. The children cannot wait, and we dare not refuse to answer their cry of need.

It is a source of great satisfaction to know that the dear old people who find asylum in the homes provided for them by Christian love are comfortable and happy. Mrs. M. J. Near writes from the home at East Aurora, saying, "Our Superintendent gets up through the night to attend to the furnace that we may be kept warm. We had a beautiful communion service last Sunday, conducted by our Mr. Burriss. We old people who cannot go out to attend church do appreciate this thoughtfulness for us. Mr. Burriss has built a fruit room since he came that will accommodate nearly one thousand cans, and the shelves are pretty well filled.

After proceeding as far as Hongkong, China, on their way to Tibet, Dr. and Mrs. D. P. Caldwell have returned to America and will not give themselves to missionary work in that far-off land. It became apparent that they were not suitable persons for this great work. This is a keen disappointment to all those who are interested in this distant mission station.

Dr. Caldwell plans to reimburse the Foreign Society for all that has been expended so that eventually there will be no financial loss. In the meantime an earnest effort is being made to secure other workers who will go to reinforce the thin line that is holding out in the face of many difficulties.

Last year the Protestant churches of the United States expended $250,000 for current expenses and for benevolence. This was a tithe of twenty-seven cents per day. An individual offering of two cents and seven mills per day is scarcely worthy of being considered an offering. If the entire Protestant church reached the average of the Northern Baptist Convention, three cents and three mills per day, there would be $48,000,000 above the $250,000,00 given last year for advance work. If the Methodist per capita standard of three cents and four mills was reached by all of Protestantism the margin would be $56,000,000. If all the Protestant churches could be lifted to the standard of the Presbyterian church, five cents and six mills per day, there would be a margin of $259,000,000. If the Protestant membership would give as the Seventh Day Adventists give, eleven cents and six mills per day, last year's giving would be maintained and there would remain for the new work $812,000,000. The tithe of $1.37 a day, or thirteen cents and seven mills from each member of the Protestant churches would maintain all church work as in the last year and provide one billion dollars for new work. Who will say that the Protestants of the United States are not able to give thirteen cents and seven mills a day for the work of the Kingdom?

A visitor to the Orient writes as follows: "In years past I have wondered at the enthusiasm of missionaries over their work. I think I know a little better now how to explain it. It seems to me to lie in the challenge of a well nigh impossible task. The difficulty of making Chinese into Christians and of making China Christian has swept over me, time and again as I have gone here and there. The peculiar cast of the Chinese mind; the grasping after gain; the inbred compulsion of custom; the solidarity of the family; the corruption of official life from top to bottom; the degradation of puerile superstition; the lack of uprightness in their religious life, the filth and nastiness crying to be cleaned up—these and other features of life to be seen on every side, all would seem to militate against the Christian program. But here they are, the missionaries, ably seconded by a magnificent group of Chinese leaders, all with their faces to the light and all optimistic. The contrast is most striking."

South America is vitally concerned in the prohibition situation in this country. Grave dangers are ahead for her if our liquor men carry out their announced plans. South America knows by sad experience what it is to be exploited and robbed by greedy outsiders. Her leaders are thoroughly aroused on this point. Though 85 per cent, descendants of the downtrodden, cruelly-treated race of Indians, are living in hopeless ignorance and despair. The governing class is as intelligent and wide awake as any people on the earth. They are alert, realizing that now King Alcohol has been routed from the Northland, and that they must in self-protection espouse the cause of prohibition, or else be overwhelmed by the alcoholic tidal wave from these parts.

A few Christian women in Diarbekir are now able to partially support themselves by working as street cleaners, carrying mortar and dirt for builders and other similar occupations, according to Miss R. B. North, a Near East Relief worker, who has just returned from that city. These women earn 65 cents a day, Miss North asserts, and this is sufficient to purchase a little food for themselves and their families.

An appeal for one thousand cows to restock the farms of the refugees in the District of Rhodapolis has been received by Near East Relief. The appeal comes from the Bishop of the Greek Catholic church at Rhodapolis. The basis of maintenance of life of these people before the war was the cultivation of their fields and the raising of cattle. During the war they were driven from their homes, their cattle taken from them and their farms destroyed. The district comprises fifty-six villages and has a population of about 22,000.

Property belonging to the Christian people of Syria has not been returned to them and will not be until such restitution is forced upon the Turks and Kurds, according to Miss R. B. North, who has just returned to the United States. Miss North was in Turkey during the war and was stationed at Diarbekir and Mardin where Near East Relief now has industrial homes for women and orphanages.

Of the Christmas observance in Deming, New Mexico, W. J. Reasoner writes: "December was a good month. There was an addition by statement, or a confession, or a baptism, as the minimum visible result of each service in which the pastor participated, the totals for three Lord's days bringing eight baptisms and two other additions. Sunday, December 21, the church united with the Bible school in a 'White Gifts for the King' service. The church was beautifully decorated, a fine white cross in the lighted baptistery, rear center, being the central feature. A pleasing program was rendered during which the classes laid gifts at the foot of the cross—food and raiment for the needy, flowers for the shut-ins and absent, and gifts of over

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers; sample copy 20 cents, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

$25 in money, including the men's part, seventeen of whom marched down the aisles and each pinned a one dollar bill to a white ribbon held by two little girls—their gift to the aged ministers, their widows and orphans.

"About two hundred persons attended this service and much credit is due the general superintendent, A. C. Elliott, and primary superintendent, Mrs. R. E. Stevenson, and their loyal helpers. The climax of the service came when four teen-age boys accepted the gospel invitation, and they, with three girls who had previously made the Good Confession, were baptized. A Christmas tree with the usual good time followed on Wednesday night. Early in December the minister was called for another year at an increased salary and with a month's vacation for early summer."

Since the beginning of the new Missionary Year, the Board of Church Extension has helped complete buildings at the following places: Leslie, Arkansas, George Darsie Memorial Fund, $400; Antlers, Oklahoma, Fletcher Cowherd Memorial Fund, $400; Washington, D. C. 12th Street Colored Church, for purchase of lot (under auspices of C. W. B. M.) General Fund, $15,000; North Little Rock, Arkansas; Frankfort, Kentucky, Church Fund, $2,000; Goldsboro, North Carolina, Annuity Fund, $5,000; Broken Arrow, Oklahoma; Independence Boulevard, Kansas City, Missouri, Church Fund, $1,300; Aubrey, Texas, Annuity Fund, $3,000; Arlington, Texas, Annuity Fund, $4,400; Haype, Kansas, Annuity Fund, $2,500; Disciples Missionary Union, advanced account of loan for purchase of lot, Ridgewood Heights Church, Brooklyn, New York, General Fund, $5,500; Miami, Oklahoma, Shuler Fund, $1,000; Fort Worth, Texas, East Annie Street Colored Church, Gill Fund, $1,000; Marion, Indiana, Annuity Fund, $5,000; Hickman, Kentucky, Annuity Fund, $5,000. According to the amounts named this is a total of $53,500 loaned since October 1.

The Board of Church Extension has received during the months of December and January, as annuities, $2,000 from a friend in Tennessee, $1,100 from a friend in California, $2,900 from a friend in Des Moines, $1,500 from a friend in Missouri, $200 from Canon City, Colorado; $5,000 from a friend in Virginia, $200 from Prince Edward Island, $200 from Indiana and $100 from Ohio.

On January 6 the Board of Church Extension established the Sol Van Meter Name Fund, which will amount to $5,000. Mr. Van Meter sent $500 and the fund will at once go to work in erecting buildings. He says, "'Sol Van Meter' is the name by which I am called here at Lexington and at old Bethany and elsewhere." Mr. Van Meter has been planning for this gift for many years. What a fine spirit for Christian people to have! If we would plan through our lifetime for gifts to advance the Kingdom we would not need an Interchurch Movement to get money. Let others go and do likewise.

The Memorial Christian Church at Palo Alto, California, has a $10,000 building on which the congregation requests a loan of $3,500 from Church Extension fund, with which to discharge the indebtedness on their building. The pastor, Charles F. Hutslar, speaks of the relief it will be to that church if the Board will handle the debt. It is somewhat like borrowing money from your own household when a church borrows from the Board of Church Extension. In January a church in Knoxville, Tennessee, and one in Oklahoma asked loans from the Church Extension fund to save their property from being sold by mortgage foreclosure. This will explain one reason why a Church Extension fund is needed.

Palo Alto is the seat of Stanford University, and a most important situation. Our church building has modern equipment.

The Macedonia Christian Church at Fallis, Oklahoma, must be saved from sale by mortgage foreclosure. It is an $800 property and the man who holds the mortgage has served notice that he will sell the property for the debt. It is not much that this little church needs to save the Lord's house, only $200, but the amount must be forthcoming. Our Church Extension Board will practice Church Retention here and save this building.

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India: New patients for the month, 974; in-patients, 14; treatments, 2,426; operations, 21; visits to homes, 181. The most important event of the month was the visit of Secretary Wilson to our station. He remained with us one week and seemed very much interested in the work. His visit was a great pleasure, and an encouragement as well. While with us he baptized eight persons.

O. J. Grainger, Jubbulpore, India: Our work is going on very well. I have just finished translating and putting through the press, the second year Primary Course in graded Sunday school lessons and am making preparations to get out an edition of the hymn book which I got out three years ago. The first edition of five thousand copies is exhausted. The work in the Bible College is the best I have known. All the men are in fine spirit. They are working hard. They are anxious to learn and are developing a passion for the work.

Mrs. Esther MacLeod, Batang, Tibet: Studied as usual about two hours a day. I have been reading Old Testament Stories in the standard Tibetan, and studying the colloquial besides. I have used every opportunity for conversation with the Tibetans and find this more interesting all the time.

Sow Money—Raise Men

¶ We are alarmed over the shortage of soldiers in Christ's army — Ministers, Missionaries, Teachers. We know that Christianity faces its greatest crisis of modern times. Our backs are to the wall for lack of man power. If the Church holds its present lines, not to speak of being triumphant, it must have speedily a host of trained recruits. It will take 100,000 new ministers and missionaries during the next five years to carry forward the work already developed.

¶ We also know that an army cannot be produced without having training camps. Our Government spent millions on officers' training camps preliminary to raising an army. It spent other millions in actually training and equipping the officers for the new army of the republic. It sowed money and raised men.

¶ But, do we know that the call for missionary and ministerial recruits is useless, even foolhardy, unless the schools where they are to be trained are adequately equipped and manned? The colleges and schools fostered by the Church are the training camps for turning out the leaders of God's conquering hosts. They will not be trained elsewhere. Millions must be put into these colleges if they are to perform this paramount service. They actually face extinction otherwise.

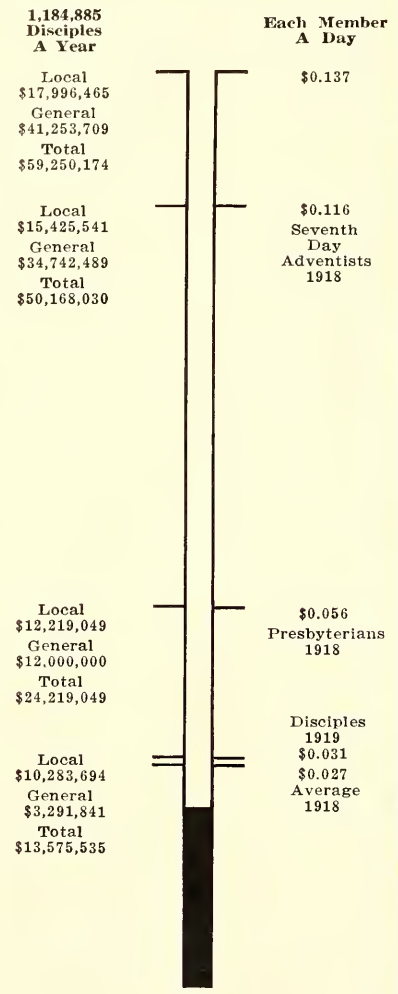
What Each Step Would Mean



At $0.137 a Day We Would Give $45,674,639 a Year of the Billion Dollar Advance

ONE BILLION DOLLARS PER YEAR
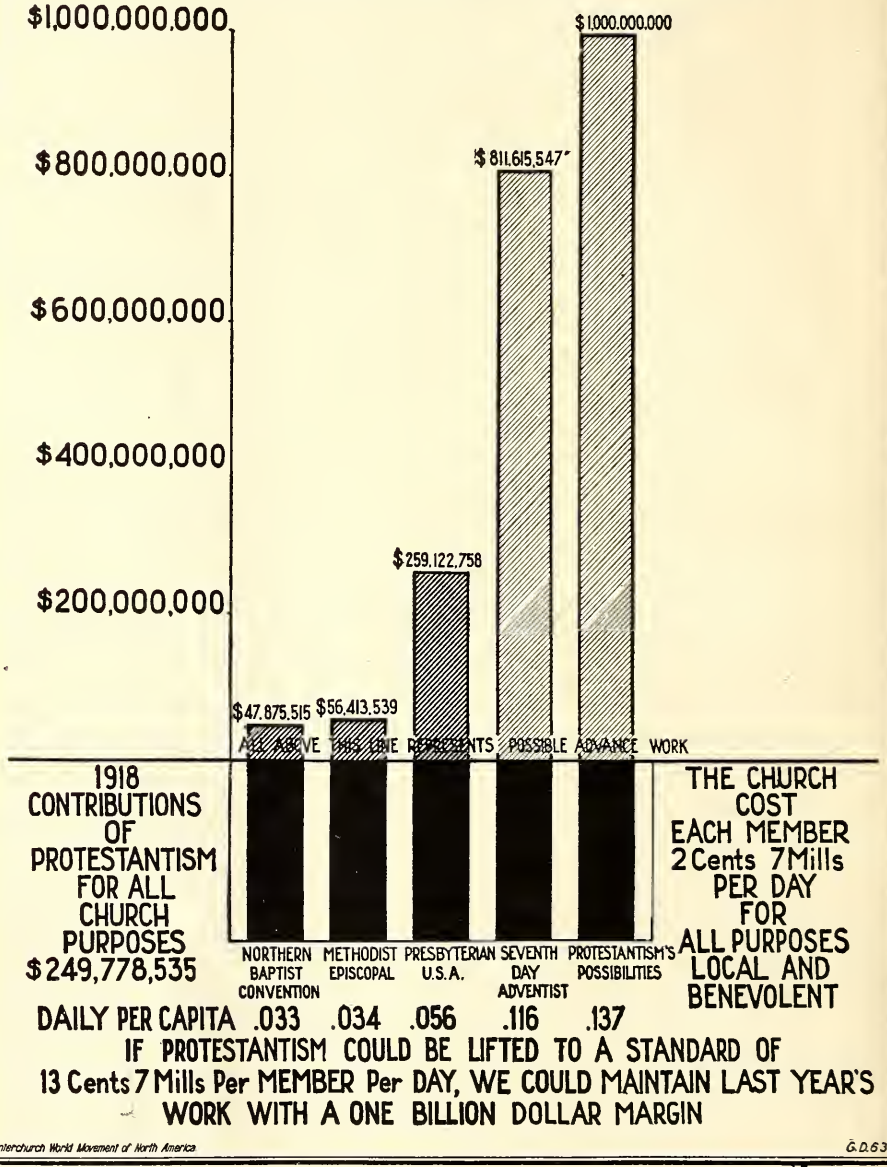
FOR ADVANCE WORK WITHIN REACH OF PROTESTANTISM



IT IS only by comparison with our low standards of the past that the preliminary budget of $1,320,214,551 for missions, benevolence and education from the majority of American Protestants seems a "staggering" amount to be raised in five years. A slight advance by all American Protestants over the scale on which the Seventh Day Adventists were giving in 1918 would produce the entire five-year Interchurch budget in one year!

As to the Disciples of Christ the case is equally clear. It is a shame to admit that complete enlistment of our membership is impossible. All ought to give as certainly as all have been baptized. But even the first year we ought to reach the scale attained by the Presbyterians two years earlier — about half that of the Seventh Day Adventists that year.

This would enable us to reach the $12,000,000 goal for 1920, and at the same time increase local church support nearly 25 per cent!

DO you know that the subscription price for WORLD CALL will be increased to $1.50 on July 1, 1920? Do you know that new subscriptions, for one year, will be accepted at the dollar rate until July 1? Do you know that any one having an expiration date not later than September, 1920, may renew his subscription for one year at the dollar rate, if such renewal reaches WORLD CALL office before July 1, 1920?

Your expiration date is on your magazine. Will you please take a look at it, and if you are entitled to renew at the dollar rate, and wish to take advantage of this opportunity, do it now and thus help to lessen the rush of work in the Circulation Department as July 1 draws near?

Please give your expiration notice prompt attention. Return card and subscription price to WORLD CALL and notify your local magazine chairman that you have sent in your renewal. By so doing you will save WORLD CALL time and money and will save your chairman time and help him to keep his records straight.

We appreciate the work being done by the magazine chairmen in churches and missionary societies. We do not mean to conflict with your plans when we ask regular subscribers to send renewals to the office. When a notice is sent out, there is no time to lose, if renewal is to reach the office in time to prevent the name coming off list. In large churches and societies, it is impossible to see all subscribers and get all renewals collected and sent in together within the short time. For that reason, we ask subscribers to remit to us and report to you. We trust this cooperation will be a help and not a hindrance.

If you will notify WORLD CALL directly when you fail to receive your magazine, you need be without your copy no longer than it takes a card to reach the office and a magazine to reach you. If your name is on WORLD CALL mailing list you are entitled to the magazine without extra cost.

Please remember we are interested in your new address; also your old one. In sending change of address give us both the new and the old.

Please send literature orders to the Literature Department of the Boards. It delays your order to have it come through WORLD CALL office.

Some weeks ago the secretary of the Federation of Woman's Missionary Societies in Lincoln, Nebraska, sent in fourteen subscriptions for WORLD CALL, to be entered as follows: One for the Commercial Club, two for hotels, one for Peoples' City Mission, one for high school library, one for penitentiary library, four for engine houses, two for editors of papers, two for rest rooms of department stores. This is a fine example of putting the magazine where it will do good.

All subscriptions and remittances for same should be addressed to WORLD CALL, 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana.

TO OUR FELLOW CITIZENS OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

The War, in shaking the very foundations of ordered civilization has driven all thoughtful men to examine the bases of national and international life.

It has become clear to-day, both through the arbitrament of war and through the tests of rebuilding a life of peace, that neither education, science, diplomacy nor commercial prosperity when allied with a belief in material force as the ultimate power, are real foundations for the ordered development of the world's life. These things are in themselves simply the tools of the spirit that handles them.

Even the hope that lies before the world of a life of peace protected and developed by a League of Nations, is itself dependent on something deeper and more fundamental still. The co-operation which the League of Nations explicitly exists to foster will become operative in so far as the consenting peoples have the spirit of goodwill. And the spirit of goodwill among men rests on spiritual forces; the hope of a "brotherhood of humanity" reposes on the deeper spiritual fact of the "Fatherhood of God." In the recognition of the fact of that Fatherhood and of the Divine purpose for the world which are central to the message of Christianity, we shall discover the ultimate foundation for the reconstruction of an ordered and harmonious life for all men. That recognition cannot be imposed by Government. It can only come as an act of free consent on the part of individual men everywhere.

Responsible as we are in our separate spheres for a share in the guidance of the British Empire as it faces the problems of the future, we believe that in the acceptance of those spiritual principles lies the sure basis of world peace. We would therefore commend to our fellow-citizens the necessity that men of goodwill who are everywhere reviewing their personal responsibilities in relation to the reconstruction of civilization should consider also the eternal validity and truth of those spiritual forces which are in fact the one hope for a permanent foundation for world peace.

And They Came

FROM one of the Transfiguration Mountains of the war a great English preacher, on a visit to the United States, thrilled us with a sermon on, "They beckoned to their partners in the other boat that they should come and help them. And they came." Not otherwise could the great war have been won. And not in a thousand years will our children quit telling the thousand stories of its partnership in heroism.

Now it is the Church of Christ that has in hand the task that is as vital to humanity as was the forlorn hope of the allies in the spring of 1917.

There were some Christians in Illinois or Grandma Jasper, of our front cover and the Jacksonville Home, ninety-four years old and happy, would have died long ago. A hundred other aged members of Churches of Christ, left by the storm and stress of life without home or support, are waiting for admission, and dying while they wait.

Somewhere there must have been some Christians, or Paul, of the back cover and the withered legs, would not be smiling as he pleads for the 200,000 babies left homeless every year in the United States.

This is a Christian nation and all the Grandma Jaspers and all the Pauls must have Christian homes—and will—because we are facing the facts and calling on our partners to help.

And how many partners we have for such a task, especially when it is a unit of the twelve-million-dollar budget of the brotherhood, for the whole round of missions, benevolence and education, which is itself a part of the great Interchurch budget of $174,947,211. payable this year.

1. Our Own Better Selves, "we" being those who gave last year $441,438.34 to the National Benevolent Association. The total looks respectable, but most of us really did not try. Mr. Stockton gave $100,000. Several took out annuity bonds that totaled $37,302.50. A few who died remembered God's little ones with $22,818.38. All the rest of us gave $281,317.46, as churches, Sunday schools and individuals.

Take us church by church in the Year Book: Members 485, offering $10; members 178, offering $1.54 (no coin small enough to give every member a share in that!); members 1,140, offering $19.35; members 1,000, offering $21. Even where $150 stands opposite 1,100 members and $60 over against 300, remembering that it is a whole year's record, no one would believe that many of us were exceeding fifteen per cent of our incomes! Let us really give now like we bought Liberty Bonds. Then on May 2 the report can be made, "And they came."

2. Our Fellow Members. One thing that has reconciled us to doing so little was the fact that most of the members of our congregation were doing nothing. We felt quite generous in comparison. They will help when they know the need, which we will show them. They are not going to give just for the exercise of giving. But when they see tragic needs that cannot be met without them, the completed record will disclose, "And they came."

3. Five Thousand Other Churches and Sunday Schools that gave nothing last year. Some of them had no preacher, maybe have none now. Some thought their own local church support was all they could undertake. Many thought they would give at a more convenient season, which never came. The rest never thought at all. But all are capable of thinking and helping, if they know the facts. And we are organizing to present the facts to the last least member of the last least church. So, when the campaign is ended the tireless workers can say, "And they came."

4. The Other Boat. For every church member in America there is at least one other person who would rather die than see the Church fail. He has not been helping much toward its success. He never supposed his help was needed. Maybe he is not concerned about any particular church. But when all the churches together signal him that his help is really needed, he will come. The war has thrown him into a new world with distances reduced or destroyed, so he may even help in Foreign Missions, but Hospitals and Homes for the Orphan and the Aged are manifest and nearby necessities. All he needs is a chance to help here.

But let us be sure that we ask our partners of the other boat for enough. In the past we sometimes asked some of them to pay fifty cents for a supper that might be worth a dollar or a dime. We must now ask outright for real money and for so much more than they happen to have in their pockets that they will need to make their payments in weekly or monthly installments throughout a whole year, just like we do. They will come as reinforcements, not as substitutes.

And more, we must lay this work of God so heavily upon the hearts of these unchurched friends of God that they will give themselves, like certain citizens of Macedonia whom Paul canvassed. With thousands, here as there, the giving of themselves will be first, as the Win One Campaign precedes the call for money. All will gladly swell the Easter offering of the Bible schools for the orphan and the aged.

When the great opportunity for adequate investment in the Kingdom of God comes April 25 to May 2, then those who still remain in the other boat—outside the church—may be led to make such investments in the work of God, that a month or a year later they will give themselves also. "For where the treasure is there will the heart be also."

The adequate pressing of this twofold campaign, evangelistic and financial, will be crowned with twofold joy; and the refrain of the victory song will be, "And they came!"

Thirty-Three Years of Christlike Ministry

The National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church

THE National Benevolent Association is an agency through which the Christian churches and individual disciples of Christ are cooperating in their efforts to exemplify "pure and undefiled religion" by visiting "the fatherless and the widow in their affliction."

The direction of the Association's work has always been in the hands of members of our churches. Its Central Executive Board is made up of well-known disciples of Christ representing all parts of the country. Many of these men and women have been on the Board since its organization. A few have died and others have dropped out, but the organization remains unchanged. It is the organization that has been appealing to our churches and Bible schools for more than twenty years for an Easter offering. It is the organization that for thirty-three years has responded to the appeals of our churches and ministers to care for the widow, the orphan and the aged.

A Servant of the Brotherhood

The National Benevolent Association has always sought to be the servant of the churches and of the individual members of these churches who are interested in maintaining and enlarging the work of Christian benevolence. It assumes that the people who give their money to this work are as much interested in the work as those who are chosen to direct it. It seeks, therefore, to receive instruction and guidance from those whom it seeks to serve. It feels under obligation to keep the people thoroughly informed about every phase of its work. It always seeks to make a full and complete report to the annual convention and through the press to the whole brotherhood. It has always welcomed the closest scrutiny of its work. The splendid achievements already attained, are the result of the confidence the public has reposed in the Association, and the respect and appreciation in which the Association holds this confidence. The Association's motto is "To minister as the servant of all."

"Experience Makes Perfect"

Perhaps no one thing has contributed more largely to the success of the work of the National Benevolent Association than the very few changes that have taken place in its board of managers. The Association has been at work for thirty-three years. Many of the persons now on the board of managers were on when the Association was organized. The knowledge acquired through experience has made many of these persons expert in the work under their care. Through all these years, these men and women have given time and talent without reserve and without cost. Their interest has grown with the years. The oldest members on the board are today the most faithful in attendance upon its meetings and the most painstaking and thoughtful in the consideration of the business of the Association. Many of them, it is true, have grown gray in its service, but they have grown rich in their value to the cause of Christian benevolence.

The Association an Economist

Much of that which is given to relieve the necessities of the suffering is lost because it is given on the impulse, rather than as the result of an intelligent appreciation of their needs. An interesting story is told of how a generous-hearted gentleman in the city of Cambridge, Massachusetts, one day seeing a gray-headed old man standing on the street with his hat in his hand, hastily dropped a half-dollar in the hat and hurried away, congratulating himself on having helped an aged, indigent brother. The holder of that hat was none other than Oliver Wendell Holmes who had just uncovered his head to cool his heated brow. A great deal of the benevolent work that is carried on by individual enterprise is scarcely more to the point than this Massachusetts citizen's contribution.

The Association has sought by council and cooperation, as far as possible, to economize the benevolent resources of our people. It has sought to locate institutions not with reference to personal impulse or desire, but with reference to the convenience and needs of the churches. It has sought to avoid the grouping of institutions in one community to the neglect of other communities. It has sought to avoid the paralleling of work. It has sought to avoid the overlapping of appeals, and to prevent wreckage and loss resulting from unwisely and hastily located institutions and insecure investments. It has sought as a faithful steward to invest the entrusted talent wisely that the Master may have His own when He comes.

The Association Secures Permanency in Benevolent Work

No work commanding the attention and sympathies of the Church of Christ is so susceptible to error or so easily abused as that of providing for the unfortunate. It is easy for some person with a little money and a generous heart to start a home for the widow and the orphan or some other class of needy persons. The "real rub" comes in furnishing the necessary support for such an institution throughout the years. When an eleemosynary institution depends upon some individual or upon some local board of managers, it flourishes while the interested person lives or the local people succeed in working together in harmony, but when its friend dies, moves away, or grows weary, or discord creeps in, then the institution has an uncertain existence, with a fine chance of failure.

With a national organization directing a work of this kind, permanency is guaranteed. When a new institution is established it is by the united approval and cooperation of the constituency represented by the national organization. Individuals may come and individuals may go, but the work goes on, because it is the work of a great body of people, and is as strong as their united sympathy and support. The service rendered our great brotherhood in rescuing and saving to permanent service institutions in distress and bankruptcy, the the result of ill-advised private enterprise, is as marked as its achievements in establishing new institutions.

What the Association Is Doing

It is ministering to the indigent sick, especially among our own brethren, in the name of the Great Physician. It is providing temporary assistance to widowed mothers and their children. It is giving permanent care and love to orphan and other unfortunate children. It is placing these children in carefully selected family homes. It has placed about 5,000. It is providing comfortable Christian homes for aged, indigent brethren in Christ. It is seeking to lead every disciple of Christ into the fullest, sweetest fellowship with the Master in His compassion upon the poor that they may know the joy of His "Come, ye blessed."

He Found Them Slaves; He Made Them Companions

At a well by the side of the road The Master stopped to rest. It was summer and the way was hot.

And there he uttered one of the most precious messages of His whole ministry. To a great congregation? No. To a group of ten or twenty men? No. To an audience of one—a woman.

The house of two women—Mary and Martha—was His favorite retreat.

Almost His last words from the Cross were for a woman's comfort; and to a woman he revealed Himself on that first Easter morning.

Women in the ancient world had been sometimes slaves; seldom better than servants.

But He gave them the proud title of Companion. All their splendid progress had its beginning in the reverence that He showed the women who were His friends.

Down through the ages, His Church has been the custodian of His reverence for women. Today more than ever before it gives them their chance for self-expression—a great lever with which to work.

The Evangelical Churches of America have united in a great cooperative work under the name of the Interchurch World Movement.

Its object is to encourage church cooperation and to make the teachings of Jesus Christ the paramount influence in the social, political and economic life of the modern world.

For the first time in their history the churches have the full facts, based on scientific surveys of the mission fields, and of America, county by county. Your pastor can tell you about these surveys.

Without the help of the women of America such a gigantic program would be impossible; with their help—and that includes your help—it cannot fail.

You who owe so much to the Master of the Church, help the Church to serve that Master better.

And when your church calls upon you, give—and give from your heart as well as your pocketbook.

Of Presidential Stock and Habit

By E. B. BAGBY

WILLIAM PALMER CLARKSON'S great-great-grandmother and my great-great-grandmother were sisters, but the subject of this sketch has always been to me more like a brother than a fourth cousin. When his grandfather, Benjamin Turner, was thrown from a spirited horse and killed, the two orphaned girls, Lucy and Luly, found a refuge, one in the home of my grandfather, Temple Walker, and the other with my great uncle, Volney Walker. The Virginians of those days were not bothered by the high cost of living, and the fifty dollars a year paid by the Turner estate for the board and keep of each of these orphans was considered more than enough. My grandfather had sixteen children of his own and one more did not make any difference. As I have gone through the chambers of Mt. Elba and Haybattle I have wondered where they put the folks to sleep.

William Palmer Clarkson

But the young ladies were not concerned about limited sleeping quarters as long as there were ample horse-racks. Every morning horses were saddled and tied to the racks for the day's work or pleasure, but more often pleasure than work. In the evening the horses were taken to the stables and horses from other plantations were tied to the racks. Then some day instead of horses with saddles there stood at the gate horses and a carriage, and this equipage drove away to the long road amid a shower of rice and a hail of old shoes. So, in the course of time George Palmer Stacy bore away Lucy Turner to be his bride, and James L. Clarkson took Luly to make for him a home.

In this home a boy grew up and often heard the story of the kindness of "Uncle Volney" and "Uncle Temple" to "Mother" and "Auntie"; a kindness the boy was destined to pass on to hundreds of other orphan children. These were the days of reconstruction following the Civil War and this whole section of Virginia was orphaned. After General Lee's surrender his men returned home to find the slaves set free, the fences down, and their lands gone to waste. Three times the armies had passed over the farm of James Clarkson. Finding himself waging a losing battle on the poor soil he determined to move to the West. Great was our distress when the family departed for Adel, Iowa. By this time Palmer was ready for school. Upon his entrance into the schoolroom at Adel he was astonished to see sitting with the white children several colored boys, sons of the only Negro family in town; and still more astonished when on his way home he was accosted by those Negro boys who said, "We heard that your father and grandfather owned slaves and we are going to beat you." Which they proceeded to do. Palmer had heard of visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation, and thought that while it might be a proper warning for iniquitous fathers it was hard on the innocent children. Possibly the punishment was not wasted. Many years of our brother's life have been devoted to ameliorating the condition of the unfortunates caught under the penalty of this law.

James Clarkson found the black, loamy soil of Iowa much more productive than the thin, worn-out lands of Virginia, and a measure of prosperity came to the family. But the prosperity was not sufficient to sunder old home ties. Sooner might the Jews by the rivers of Babylon forget Zion than these exiles forget Virginia and the dear ones of King and Queen county. So every few summers the Clarksons came back to the Old Dominion. Their arrival was a red-letter day in the community, especially to the boy cousins. No boys ever had a better time than that quintet—"Charlie and Ben Stacy, Ned and Dick Bagby, and Billy Clarkson." Billy (Palmer) cannot now return to Virginia so often, but every year he keeps tryst with his sainted mother's only sister at the National Convention of Disciples of Christ.

The editor wishes me to give instances to show how Mr. Clarkson's goodness was rooted in his early years; but for the life of me I cannot remember that this Elder of the Union Avenue Christian Church ever manifested any marks of early piety. The night we raided the apple orchard I am sure he offered no protest, nor did he fail in disposing of his share of the spoils. And when we found that the fruit was good to the taste and greatly to be desired for a future feast, we tightened our blouses and tied strings around our breeches' legs and tucked in all the apples we could hold, and ran. When my brother Richard stumped his toe and fell, and was so full of apples internally and externally that he could not get up and cried for help, I do not recall that Palmer Clarkson, either then or when telling the story afterwards, suppressed any laughter or showed any prickings of conscience over the incident. The assertion is made that the country boy will generally outstrip the city boy in the race of life; and the reason given is that the country boy is oftener thrown upon his own resources and learns to develop initiative. In the experiences of those vacations we had plenty of opportunity for initiative.

ONE day my father said, "The house is full of company and there is no flour. You boys hitch up the oxen and go to the Walkerton mill, and if you cannot get the flour today, spend the night at Locust Grove with your Cousin, Melville Walker." Night found us at Locust Grove entertained by a bevy of pretty girls and enjoying a good old Virginia supper. Palmer Clarkson can tell to this day what we had for supper that night and the number of biscuits and plates of stewed apples one member of the party ate; though I protest that the count has grown with the years of telling. When the miller told us next morning that the wheat was not yet ground we were glad of another opportunity for a swim in the mill-pond. We drove the oxen into the deep shade by the big mill wheel, from which the current flowing deep and strong served as a barrier for the oxen on one side, and we built a fence on the other side and hied away to the pond.

On our return we discovered that our barrier of water had departed with the stopping of the mill and the falling of the tide, and that the oxen had disappeared in the wide river marshes. After a long search the oxen were found, but without the yoke. Without the yoke we could not hitch the oxen, and without the oxen we could not draw the cart, and without the cart we could not haul the flour, and so we could not get home that night. Our cousins, the Temple boys, happened along and invited us to spend the night with them. This we were glad to do, and Edward Temple, who is now Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Texas, and his brother William cut down a pine tree and fashioned for us a yoke. We reached home late the next day and our parents were glad to see us, and our cousins were glad to see the flour.

"The house is full and there is no flour." I wonder how often these words have been heard by the President of the National Benevolent Association as he has looked over the mail of the thirteen institutions under his care. And the response of the churches to these appeals must have seemed at times as slow as the pace of the oxen along the sandy Virginia roads.

In our litter of cousins Palmer was not the biggest, but we learned that in an emergency it was safe to trust his judgment. When there was any work to be done around the yard or on the farm Palmer was always the first to offer his services and the last to quit the job. My father was devoted to him and was always pleased to have Palmer as partner in our games or as his companion in the long rides over the countryside. All the Virginia relatives rejoice in the successes and honors which have crowned his later years.

Our rejoicing is multiplied by our recollection of his devotion to his mother. He was the firstborn and she was a very young mother and inexperienced in any sort of work or care. The new home in Iowa was a lonely place for her, with her husband necessarily away much of the time. So she depended more and more upon Palmer both for companionship and for help about the house. And he had a chance to really know not only the wealth of his mother's affection but also her superior intelligence and especially the strength and beauty of her Christian character. Sometimes when he was working in the field with his father, Mr. Clarkson would be startled by his shrill shout of "Marm!" "What's the matter, Palmer?" "Didn't you hear Mother call me?" And nothing could hold him when she called.

In addition to heading the National Benevolent Association for the past nine years and, as chairman of the committee, seeing the financing of a great $210,000 church building through from inception to completion, he has served actively all the while as a director of the Christian Board of Publication and for several years as a member of the Executive Committee of the Missouri Sunday School Association. He is now also a member of the Executive Committee of the United Christian Missionary Society.

He began business as a lawyer, after graduating from Washington University in St. Louis, the family having moved to that city when Palmer was sixteen. For twelve years he practiced his profession and then went into the Pioneer Cooperage Company of St. Louis and Chicago, of which he is now vice-president. He is a director of the Merchants-Laclede National Bank, a member of the executive committee of the chamber of commerce and, for the second term, president of the St. Louis Manufacturers' Association.

William Palmer Clarkson has been president of a great many things. I do not know whether he was born to presidential greatness, or achieved presidential greatness, or had presidential greatness thrust upon him. Mr. Clarkson is a descendant of William Harrison, a member of the family which has given to our country two presidents—William Henry and Benjamin Harrison. Our brother's immediate forebears were members of the Smyrna Church, organized in 1832, when the split occurred in the Bruington Baptist Church, after the controversy between Robert B. Semple and Andrew Broaddus, and Alexander Campbell and Dr. John DeVal.

THESE early members of Smyrna Church were as near saintlhood as it is possible for people to be and escape translation. The community in which they lived had the highest moral standards I have ever known. For many years King and Queen county had the largest percentages of church members and the smallest percentage of crime of any county in the best State in the Union. I had cousins born and reared there who never saw a drunken man and never heard an oath until they were grown and had moved to Washington and Baltimore. If W. Palmer Clarkson should ever depart from the straight and narrow way and miss at last the happy gate it will not be because he did not have the proper start in life. So far it must be said that not only he but his children also, in the church and in the beautiful home nearby, run true to type. The children are John Turner, a junior in Cornell University, Marie Louise, a student at Ely Court, Greenwich, Connecticut, and Palmer L., still in the St. Louis high school. Their mother was Marie, daughter of the late General John W. Turner, and Blanche Soulard, of one of the old French families of St. Louis.

Frequently his friends and business associates have wondered that he should give so much of his time and income to the church and its various enterprises. All the more they have heaped honors and responsibilities upon him and never found him wanting. But they know that on his calendar, church appointments and religious board meetings are the primary dates, and that other engagements are arranged with reference to these. They marvel that a man of his position should do without an automobile. He offers no explanation, makes no apology, and above all, his happy face and cheery laugh give no suggestion of painful self-denial. He is always having a good time. No sportsman goes after game with keener interest than he gives to solving problems of benevolence and unfolding the Bible to the young men of his Sunday school class. He offers no explanation. But in his heart of hearts I wonder if there is not, again and again, a reverent whispered thought, "Don't you hear Mother calling me?"

Budget of the Disciples of Christ in the Interchurch World Movement for the Year 1920

By STEPHEN J. COREY

PRINCIPLES involved in making the budgets for the Interchurch Campaign.

(a) The basis for the budgets considered for all the communions in the Interchurch World Movement is a careful, world-wide survey of the needs in the various fields of effort. Heretofore financial campaigns have been largely based on the most immediate needs and what was thought to be possible in the way of the amount of money which could be secured. Now, for the first time, it has been proposed that a real survey of world needs be made, with a careful measure of what is needed to do the task before us, both at home and abroad, and then the calling upon the churches for support which will meet this great need.

(b) With the above thought in mind the first step taken has been to work out a budget which will enable the communion to realize as much as possible of its responsibility in world work in a five-year period.

(c) Finally the plan has been to make a budget which will be the first unit in the five-year plan and to shape this first year so that it will be an adequate and fair financial part of the five-year plan and campaign.

II. How the budget for the Disciples of Christ has been formed.

(a) It was realized at the time of our National Convention that the current expense budgets for our various organizations which the National Convention passed upon were entirely inadequate. They were made on the basis of a small percentage of increase over the giving of last year and with the thought that, since the surveys which the Interchurch World Movement was making were approaching completion, there should be opportunity for the making of a new and adequate budget. With this in mind the convention passed a resolution authorizing the enlarging of the United Budget Committee by the addition of a commission from the Executive Committee of the convention, which should take up the question of the Interchurch World Movement Budget for the Disciples of Christ just as soon as facts were sufficiently in hand and make an additional budget for 1920-21, which would be adequate and just for the Disciples of Christ.

(b) The following steps have been taken in the careful preparation of this budget: Secretaries representing our various interests, both educational and missionary, were in attendance at the Interchurch Survey Conferences held in the East early in December. Following these meetings our home and foreign missionary groups and college groups got together, through their various budget committees, and carefully worked over the possible annual and five-year askings for these various interests. Then came the all-Board Conference at Atlantic City, in which there was a general study of the plans and budget askings for all the communions of America. Following this representatives of the interests included in the United Christian Missionary Society met and carefully went over and correlated the items making up the budget of the United Society. At the same time the Board of Education had a similar meeting with regard to the Joint College Budget. After these budgets were carefully worked out in groups there was a meeting of representatives from all our Boards to make a tentative all-Disciple budget. Following this the commission appointed by the General Convention met with the United Budget Committee to discuss and study these entire askings. Then after this committee had recommended the revised budget a conference was held in St. Louis of the Executive Committees of all of our Societies, together with the Board of Education, the state secretaries and all field workers of the Disciples of Christ, at which the proposed annual and five-year budget for the Disciples through the Interchurch was carefully studied and approved. Thus every step possible has been taken to make the conclusions democratic and as inclusive as possible as to the number of people studying the budgets.

III. Facts for consideration.

(a) The churches face an absolutely new and appalling situation through the whole world. Never has the world been so unsteady, confused, distressed and despairing. Never has there been such a realization of the failure of every other agency aside from Christianity to bring either peace or happiness. Never has there been such readiness to listen to any solution for the world's problems, nor such a heartache and hunger for salvation from the wreck and confusion of modern day life.

(b) We are facing the fact that the war came to its conclusion without Protestant Christianity having done anything unitedly to face its task for the reconstruction and salvation of the world.

(c) Immediately following the close of the war a great spirit of awakening became evident among the Protestant forces of the world. This awakening became evident in a new sense of the need of absolutely unique and unthought-of forward movements, especially among the Christian bodies of America. This became evident in the great Centenary Movement of the Methodist Church North and South, the Five-Year Forward Movement of the Northern Baptists, the great campaign of the Southern Baptists, the New Era Movement of the Presbyterians, and other similar forward-looking campaigns of practically all of the religious bodies of America.

(d) In connection with these forward movements which had been preceded by the Men and Millions Movement of the Disciples of Christ, it quickly dawned on religious leaders everywhere that somehow there must be a united forward movement which would link up in a promotional and inspirational way all of Protestant Christianity in America. The result of this conviction has been the Interchurch World Movement.

(e) From the beginning of this great forward movement it has been realized by all that old ideals of work and stewardship are absolutely unthinkable in this hour of need and crisis.

IV. The Budget.

After careful study of the needs of all of our work it has been thought that an aim should be recommended for the five-year period of $60,000,000 for the Disciples of Christ—$30,000,000 of this to be for the United Christian Missionary Society and its work and $30,000,000 for education. This aim will be recommended to the next national convention for its consideration and approval.

For the one-year period, 1920-21, the budget recommended is $12,000,000, consisting of $6,000,000 for the United Christian Missionary Society and $6,000,000 for Education. It is understood that a budget of $25,000 for the Temperance Board shall be included in the askings of the United Christian Missionary Society and a budget of $25,000 for the Association for the Production of Christian Unity in the askings of the Board of Education and colleges.

The following is a brief statement concerning the proposed budget for the first year:

(a) The budget of the United Christian Missionary Society. Two principles have prevailed in the making of this budget—

(1) A careful study of the surveys made by the missionaries on our various fields as to the absolute immediate and critical needs in missionaries and equipment for the undertaking of the task at our doors.

(2) The principle of keeping the askings entirely within the expenditure needed for the probable number of missionaries who can be secured to go out and the possibilities of the erection of needed buildings and equipment within a one-year period.

The items for the Budget of the United Christian Missionary Society are as follows:

Foreign Missions:
China and Tibet	$740,023
India	359,872
Japan	288,107
Latin America	409,000
Philippines	176,500
Africa	179,850
Promotion	200,000
College of Missions (with $135,000 in Home Budget)	135,000	$2,488,352
Home Missions including State Missions and Church Extension (Items in May Issue)		2,064,965
Religious Education (including Sunday School, Christian Endeavor and Religious Education)		197,331
Ministerial Relief and Pensions		223,912
Benevolences (Including buildings in Cleveland, Atlanta, Jacksonville, Florida, etc.)		1,000,000
Total		$5,974,560
Temperance Board		25,440
Total		$6,000,000

(b) The Budget for the Board of Education.

Several considerations have been involved in the making of the proposed budget for our educational work. A scientific survey of our educational situation based on a minimum standard for efficiency among American colleges. This standard has been based on a very careful study on the part of a strong committee through a period of years. The norm or basis for consideration has been that which is absolutely essential for making the college of minimum efficiency. No such careful study of the educational situation at large, and among our people in particular, has ever been made before. The survey for our own institutions has been most conservative in its deductions. The high school work which any of our colleges may be carrying on has not been counted in the needs for equipment or enlargement of staff; the item of attendance has been based on a minimum in this period just following the war, all the funds of the colleges have been deducted from any consideration of needs, whether these funds were interest-bearing or not; the payment of no debts has been considered and there has been no allowance made for growth in the student body. After a careful survey the first deduction showed that our colleges absolutely needed $55,000,000 for a five-year period in order to make them of minimum efficiency. After restudy this was conservatively reduced to $43,000,000, and then after feeling the need of a further reduction the Board of Education has reduced the five-year suggested askings to $30,000,000. The final suggested budget for the first year is one-fifth of the $30,000,000 or $6,000,000.

For the Board of Education, our colleges and work in connection with state universities	$5,975,000
Commission on Christian Unity	25,000
Total	$6,000,000
Total proposed budget for one year	$12,000,000

V. Points of Emphasis.

The budget askings for the United Society and the Board of Education include the regular income for the support of this work as well.

The campaigns already started for many of our colleges include ideals for these institutions which approach closely to the $6,000,000 goal set for this year.

The proposed budget for the United Christian Missionary Society is a little more than twice the regular income for this last year.

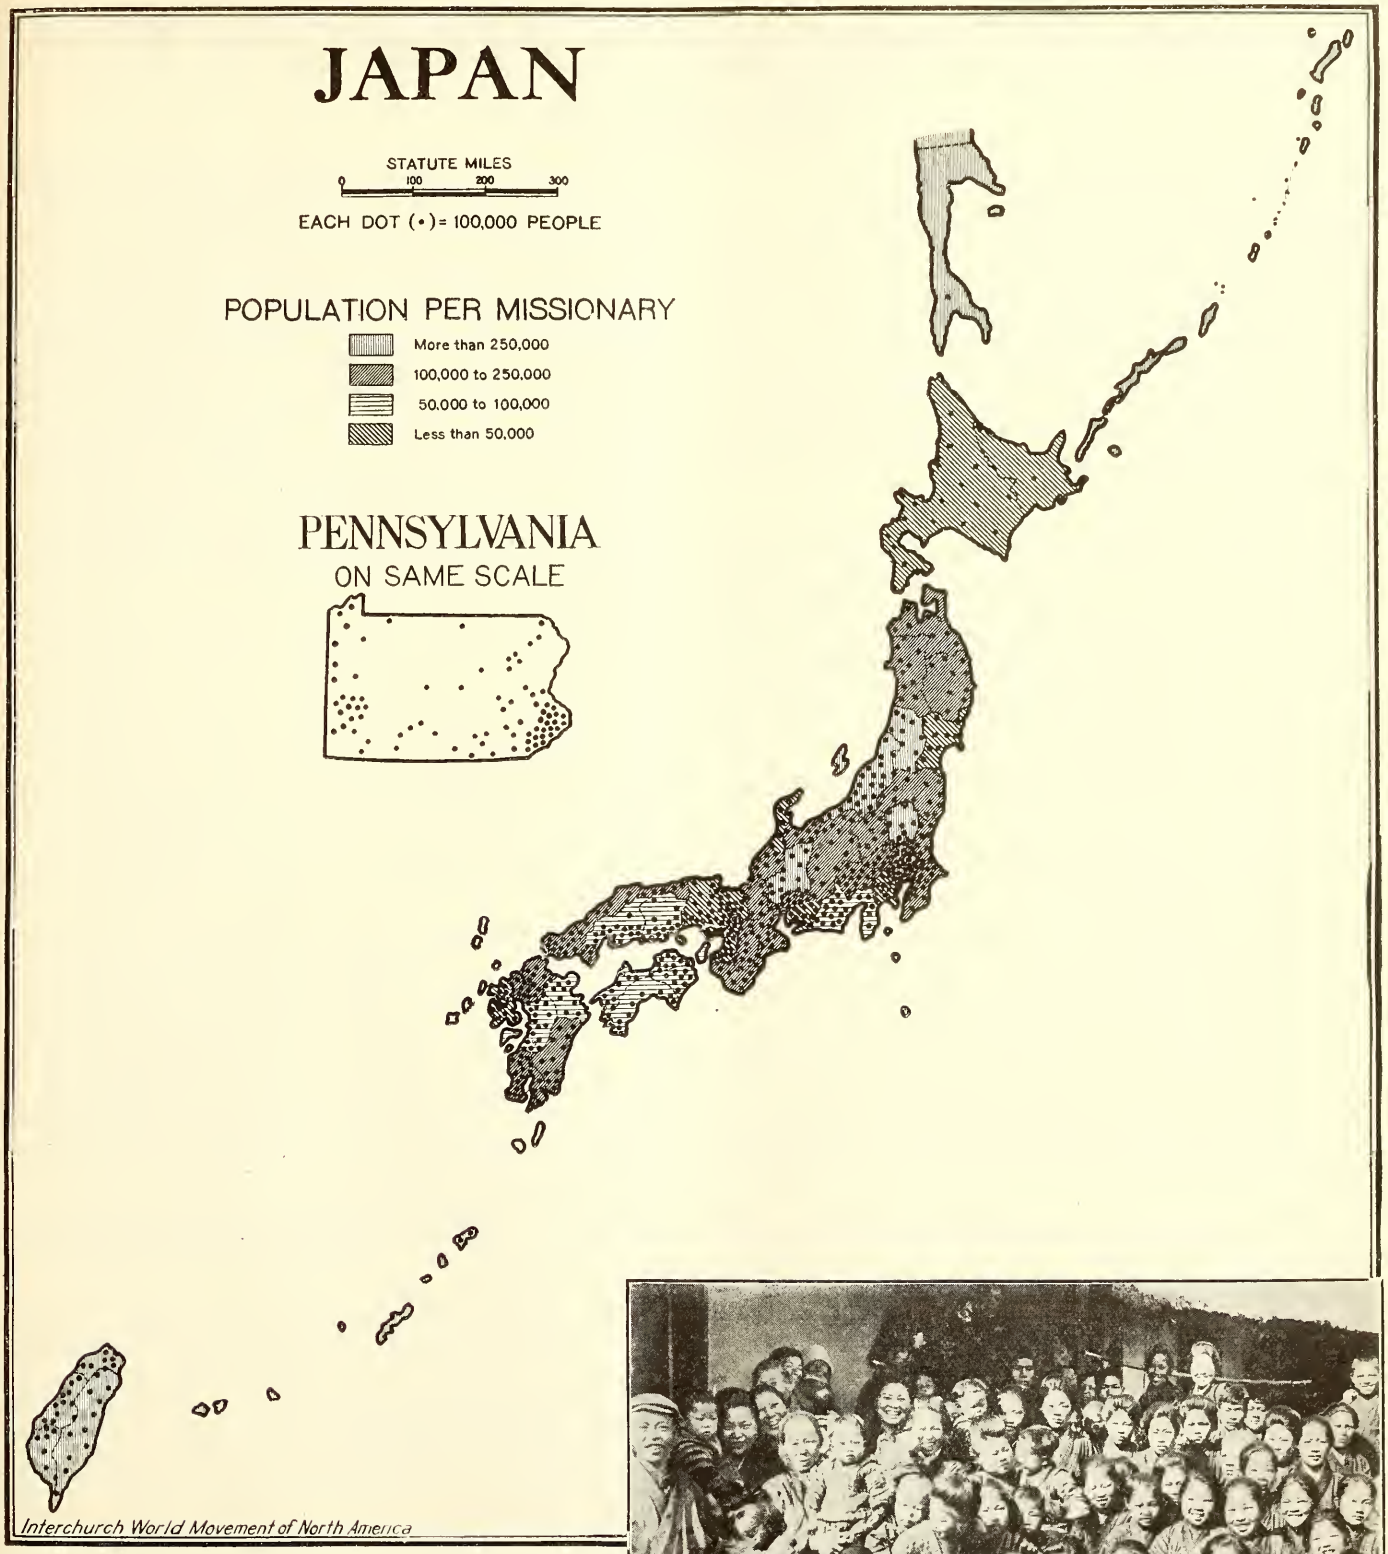
The proposed askings for the five-year campaign for our missionary interests are but a little more than double our regular income already established for this work, if included over a five-year period.

The proposed budget of $60,000,000 for the Disciples of Christ and the $12,000,000 budget for this first year are conservative in comparison with the plans and budgets of the other Protestant communions of America. The cost of carrying on missionary and educational work has almost doubled during the last five years, so that the proposed new budgets do not mean a great advance forward movement.

The most critical situation which the Disciples of Christ face is that of leadership for our churches and work. Only as our colleges are made efficient in their work can we hope for trained leaders for our churches at home and abroad.

Prayer

I shall never be on Thy mount in prayer until I have a mountain view—Thy view. I must be able to look on every side, to consider how my wish will affect the wish of another. Give me this all-round view, O Lord; set my feet in this large room. Sometimes a voice says to me, "Pray Christ to press on: your interest is in the house of Jairus." Let me look back before doing so, and see whether there be not a suppliant in the rear, someone whose prayer is, "Let Christ linger on the way." Ever let there be present to my mind the multitude that are pressing on Thee. Let me remember the many souls that are touching Thee with wishes varied, conflicting. Let me remember that my gain may be my brother's loss. Let me pause solemnly, with uncovered head, before the temple of prayer. Let me stand in the cross-way where the temple is approached from many sides. So shall my wish be golden, so shall I ask what shall be pleasing to Thee. GEORGE MATHESON.



THE more populous Japan of tomorrow is eagerly accessible today to Christian missionaries. If we meet the need we shall have as friendly a neighbor across the Pacific as we have across the Great Lakes. Only Christ in the heart can make such neighbors.

Disciples of Christ and the Interchurch World Movement

Questions and Answers

WHAT is the Interchurch World Movement?

A cooperation of the evangelical forces of the United States for three specific purposes:

(1) To discover the immediate needs of all fields and all departments of Christian service.

(2) To make known to the constituency of the cooperating churches the ascertained facts of the present world situation.

(3) To secure a sufficient volume of prayer, Bible study, evangelism, stewardship, life-enlistment and cash contributions, to meet the world's need of Christ.

2. How did it come?

From a general realization that the permanent peace of the world, and indeed, the very existence of civilization, depends upon united and aggressive action by the Church of Christ. The Movement expresses the inarticulate longing of millions of souls for unity in the hour of the world's supreme need. A striking appraisal of the situation is found in the appeal of the Premiers of all the units of the British Empire to their fellow citizens. See page 2.

3. Is it an attempt to unite or to federate churches or church bodies?

No. The Movement seeks simply to utilize the unity that now exists for the supreme ends which all recognize. It is a Movement of cooperation.

4. Does it attempt to limit or interfere with the work of any church or body?

No. In it they together discover the task but each individual church is free to meet the need in its own way.

5. Does participation in the Interchurch World Movement mean the endorsement or approval of denominationalism?

No. It shows a disposition to practice cooperation, as far as possible without compromise, and it affords an opportunity to demonstrate that our plea for unity is "That they may all believe."

6. Will cooperation in the Interchurch World Movement hinder or retard our work?

No. It will rather enable us to take advantage of a favorable tide of universal public sentiment for the immediate enlargement of the work of Christ throughout the world.

7. What action, if any, has been taken by Disciples of Christ regarding participation in the Interchurch World Movement?

(1) The International Convention at Cincinnati, in October, 1919, voted that all our national organizations should participate as far as possible without compromise.

(2) Pursuant to the action of the Cincinnati Convention our nine national boards voted to cooperate in the Interchurch World Movement and organized for effective participation through the Joint Promotional Committee of the United Christian Missionary Society and the Board of Education.

(3) Several special campaigns in behalf of state educational and missionary interests have voted to participate.

(4) An All-Field Workers' Conference representing all of our National organizations, and most of the state societies and colleges, held at St. Louis, January 22 and 23, 1920, after thorough consideration recommended the plans for cooperation in the Movement which are now being followed.

8. What part, if any, have Disciples of Christ had in organizing the Interchurch World Movement and in directing its activities?

(1) They have been ably and amply represented from the first, both on the Executive Committee and on the General Committee. A. E. Cory and David W. Teachout are members of the former and Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, F. W. Burnham, Stephen J. Corey, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, W. Palmer Clarkson, S. G. Inman, R. A. Long, I. N. McCash, R. H. Miller, James H. Mohorter, G. W. Muckley, H. O. Pritchard, C. M. Rodefer, F. E. Smith, W. R. Warren, Herbert L. Willett, on the latter.

(2) Ninety-five representatives from seventeen states sat in the Atlantic City Survey Conference which gave final statement to the principles of the Movement and definite shape to its policies.

(3) A. E. Cory has had entire charge of the field work of the Movement.

(4) Three of the five teams that conducted the state conferences for preachers were led by our men and we were represented on all of them.

(5) J. H. Mohorter, secretary of our Promotional Committee, is a member of the Cabinet of the director of the financial campaign, 45 W. 18th St., New York City.

(6) Many of our men and women have served in office and field.

9. How will participation in the Interchurch World Movement benefit us?

It will give us the opportunity we have craved for more than a century to place the merits of the Restoration Movement before the religious world in the most favorable light, and

It will give us the supreme satisfaction of knowing that, in this hour of dire need in the world's life, we joined our efforts with those of others in a sincere attempt to bring the relief that only Christ can give.

10. Is the $12,000,000 Budget of the Disciples of Christ for 1920 additional to the $3,000,000 Budget announced last fall?

No, it includes that.

11. Can anyone give to certain interests without helping others?

Yes, the right of designation is fully protected and there will be no leveling up process.

12. What is to be done with the money that goes to the Interchurch World Movement?

It will be distributed to the participating boards in proportion to the amounts they shall have received directly.

13. What is to be done to increase salaries of preachers?

The necessity of increased salaries for ministers is being demonstrated to every person who can be reached either by public addresses or by printed matter and advertisement.

14. How can we do it on such short notice?

By proceeding at once to organize and prepare the entire body of members and adherents any church can make a success of the enrollment of Stewards and Intercessors, the Win One Campaign for church membership and the financial campaign April 25 to May 2. It has to be done: there is no one else to do it: this is all the time we have!

Our Underpaid College Teachers

By H. O. PRITCHARD

WE are indebted to Mr. Royal Meeker, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor, for a special report on the topic of living costs. Much of the information presented by Mr. Meeker deals with the living costs of a family of five. These figures include only the necessities for health and decency and leave no margin for the books, travel, and tools necessary to a successful teacher. These figures are based on costs in the District of Columbia, which in many items are below those in other sections.

To maintain a family of five at an average level of health and decency, according to Mr. Meeker, requires an annual salary of $2,262.47. Commissioner Meeker says, "Inasmuch as the rent in the Washington, D. C., budget represents the amounts paid for small houses—six rooms—in the cheaper sections of the city, this moderate figure would hardly be considered a comfortable minimum level for university professors who are obliged to maintain a social standing above that required of the government clerk."

According to the Department of Labor, retail prices increased from December, 1914, to June, 1919, 74.47 per cent. Since that time they have jumped up to 87 per cent. We all agree that these are conservative figures. The Department of Labor demonstrates that in June, 1914, $836 would purchase as much as $1,459 in June, 1919. Thus a teacher's salary of $1,400 will now purchase much less than $900 did four years ago, and we are assured that a salary of $1,400 is far below the living wage for a family of five. Our teachers' salaries have been increased only a fractional part of the increased cost of living. Their salaries should be raised at once at least fifty per cent.

THE tax-supported institutions and large universities are meeting the present crisis by drastic action. The president of the University of Colorado was so alarmed at the flood of resignations from his faculty that he raised all salaries 35 per cent. With the Governor's consent he is running the university in debt for the full amount of the raise until the next meeting of the legislature. Montana University is doing the same. At Ohio State, President Thompson recently resigned, giving the following reason for so doing: That the faculty thought he was not trying to raise salaries, whereas he had tried and failed; that 95 per cent of his faculty were anxious to resign; that among the long list of resignations of the past two years there were fifty men whom he especially desired to keep; that he found it intolerable to remain the head of an institution whose morale had disappeared and whose confidence he had lost. His resignation was declined and the necessary remedy adopted. At Oberlin, the president recommended a 10 per cent increase but the faculty demanded 50 per cent and secured it. Northwestern granted a 20 per cent raise last September with a promise of a further increase of 25 per cent which shall be retroactive. Chicago has made an increase of 25 per cent with a promise of further increase next year. At the University of Nebraska, eleven teachers from one department have resigned since last September. Two weeks ago two undergraduate assistants resigned. One was getting $25 per month from the university as a fellowship. He accepted a position in the commercial world paying $7,200 a year. The other was getting $500 a year. He now receives in his new position $3,000 with a bonus of $2,000. A professor of the same department who is on leave is drawing $9,000 elsewhere. California, Leland Stanford, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri Universities have all greatly increased salaries.

WHAT shall we say of our church colleges and the Godly teachers in them? Their salaries have not been increased on an average of 20 per cent since the war began five years ago. At that time, their salaries were entirely inadequate. With the increased costs they find it impossible in many instances to stay longer at their posts. They are being offered large increases to go from our own colleges to state universities and other institutions of learning. The other day one of our best teachers who is getting only $1,600, with a family to support, was offered $2,500 to come to a state school. Another who receives $1,800 was offered $5,000 by a business corporation. The president of one of our colleges who is receiving $2,000 has been offered $6,000 to become the pastor of one of our churches. Many of our colleges are losing some of their most valuable teachers in the middle of this college year. We must awake to the situation. No such crisis has occurred in our colleges since our first college was organized. Our colleges actually face extinction unless money is forthcoming.

The budget proposed for the Disciples of Christ as their share of the Interchurch World Movement for this year is $12,000,000 and of this amount one-half, or $6,000,000, is for the endowment and maintenance of our colleges. The total tentative budget for our colleges over the period of the next five years is $30,000,000. These figures are not wild guesses—they are based on actual needs and even that large amount is not sufficient to raise our institutions to the standard of efficiency laid down by the Association of American Colleges, based on their present enrollment. It will take twice that amount to bring them where they ought to be. Our people have the money. It is not a question of having—it is a question of giving.

WITH the return of peace, the world turns to problems of construction and reconstruction greater and more difficult than the intricate problems of war. To the inherent difficulties of the problems of reconstruction are added the disturbing factors of social unrest and industrial and economic instability. All these complications but add emphasis to the fundamental need in this strategic hour, for men and women of broad training and thorough grounding in the underlying principles of American democracy and true religion. Educated Christian men and women are the world's greatest need today.

But if this be our need, we must have the prerequisites which certainly include an adequate and efficient teaching fraternity. Our Christian leaders of today were trained by the teachers of yesterday. It is not an overstatement of fact to declare that we stand in danger, just now, of having no teachers for the leaders of tomorrow. Our teachers, and especially those in church colleges, are being forced from their posts of duty by an entirely inadequate compensation, while those who do remain are suffering actual privations. This condition, if allowed to continue, will not only imperil America's educational structure but will leave the church leaderless a generation hence. This condition must be remedied at once by paying a living wage to these faithful servants of the church and the state if we are to remove the nation's greatest peril.

The New Field of the Disciples of Christ in Mexico

By EDWIN T. CORNELIUS

THE Psalmist says, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills: From whence cometh my help? My help cometh from Jehovah," and one cannot look in any direction in this new field of ours without being reminded of these beautiful words written about the native land of our Master. I doubt whether there is even one place in all of this beautiful district of Central Mexico where one is entirely out of sight of the mountains or foot-hills of the great central range that runs down through the republic. In every direction great majestic hills rise in the midst of immense prickly pear cactus and giant yucca palm trees. Here and there are fertile watered valleys, in which amazingly abundant crops of corn, wheat, beans, chili and scores of other kinds of food stuffs are raised. On every side one can see primitive water wheels lifting water from shallow wells in order to irrigate the fertile fields. Every wheel is being turned by one or two patient burros and the water being directed by a peon dressed picturesquely in cotton shirt and trousers and the immense sombrero of the central districts of the republic. He is either barefoot or wearing a kind of sandal called "guarachas." The towns and cities are almost a reproduction of the villages and cities of the Holy Land, with many modern advantages such as electric lights, water supplies, and in the larger towns either mule cars or electric railways.

The Heart of Mexico

This new territory for which we have accepted such definite responsibility is situated in almost the exact geographical center of the Republic of Mexico. A line drawn through the center in either direction would touch the district at some point. It could hardly be said to be the center of population since the City of Mexico lies to the southeast, and because of its great population shifts the center of population in that direction. We may say, almost as accurately, that we are in almost the center of the natural resources of the country, since every state in which we are to work contains immense resources of minerals and many splendid agricultural sections. Gold, silver, copper and other important minerals abound to a very marked degree, and some of the mines in San Luis Potosi and Zacatecas have produced fabulous quantities of gold and silver. Some of the largest smelters in the world are located in this district, and mines as yet entirely undeveloped are dotted over almost every part of the territory. Every hill, every mountain, is exceedingly rich in mineral resources, and every valley produces abundantly the necessities of life. I doubt whether there is a richer district than this in all the world, so far as resources are concerned.

There are about 50,000 square miles of territory in our field with a population of a little more than one million. Most of this population is grouped in villages and towns of more or less importance, since only an insignificant number of people are to be found living on farms or in isolation. This, of course, makes them much more accessible since in many of the communities, means of communication are very slow. However, the important towns and cities are connected by railroad, the territory being traversed from north to south by the two most important trunk lines of railroad in the republic, the old National lines and the old Central lines, the former the main line from the frontier at Laredo to Mexico City, and the latter from El Paso to Mexico City. In addition there is a branch line connecting the cities of San Luis Potosi and Aguascalientes, and various shorter branch lines connecting the trunk lines with mining and smelter centers. Direct train service from St. Louis, Missouri, to Mexico City is announced for the first of March, 1920, really being a resumption of the service of former years. After that date it will be possible to ride in a pullman, without change, from St. Louis to San Luis Potosi, the most important city in our territory. This makes the territory peculiarly accessible and important.

The States of Our New Field

The territory comprises the western half of the state of San Luis Potosi, the entire states of Aguascalientes and Zacatecas, and two small districts in the state of Jalisco. About one-half of this field lies north and the other half south of the Tropic of Cancer. While this is true, there is scarcely a single part of it in which the climate has even a suggestion of the tropics. Because of the high altitudes, the climate is quite temperate during almost all seasons of the year. The altitude varies from about 6,000 feet above the sea level at the city of San Luis Potosi, to 7,300 feet at the city of Zacatecas, and to approximately 9,000 feet at the mines of Catorce in northern San Luis Potosi. The climate is not so variable as that of most of the parts of the United States, there usually being pleasant days and cool nights, although some of the sections become rather cold in the middle of winter. Snow seldom falls except on the very highest regions, and because of the mildness of the weather, fruits and vegetables are abundant during most of the year.

THE state of San Luis Potosi has an entire population of about 600,000 and an area of 65,586 square kilometers, and something more than one-half the population, and approximately one-half the territory are to be found in the part we have received as our responsibility. The Sierra Madre mountains are the most prominent features of the country and their slopes are covered with immensely rich mines. The district of Catorce is renowned for its inexhaustible wealth of minerals. Some of the mines of the state have been operated for centuries, and still produce immense quantities of ore. Gold, silver, copper and lead are found in abundance at Salinas, and at Penon Blanco, a place a few miles away, there are valuable salt deposits, from which the greater part of the salt used in the republic is secured. The deposits are said to be from 70 to 80 per cent chloride of sodium. In the valleys where there is irrigation, the soil produces abundantly.

The state of Zacatecas has a population of 462,190 and an area of 63,386 square kilometers, and is one of the richest in minerals of the interior Mexican states. It is on the Great Central Plateau, one of the most mountainous regions of the republic. Agriculture has little importance in the state, but it is believed that the region around the capital city, Zacatecas, is one of the richest mineral belts in the entire world. The Sierra of Zacatecas has produced fabulous wealth in gold and silver, and smaller quantities of mercury, iron, copper, zinc, lead, coal, bismuth and salt. Recently the silver mines have begun to take on renewed activity, on account of the high price of the metal, and it is believed that the mining and smelting business will soon reach its former importance.

Aguascalientes is one of the smallest Mexican states, with a population of 10,500 and an area of 7,644 square kilometers. The climate is temperate, one of the most pleasant on the American continent. It is fertile, and is noted for its fine water and many springs. An almost infinite variety of foods and fruits are grown in the state, and there are also many mines of wealth, as well as one of the very largest smelters of the American Smelting and Refining Company, which is located a few kilometers from the city of Aguascalientes. The small districts of Jalisco that are in our fields are much similar to the surrounding territory of Zacatecas and Aguascalientes.

The population of these districts is perhaps more stable than the population of the frontier states, although at the present time there is quite a large immigration to the United States on account of the good wages that are being offered by ranchmen, railroad companies, and other interests.

Like the Athenians, "Very Religious"

They are extremely religious, and in many communities, especially the isolated ones, are fanatically so. One of the most fanatical places in the republic is to be found in a small community in one of our districts of the state of Jalisco. There are two annual fiestas there, in honor of the Virgin of San Juan de los Lagos, and they are just now, the first of February, closing one of these fiestas. In making a trip to Mexico City a few days ago, I found the train crowded with hundreds of pilgrims. From the train could be seen crowds of people, walking, riding burros, or in some primitive means of transportation, on their way, having to carry provisions and bedding for their stay in the village. Many, especially women, will walk on their bare knees for miles before reaching the little town, and everywhere are seen penitents striving to win the favor of the Virgin. Whenever these people, illiterate for the most part, really have a chance to hear the gospel, they become faithful followers of the Christ. Education has been very poor in all of these sections, although there have been some excellent institutions in different places. The State Normal of Zacatecas has been one of the best in the republic, and the Christian schools that have fallen to our heritage, and which we are now conducting with splendid interest, have done much to awaken these people to the need for true education, and almost every day people come to us with the desire that their children shall have the advantage of the best training that can be secured. We cannot but wonder whether any commercial organization would turn away customers, rather than enlarge its equipment and staff to satisfy their wants. Why should not the Church of Christ be just as enterprising?

The missionaries commissioned to work down here, are facing the task with hope, and with confidence that as the great body of the Disciples of Christ recognize the leadership of the blessed Master, they will hear the call of this rich field, rich in material resources, as yet little developed, but especially rich, abundant in life, almost entirely undeveloped. There are some small scattered groups of evangelical Christian people, and they form the nucleus of the large work we hope by the leadership of Christ to do. The mission is suffering greatly because of the shortage of workers, both missionaries and native workers. May we not pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into His harvest? "Whence cometh our help? Our help cometh from Jehovah."

Rosebud

ISN'T that a pretty name for a little girl? That is not her real name, but we will call her Rosebud because it fits her so well. She is the happiest child you ever saw, and promises to grow to be a very beautiful woman.

Three years ago a mother died, leaving her three little girls, ages three, five, and seven, in the care of the crippled father. Since he was not able to care for them, he brought them to one of the homes of the National Benevolent Association. He did not kiss them when he went away. The children did not know the meaning of kindness and were dirty, timid, and afraid. They did not know what a bathtub was, and were very much afraid each time they were placed in one.

The littlest one of these girls was Rosebud, although no one thought of calling her that when she came. She could not walk nor talk, and had never run about in the house and in the yard peering into every corner as babies do. She did not even know how happy one can be over a Christmas present. In fact, during her three short years she had known nothing but want and pain.

The kind woman in charge of the home feared that infantile paralysis had caused the baby's condition, so she took her to three baby specialists. Each one said after a careful examination, "A pure case of starvation. She can't walk because she has no strength. Feed her." And feed her they did, every three or four hours. Five weeks later Rosebud took her first steps. At the end of two months she was going up and down stairs alone, although still far from strong. But after six months of this tender care and careful feeding she was able to run and play as well as the other children.

Rosebud was very fond of music, and everyone was surprised to note how fast she would learn a tune. She would often ask someone to play the "Bictrola" and then would be able to hum or sing what she had just heard.

One day some people came to the home and saw how strong and healthy Rosebud had become. They decided at once that they wanted to adopt her, so now she is very happy in her new home.

Rosebud's sisters have also been very happy. The five-year-old has also grown into a sturdy, rosy little girl, with even more talent for singing than the baby possessed. She has also been adopted and is quite happy in her new home. Her foster parents have made every provision for her future care and training, including a college education.

The oldest sister, now nine years of age, is still in the Association's home. She has grown and changed so much that no one would recognize her as the half-starved little girl who came to the home over two years ago.

The National Benevolent Association is helping hundreds of babies to become just as strong and happy as Rosebud and her sisters.

Little Journeys in the Land of Tomorrow

By DR. PAUL H. STEVENSON

(The first installment of this interesting narrative appeared in February World Call*)*

II.

IF I were asked to state the one essential qualification of a successful missionary in China I would probably pass by godliness, spirituality, education, common sense, health and many other seemingly important attributes of character and place the crown on the lowly head of "patience." Not having learned the lesson of patiently waiting, many a man has returned home suffering from nervous prostration, and many another has filled a premature grave upon the stone of which might be inscribed the words, "Here lies the man who tried to hustle the East." My plans for this particular day included making over half the journey to Luchowfu, but I soon learned that Providence had other plans for me and had enrolled me in the hard school of experience for instruction in this very important matter of patience.

I arose shortly before daylight with all the zest of a small boy who had slept with his clothes on in order to get up early enough to see the circus come into town and unload. My ardor was only partly dampened by the rain outside, so, in spite of the advice of my host to wait over a day or two, I made my way down to the boat landing to hire a boat. There my ardor was completely dampened, in fact it might be said that it was soaked. In the face of a moderately strong west wind that was blowing, not a boatman could be found willing to start across the lake. I next pinned my faith to a horse that had been sent from Luchowfu for me to use in case I should strike adverse winds and couldn't get across the lake. Like the pig that wouldn't jump over the sty, I found that the horseman refused to travel until the sun had come out and dried up the roads. Chair bearers were equally obdurate even though it had stopped raining and was rapidly clearing up. All I had to do was to wait, and yet waiting seemed to be the hardest thing that I had ever been called upon to do in all my life. My patience was poured in the crucible and found to be pretty poor stuff. The calm indifference of the boatmen as they speculated upon a change in the wind in three or four days, the evident satisfaction of the chair coolies as they viewed the prospect of several days of lounging and drinking, the unsympathetic consolation of my host as he talked of a four or five days' wait in China with as little concern as if he were speaking of a four or five minutes' wait for a Broadway street car, all contributed to an almost complete annihilation of my nervous energy. I became convinced that Job had never spent a day on the banks of old Chow Lake, merely waiting for the wind to change from west to east.

The afternoon found me sufficiently humble to look around, and I discovered many things of interest in this beautiful little city. Our own mission had at one time picked this place for a station and there still remain some of the evidences of valuable pioneer work done by Mr. and Mrs. Titus. Now, after many years of hard work, another group of missionaries are just beginning to enter into the reward of a harvest. A beautiful new hospital, and a church building just in the process of construction, stand today as tangible results of their labors.

The next morning, as the west wind was still blowing, we finally persuaded the horseman to travel and decided to start out overland. The first day's journey would be over the mountains, which meant good roads for one day at least. About seven o'clock we were off. Four of us—a coolie carrying my bedding and other baggage, his majesty the horseman, the horse, and myself.

Piercing the Flesh Is a Favorite Device Among Chinese Beggars for Arousing Sympathy

This was my first experience with one of these small Chinese horses. The qualifying adjective "Chinese" before the word horse denotes certain marked characteristics of gait, speed, habits, and temperament that clearly differentiate him from all the other species of horse on earth. These horses are used in China almost exclusively for carrying rice and, apart from the long trains of twenty or thirty in a row walking slowly across the country carrying their loads of grain, they are seldom seen. In China also any distinction between horses, mules, and donkeys, is practically lost, especially in the type of pack animal used in this part of the country. This one that I was on, for instance, was a sort of "three in one" animal, with a tail like a horse, ears like a donkey, and a temperament like a mule. Taken out of that old familiar train of donkeys and put on the road alone, he was lost in a bewilderment that caused him to frequently pause and reflect. Walking alone, his whole world was chaotic and the lifetime habit of following another animal almost totally incapacitated him for traveling by himself. Considerable time had elapsed and the distance that we had traveled could best be calculated in yards, when the psychology of the situation dawned upon me. Although I was at a loss to know how to supply a complete line of donkeys or even to imitate one, yet I realized that something would have to be done if I were to catch up with my bedding in time to sleep on it that night. So I dismounted and did the best I could to supply the defect by walking ahead myself. The result was magical. With his nose almost boring into the small of my back, that pony followed with a constancy and faithfulness that was really pathetic. My own shadow could have done no better. Every alteration in my speed, from a slow walk to a run was faithfully duplicated by my friend behind me. The method had its advantages; we were at least getting on. Shortly before noon we caught up with the coolie and the horseman and, because I strongly suspected the latter gentleman of playing a trick on me, I insisted upon him playing the part of pacemaker for my steed at such times as I chose to ride.

The trip of that day over those beautiful hills will never be forgotten. The latter part of the morning found us entering the gap toward which we had been traveling for several hours. Something of the spirit of the mountains seemed to catch me as I climbed higher and higher. Within every man there exists somewhere a primitive chord, beyond the reach of ordinary stimuli, but never failing to vibrate when touched by the solemn grandeur of the treasures of Nature.

ANY elevation of ground, from the smallest knoll to the highest mountain peak, is assured of a respectful reverence in the superstitious hearts of the Chinese people. The spirits of the air, especially the "feng shuei," or spirit of the wind and the water, can more easily be approached and influenced from elevated places and the people are very careful that these high places are not defamed by anything displeasing to the spirits. Not only would a foreigner be absolutely prohibited from building upon such an elevation, but if a foreign building should happen to be built near to a sacred knoll the building would either be carefully restricted as to height or the knoll would be built still higher to maintain its influence over the spirits that control the destinies of the neighborhood.

High hills and mountains are therefore favorite sites for temples, and these hills through which I was riding were dotted with temples and shrines. Most of these temples speak of the glory of a day gone by. All are in a state of decay, and many are merely piles of ruins. Columns and arches now but heaps of sand, statues fallen from their pedestals, tablets with their inscriptions mouldering away, all are the retreating footsteps of false gods. Even time itself could not make them true, nor etch their truths within the hearts of men, and now they are fast fading into fable. Disappointed with the old, turning from the gods of wood and stone, this country is calling loudly and persistently for the Living God, whose temples are not made by hand and whose word shall not pass away.

ONE of the most interesting features of this part of my journey were the old stone roads that wind up, around and across these hills. Built long ago by pious emperors, their stones have for hundreds of years been worn smoother and smoother by the footsteps of pilgrims to these temples. No ordinary stone roads are these. Great blocks of stone, some of them fifteen feet long by four or five feet wide stretch on and on as far as the eye can see. Stone bridges that have seen the passing of centuries still remain intact, sometimes far removed from the fickle stream that has sought and found a new bed. Although built primarily to lead to the temples, these roads have also served as the main highways of travel. The people have come to depend upon them greatly and they are probably destined to remain a very poor substitute for railroads for many years yet to come. Gathered to these roads—strung along them like beads on a string—are small clusters of mud houses more or less at regular intervals. Throughout the afternoon while making the descent into the valley my eye was continually following the well-marked road ahead of me—the string of beads—until it became frayed out and lost to view in the plain below. Somewhere out in that great expanse of level country lay Luchowfu, the end of my journey. During the descent I had plenty of time to study the scene which spread out before me. This indeed was real China. All that I had ever read or heard about the appearance of this country came to my mind as I looked upon it with my own eyes. Thickly scattered villages, countless graves, small fields, intense cultivation, canals and quaint boats, wayside shrines—all lay before me. The most striking feature of the landscape was the great number and the perfect regularity of the small fields, each very distinctly outlined by the narrow green ridge which separated it from its neighbor. The whole picture was dominated by these small squares and suddenly it dawned upon me that I was in reality looking upon an enormous chess board.

In the Orient Men and Women Are Still Employed as Beasts of Burden. Note the Tiny Feet of the Woman

An enormous chess board indeed—and across this board the great European nations have for the past one hundred and fifty years played their game of chess, using the Chinese people as the pawns. Back and forth they have moved, now and then with arms, but more often with secret treaty, each move capturing some new concession from the helpless "old man of the East," each play ending in some addition to the ever enlarging "sphere of interest." The beginning of the great war found England, the master chess player of world diplomacy, the economic ruler of all Central China; Germany, having more recently entered the game, making winning moves toward dominating the rich coast provinces in the north; France playing a losing game in the south, and Russia, thoroughly beaten since her last great war, trying hard to get out of the game in the northern border provinces. Immediately after the beginning of the war, however, the relative positions changed. A new player, emerging from several years of quiet and studious observation, suddenly jumped into the game and began to play with such dashing quickness and precision that even England is showing very visible signs of worry. The Japanese style of play seems to differ somewhat from the old methods, and is not considered to be absolutely in accord with the standards of honor, the honor that is said to exist among thieves. With clever moves and quick, Japan has not only already taken possession of all the former German interests in Shantung, but is also showing a complete disregard for treaties and other "scraps of paper" concerning England's priority of rights in Central China. Politically, Japan is already the master of China, but she is striving by fair means or foul for what to her is the more important mastery, namely, the economic control of China's vast resources. In reality Japan is but a dwarf endeavoring to stand on the shoulders of the giant China. From this vantage point she will be able to maintain a semblance of a great nation. Once the giant decides to rid himself of the burden, however, and raises his head and straightens his back, the dwarf will probably fall to the earth and assume his true position among the nations of the world.

Soon we reached the bottom of the slope and the level plain. My mind dismissed international chess playing, dwarfs, giants and the like, and centered all its attention upon something more immediate. The object that succeeded in occupying all my attention was mud, just plain mud. Mud! Mud! Mud! Black mud, yellow mud, red mud, a veritable sea of mud with mud houses here and there as islands and mud-colored water buffaloes as ships of state. Even the muddy road was entirely out of sight and the actual problems of travel, or should I not say of navigation, were considerable. Although the setting did not lend itself to much musing of the spirit or contemplation of sublime and lofty things, still my mind was far from idle. Each muddy moment was filled with sixty seconds of exhaustive research into the various properties of mud. Its physical composition, consistency, viscosity, temperature, as well as its color, odor, taste, and stickability were all studied in detail. Having come from Missouri, I had egotistically supposed that there was very little about mud that I did not already know, but the experiences of that day humbled me, and from that time forward I have harbored a respectful reverence for that wonderful thing called "mud." Never again will I scoff at the mud walls and bricks of the Chinese houses. Verily they are built with a most wonderful substance, and, if the samples that I carried away on my clothes can be considered as at all typical, the Chinese have selected their building material with some idea of permanency in mind.

The Chinese have no speed limits. But even if they had, we probably would not have broken any that afternoon and evening. About dark it started to rain again and we decided that we would stop at the next group of houses and try to find a sleeping place rather than try to push on to our intended stopping place. It was nearly eight o'clock when we reached a bunch of buildings large enough to afford the possibility of a place to sleep. After some searching and questioning, we were directed to a small deserted temple somewhat removed from the rest of the buildings, and with many a flourish and flounder we waded to its door.

Dr. Paul H. Stevenson

The arrangement of this temple was typical of all the Chinese temples, and, upon entering the main doorway, we found ourselves in the large front court. Along either side of the court were the customary broken down stalls, formerly used to exhibit the various stages of the Chinese conception of Hell. Because of my deep suspicions regarding the horseman's actions earlier in the day, I took special pleasure in consigning him to this part of the temple for the night. The coolie and myself stepped into a room about fifteen by twenty, containing the rotting remains of some wooden idols. Upon the floor of this room, I could dimly make out many long rolls of variously colored cloth mixed up more or less at random with the straw. These rolls were practically all of a size, about five or six feet long, and so close together that it was all but impossible to walk about. It was only after my coolie began to kick a couple of these rolls rather vigorously and I saw them begin to squirm, that I realized that each roll contained a sleeping Chinese. Closer inspection revealed the top of a head here and there, but not a face could I see. The Chinese do not care for these new electrically heated sleeping bags that we read about now days, but they have for a long time used hot air heated sleeping bags, the hot air being supplied by their breath, which is carefully collected and kept inside the bag all night.

After considerable kicking, actual on the part of my coolie and figurative on the part of those kicked, a space large enough to spread my bedding was finally made. There I undid my roll of bedding, slightly damp in spite of the oil cloth that had been around it, and prepared to make my bed for the night. While in the process, I noticed that my nearest neighbor had become thoroughly awake and upon noticing that I was a "foreign teacher" had raised himself to a sitting posture. The usual polite questions about name, age, occupation, and destination asked and answered, he became very solicitous about me and insisted upon sharing his bedding with me. In answer to this proposal I assured him that I was entirely unworthy and that he was altogether too polite, and besides I asserted that I had plenty of bedding of my own. Immediately upon rolling up in my bedding, however, I felt him stealthily put his sheep skin coat over me and press it firmly around my head. I was quite at a loss to know just what appropriate response this action called for. While lying quite still and pondering the subject, something small detached itself from the fur of my newly acquired cover and beginning in the region of my ear began to travel across my face and down toward my neck. At first I thought that the fur of the garment was playing me a trick and I merely shifted it a bit. A sharp, stinging, unmistakable bite on my neck, however, quickly cleared my mind of any doubts as to the proper thing to do in regard to the garment. I decided that as a matter of principle, I simply could not afford to be outdone in such a vital thing as courtesy, so, after a quick and decisive execution of him that had assailed me, I returned the garment with such insistence that the owner finally accepted it.

The next morning we awoke to find it still raining. However, there being no prospects of finding any food in our present abode, we started out as soon as it was light enough to travel. Almost immediately upon leaving our little group of buildings, we found a row of eighteen heavily loaded wheelbarrows all stuck in the mud. Our friends with whom we had spent the night were the men who had been navigating these wheelbarrows through the sea of mud until they could go no farther. All through the morning we pressed on, and, as was true of the afternoon before, we had plenty of time and opportunity to continue our researches along the line of mud.

Shortly before noon we arrived in a good sized village and decided to stop and eat. We found a very clean looking eating place about half way along the long narrow street and went in. This house was also the home of a flourishing family of pigs as well as the usual dog or two and several chickens. In the midst of these friends, we sat down and made out our order for dinner from the array of salt duck, duck's gizzards, pig's livers, kidneys, duodenums, ileums, and other customary anatomical fragments hanging around the room on rafters and pegs. After making a tasty selection, we sat in pleasant anticipation and watched the cook prepare our meal. The cook was evidently not in a very amiable mood this day and gave several exhibitions of his authority over the pigs and dogs that were wont to run around and between his legs. Several times during the preparation of our meal he reached out and struck a particularly obstreperous as well as dirty hog with the meat cleaver or butcher knife, and, after repeated blows would have driven the culprit out of range, the instrument of torture would revert to its humble office of chopping our food. Fortunately I had already discovered several months previously that the so-called "germ theory" that doctors in western lands spend so much time talking about and their patients spend so much time worrying about, does not operate in China. Therefore I was not unduly alarmed at this questionable though admirably versatile use of the culinary implements, and when the food was finally set before us I took up the bamboo chop sticks and ate with zeal. At the time of this writing, several weeks later, I am still living and enjoying perfect health.

The country ahead of us, partly because it had received less rain and partly because it was higher, afforded better roads and we were able to travel much faster. Village after village we passed. The road, on account of the increasing travel, became wider and firmer. We found ourselves at times joining quite a procession of travelers and I knew that we were drawing near to Luchowfu. Now we would pass a large coffin being carried by a dozen or more men, and then again we would find ourselves traveling in the wake of a brilliantly red bridal chair. Coming from the city we would meet long lines of men carrying on their long poles the empty cases that had gone to the city in the morning full of bean curd. Again we would meet simple peasant families, returning with their baskets full of town purchases, prominent always the bundles of incense. Upon either side of the road was to be seen ancestral worship at the graves. Hundreds of people offering food, burning paper money and incense for the spirits of the departed. At certain of the wayside shrines the travelers would stop, kneel, bow three times to the ground, and rise and light their pipes from the burning incense and pass on. Almost without exception the people were very friendly to me and the afternoon passed swiftly and pleasantly.

About four o'clock in the afternoon of the fifth day out of Nanking I caught my first glimpse of the gates of the city of Luchowfu. A little later the city wall itself became visible above the level plain, and my pony quickened his pace. With quickening pulse I soon made out the roof of the hospital and near by the roofs of three foreign homes, all of them just inside the city wall and near the south gate of the city. Here was garrisoned a brave little band of volunteers, holding one of the outposts of God's Kingdom. For a long time they had been hoping and praying for reinforcements, and I was coming. Would I be worthy to take my place among them? Would I be able to be an answer to their call? As I entered the city I prayed God that through His power it might be so.

What Constitutes Overchurching?

THE definition of what constitutes overchurching, or overlapping, is difficult to give. The elements of a right definition appear to be three:

1. The ratio of the churches to the population. In most cases of thickly settled communities one church to every one thousand of the population is deemed sufficient.

2. The ratio of the churches to the preferences of the people. Convictions must be taken into account, and yet there is a point at which opinions must yield to the social principle of concession and cooperation for the sake of the social good.

3. A community destined to have a large increase of population may, at a given moment, have more churches than the population at that moment warrants.

Plan your career with an international horizon. Do not hastily conclude that you should stay where you are, or follow now a course determined upon five years ago. Be a patriot but not a narrow nationalist: the new idealism has taught us that humanity is greater than nationality. Think in world terms, decide on the basis of world welfare, and be not daunted if duty calls you to a distant goal.—From "Somewhere in All the World," by President Charles T. Paul.

Are the Disciples Christians?

NINETEEN hundred years ago those of Antioch were called Christians because they were. Eighteen centuries later a few earnest souls in America undertook to restore the church of Antioch (and Jerusalem) in unity, purity and liberty; in teaching, ordinance and life. The number, wealth and influence of these modern Disciples of Christ has grown amazingly. Can our impartial neighbors say as much for our Christian character?

Profession and Performance

The Apostle Paul referred to the church members of his day as "saints," and that is one of the terms our pioneers of blessed memory sought to restore. But we have generally refrained from using it. Because of its restriction and diversion by the Roman Catholics? Possibly. But is it not chiefly because we know we are not true to the New Testament type? Instead of being separated from the world and devoted to God's service, "transformed by the renewing of our minds," are we not carefully "conformed to this world"?

The saints at Jerusalem were distinguished for the "gladness and singleness of heart" of their daily life. Is it commonly remarked by our neighbors that we radiate happiness?

Even after the days of the apostles the constant testimony of their neighbors was, "Behold how these Christians love one another!" In a fine measure it was so fifty and seventy-five years ago of many a rural Antioch, Mt. Olive and Oak Grove. Does the condition prevail today outside a few missions?

Of the Macedonians Paul said, "Beyond their power they gave of their own accord," and to the Corinthians, "I know your readiness, of which I glory to them of Macedonia." Considering Paul's standard of giving would he not count our efforts to bring a few of our people up to tithing as scarcely a kindergarten start toward Philippi or Corinth, much less Jerusalem, where "not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own"?

We hold the right view of the Lord's day, but do we excel in its reverent observance? In theory we have restored the weekly observance of the Lord's supper, but do not the majority of our members practice only quarterly, annual or occasional communion? We insist upon New Testament baptism in requiring previous confession of faith in Christ and complete immersion of the person in water, but can we show an unusual percentage "rising to walk in newness of life"? We plead justly and eloquently for Christian union and magnify the Savior's intercessory prayer, but are we celebrated for a brotherly spirit toward our fellow Christians whom we exhort to unite?

An Amazing Opportunity

In all reason the confident expectation of Thomas Campbell that there would be a general and prompt acceptance of the scriptural basis of union should have been realized. We can no longer ascribe the failure to prejudice or misrepresentation. Even an ordinary century would have overcome these. But the past hundred years have been extraordinarily hard upon bigotry and misconception; and what their attrition had not destroyed the war has obliterated or broken past repair.

Today the doors are open, as surely as the prison gates at Philippi stood ajar after the earthquake. Will we enter? Can we refuse? Only once in a thousand years is mankind reduced to such a fluid state. The mold into which it is run today will determine its character for centuries to come.

Many who see the bigness of the hour are crying for a mighty leader, a superman. Some confidently expect the immediate bodily return of the Christ.

It is the presence of Christ that must prevail. But the body of that presence is the Church which He purchased with His blood. It is not by one mighty leader—Luther, Wesley, Campbell—but by millions of ordinary folk, filled and transformed by Christ's spirit in extraordinary power, that the new age can be saved, with joy to the world and glory to God.

The motto of Napoleon was, "The tools to him that can use them." That is the watchword of this new age. If the Disciples of Christ had been such Christians as they should, actually establishing model churches of Christ and living the life of Christ in their several communities, ours would have been the pre-eminent privilege of reuniting the church and leading in the world's redemption. Now it is a question whether we shall bear our proportionate part or even a considerable share. God's hour has struck and will not wait.

Revolution by Redemption

This is not an opportunity for distinction, but a call to humiliation and service; thanksgiving to God that He has spared our unprofitable lives and complete consecration to doing His will henceforth. This is as revolutionary as anything proposed by the I. W. W. and Bolsheviki; only it is revolution by redemption instead of destruction. But it must be marked by as passionate earnestness and self-sacrifice as fires their misguided souls.

The demon that possesses the world today—the world in the Church as well as that outside—"cometh not out except by prayer and fasting"; prayer that is blood-letting in its earnestness, fasting that is not formal, but due to giving, like the widow of Jerusalem, "even all our living." Missionaries and preachers and other rare saints here and there are already throwing capital as well as income into the conflict of the hour.

Week by week the surveys of the Interchurch World Movement are making new revelations of the need of men and money, of prayer and consecration, in American townships and foreign kingdoms. But why wait for these figures? The daily papers reek with the records of selfish strife, and side by side with them present mercantile advertisements that index prodigal spending as regardless of impending doom as was the dancing of Pompeii and Herculaneum. And are not Disciples of Christ full participants in this orgy of extravagance?

As John Wesley saved England from a revolution that would have more than matched that of France, by living as well as preaching personal religion and practical holiness, so must millions of men and women today save America and China, England and Japan, France and Africa, South America and India, Mexico and Russia. None but actual Christians can do it.

Are the Disciples of Christ Christians? Are we even disciples of Christ and so in a hopeful way of becoming Christians? Not our words but our lives must tell.

A glorious affirmative is coming! The two thousand who made pledges of from five hundred to one million dollars each in the Men and Millions Movement were not different from the rest of us. This was demonstrated in the War Emergency Drive. The Peace Emergency is so much greater in its requirements that our whole strength must be called out to meet it. Yea, since our strength is not sufficient, but God's is, we will go "beyond our power," like the saints of Philippi.

"To Him That Hath"

LEFT at the age of twelve by the death of his father to assist his mother in bringing up his younger brothers and sisters, James H. Mohorter fulfilled his first trust so well that other tasks came to him in rapid succession.

Along with them he pursued his education until he graduated from Hiram College and entered fully upon his life work as a minister of the gospel.

The notable success of his work in Cleveland caused him to be drafted for the more difficult Boston field. When success was just in hand after six years of grueling labor there he was compelled to go to Colorado in the vain hope of saving his wife from tuberculosis. In spite of her affliction and death the church at Pueblo prospered under his hand.

With four orphan children of his own the Executive Committee of the National Benevolent Association at St. Louis rightly felt that he would bring heart as well as head and hand to the leadership of that enterprise of mercy.

James H. Mohorter

Here there have been fourteen years of steady progress. Having been faithful with eight institutions five more have been added to those dependent upon the National Benevolent Association for maintenance and direction. Having done well in the care of 376 orphans and aged the number was increased to 536, with other hundreds waiting to be admitted. Having administered wisely and justly annual receipts of $91,794.76 the brotherhood last year entrusted him with $445,699.22. Having proved a faithful steward of $282,321.60 worth of property the value of the Association's holdings was increased to $931,369.91. Having done so well apart, the National Benevolent Association and Mr. Mohorter were taken into the Men and Millions Movement and allotted $200,000 of its capital fund. Once in the Movement the disciplined power and impartial devotion which he brought to every duty assigned him soon made him a team leader.

The same law has operated in his home also and he has had the joy of seeing three of his children graduated from his Alma Mater and start well on lives of usefulness in the Kingdom of God. But "lest he be exalted overmuch," twice more his heart has been broken: first by the death of Miriam, just as she was going to Hiram College, and then by the going of the children's second mother, who never recovered from the loss of Miriam.

His own sorrows have but redoubled the energy with which he has sought to enlist all the people of God in assuaging the sorrows of others. The Interchurch World Movement he recognized as inspired of God to the same great end. So he was more than ready to have his growing work linked up with it to be multiplied by it.

In the organization of the part which the Disciples of Christ are to take in the Interchurch Movement Mr. Mohorter was named with Mrs. Atwater to represent the United Christian Missionary Society (of which the National Benevolent Association is a unit) on the Promotional Committee. When that committee, completed by the Education Board's appointment of H. O. Pritchard and J. C. Todd and the joint election of C. H. Winders, looked for a secretary, its other members could see no one but James H. Mohorter, fountain of enthusiasm, dynamo of energy, genius of organization. So, in spite of his own vigorous protests of modesty and his Board's earnest pleas of crucial tasks just started, the divine law had to operate again.

Then Mr. Lyman L. Pierce, director of the entire financial campaign of the churches cooperating in the Interchurch World Movement, said, "If Mr. Mohorter is to lead the Disciples of Christ in this great enterprise, I want him to come to New York and be a member of my cabinet while he directs the campaign from this center." This is especially noteworthy when it is known that Mr. Pierce had previously planned to name an outside financial expert to serve the Disciples of Christ.

All possible emphasis should be added to the statement of fact that James H. Mohorter is a man of God. He was so dedicated from his infancy. As a young man overwhelming conviction of God's will caused him to leave the church of his fathers and take fellowship with the Disciples of Christ. Only God's call could have made him a minister and only the conscious and clear sense of God's direction has been allowed to govern and control each choice and change of his life.

Tender-hearted even to hair-trigger sensitiveness, he is yet hard-headed and sure-footed. He had to be sure that the Interchurch Movement was of God and that the Disciples of Christ, the National Benevolent Association, the Union Avenue Christian Church and he, J. H. Mohorter, were duty bound to bear full part in it, before he would commit himself to it. Being in, he is in altogether. The curse that visits the lukewarm will never fall upon his head.

Yet no sense of personal or institutional loyalty will ever cause him for a moment to surrender his own judgment or stifle his conscience. He had to see every figure of that great $12,000,000 budget for 1920 justified by bleeding necessity before he consented to its inclusion though he had not dreamed of being campaign director or even a member of the Promotional Committee. The dollar that goes out to serve God must be ordained with the same care that is given to choosing and consecrating a missionary of the cross.

Brethren, those who know J. H. Mohorter best, and God, who knows him better than we can, know that having been faithful in all these things, through all these years, he can be relied upon to do God's will in humanity's service this year of grace 1920, and to the full measure of all we would give to God!

A Paramount Essential

ONE of our strongest missionaries, who is in a very distant and difficult land, recently wrote as follows in a personal letter to one of the Board secretaries:

"There are a great many forces, both of head and heart, needed in mission work. Among these there is one force which is indispensable—a passionate love for the person of Christ. If I were on a mission board I would ask the candidate one question at least: 'Do you love the Lord Jesus Christ Himself with a passion?' The one who can honestly answer that question in the affirmative has the power which every missionary needs. A passionate love for Christ is that which constrains and sustains the missionary in his work. In school we talk about sin and holiness as if they existed in the 'clear blue' apart from human life; but when we get to work, sinners and saints are the realities with which we have to deal. We can consider sin as a term without much feeling; but when face to face with the man who stole our only cow or the man who killed his own wife, a tremendous feeling grips us. The missionary finds when he begins his work that it is not with sin he has to deal, but with a real, live sinner. It is not sin he hates, but the sinner—the man who stole the cow, and the man who killed his own wife. He will find that he is only deceiving himself when he says that he hates sin, but loves the sinner. He cannot deceive the natives. They can tell at a glance who it is that loves them. Under such circumstances the missionary must have a strong feeling that will suppress that feeling of hate before it gets a start. A passionate devotion to the person of Christ is just the feeling that is needed under such conditions. A deep love for Christ fills the missionary's life with a loveliness which is similar to the beauty and attractiveness of Christ Himself. Pray for us, my friend, that we may keep close to Christ, and love Him supremely."

United Churches of Christ in America

By H. C. ARMSTRONG

[Christian Union is coming as certainly as Prohibition has arrived. As many factors are now working toward the one end as there were contributing to the other. The Disciples of Christ are here what the Prohibition Party and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were there; with this difference, that our chief objective is the evangelization of the world and the unity of God's people is sought as a necessary means to that end. The plan proposed at Philadelphia deserves careful consideration and is especially hopeful in its frank avowal of organic union as the end toward which a step is proposed. Of course none need take that step who are not convinced both that Christian Union is desirable and that this plan will contribute toward its realization.—Editors of World Call.]

THE union of the evangelical churches of the United States is now a definite and practical possibility. At least such is the deep conviction of those who attended the Council on the Organic Union of the Evangelical Churches held at Philadelphia, February 3-6. After more than a year of earnest labor the Ad Interim Committee appointed for the purpose presented a plan of union which was heartily endorsed and adopted by the Council and which will go now to the conventions, assemblies and conferences of all the evangelical churches for consideration and ratification. The Council was attended by about one hundred and twenty-five delegates from nineteen or twenty religious bodies. The bodies represented are the Armenian, Christian, Christian Union, Congregational, Disciples of Christ, Evangelical Synod, Friends, Methodist Primitive, Methodist Episcopal, Moravian, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Reformed Episcopal, Reformed Church, United Brethren, United Presbyterian, Welsh Presbyterian, and some others. The delegates of the Disciples of Christ present were C. M. Chilton, W. F. Rothenburger, George A. Miller, B. A. Abbott, E. B. Bagby, F. W. Burnham, J. H. Goldner, Finis S. Idleman, B. H. Linville, B. H. Melton, H. D. C. Maclachlan, Dr. J. C. Lumpkin, C. C. Morrison, R. E. Elmore, T. E. Winter, H. L. Willett, I. S. Chenoweth, F. J. Longdon, Jr., Peter Ainslie and H. C. Armstrong.

The plan of union as finally adopted is as follows:

PREAMBLE—

Whereas, We desire to share, as a common heritage, the faith of the Christian Church, which has, from time to time, found expression in great historic statements; and

Whereas, We all share belief in God our Father; in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Savior; in the Holy Spirit, our Guide and Comforter; in the Holy Catholic Church, through which God's eternal purpose of salvation is to be proclaimed and the Kingdom of God is to be realized on earth; in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as containing God's revealed will, and in the life eternal; and

Whereas, Having the same spirit and owning the same Lord, we none the less recognize diversity of gifts and ministrations, for whose exercise due freedom must always be afforded in forms of worship and in modes of operation:

PLAN:

Now, we the churches hereto assenting, as hereinafter provided in Article VI, do hereby agree to associate ourselves in a visible body to be known as the "United Churches of Christ in America," for the furtherance of the redemptive work of Christ in the world. This body shall exercise in behalf of the constituent churches the functions delegated to it by this instrument, or by subsequent action of the constituent churches, which shall retain the full freedom at present enjoyed by them in all matters not so delegated.

Accordingly, the churches hereto assenting and hereafter thus associated in such visible body do mutually covenant and agree as follows:

I. Autonomy in Purely Denominational Affairs.

In the interest of the freedom of each and of the cooperation of all, each constituent church reserves the right to retain its creedal statements, its form of government in the conduct of its own affairs, and its particular mode of worship:

In taking this step, we look forward with confident hope to that complete unity toward which we believe the Spirit of God is leading us. Once we shall have cooperated wholeheartedly, in such visible body, in the holy activities of the work of the Church, we are persuaded that our differences will be minimized and our union become more vital and effectual.

II. The Council (How Constituted).

The United Churches of Christ in America shall act through a Council and through such Executive and Judicial Commissions, or Administrative Boards, working ad interim, as such Council may from time to time appoint and ordain.

The Council shall convene as provided for in Article VI and every second year thereafter. It may also be convened at any time in such manner as its own rules may prescribe. The Council shall be a representative body.

Each constituent church shall be entitled to representation therein by an equal number of ministers and laymembers.

The basis of representation shall be: two ministers and two laymembers for the first one hundred thousand or fraction thereof of its communicants; and two ministers and two laymembers for each additional one hundred thousand or major fraction thereof.

III. The Council (Its Working).

The Council shall adopt and promulgate its own by-laws and rules of procedure and order. It shall define the functions of its own officers, prescribe the mode of their selection and their compensation, if any. It shall provide for its budget of expense by equitable apportionments of the same among the constituent churches through their supreme governing or advisory bodies.

IV. Relation of Council and Constituent Churches.

The supreme governing or advisory bodies of the constituent churches shall effectuate the decisions of the Council by general or specific deliverance or other mandate whenever it may be required by the law of a particular state, or the charter of a particular board, or other ecclesiastical corporation; but, except as limited by this Plan, shall continue the exercise of their several powers and functions as the same exist under the denominational constitution.

The Council shall give full faith and credit to the authenticated acts and records of the several governing or advisory bodies of the constituent churches.

V. Specific Functions of the Council.

In order to prevent overlapping, friction, competition or waste in the work of the existing denominational boards or administrative agencies, and to further the efficiency of that degree of cooperation which they have already achieved in their work at home and abroad:

(a) The Council shall harmonize and unify the work of the United Churches.

(b) It shall direct such consolidation of their missionary activities as well as of particular churches in over-churched areas as is consonant with the law of the land or of the particular denomination affected. Such consolidation may be progressively achieved, as by the uniting of the boards or churches of any two or more constituent denominations, or may be accelerated, delayed, or dispensed with, as the interests of the Kingdom of God may require.

(c) If and when any two or more constituent churches, by their supreme governing or advisory bodies, submit to the Council for its arbitrament any matter of mutual concern, not hereby already covered, the Council shall consider and pass upon such matter so submitted.

(d) The Council shall undertake inspirational and educational leadership of such sort and measure as may be proper, under the powers delegated to it by the constituent churches in the fields of Evangelism, Social Service, Religious Education, and the like.

VI. The assent of each constituent church to this Plan shall be certified from its supreme governing or advisory body by the appropriate officers thereof to the chairman of the Ad Interim Committee, which shall have power upon a two-thirds vote to convene the Council as soon as the assent of at least six denominations shall have been so certified.

VII. Amendment.

This plan of organic union shall be subject to amendment only by the constituent churches, but the Council may overture to such bodies any amendment which shall have originated in said Council and shall have been adopted by a three-fourths vote.

This is the first definite step toward union yet taken by the churches of this country. By the limitations and intent of the plan itself it is only a first step. It is not presented as the end and achievement of union, but as a beginning, recognizing that perfect unity can come only as the result of "those forces of vital spiritual life which alone give meaning to our effort." Moreover the plan most earnestly recognizes that "no mechanical uniformity must be sought, nor any form of organization which ignores or retards the free movement of the Spirit of God in the hearts of His servants." Every effort has been made to effect a plan "so broad and flexible as to make place for all evangelical churches of the land, whatever their outlook of tradition, temperament or taste, whatever their relationships, racially or historically."

The union proposed by the plan is federal rather than organic in that what is proposed for the present is the agreement of the churches to work together in cooperation in furthering the redemption work of Christ in the world. On the other hand the union proposed is organic rather than federal in that the goal set up is definitely that of vital and effectual organic union and in that the plan provides for the principle of growth and development toward that perfect goal. The plan, although it is but a first step toward union, is undoubtedly a step in the right direction. It will be received with great interest by the churches of the country. Of one thing there is no longer room for doubt, namely, "the tides running" in the heart of the Church are for union. The day of division is beginning to draw to its close. Sooner or later the Church of Christ will be one. Blessed are they who have the faith and vision to give heart and hand to help hasten the day.

Driving Out the Preacher

By F. E. SMITH

FEW people understand the tragedy that is taking place in the ministry. Though the full effects are not yet apparent, the stubborn results will present themselves before a decade has passed. The many vacant pulpits, the great number of men, including many of the best we have, quitting the ministry, the anxiety and depression found so frequently among those who are loyal to the Church, the small number of young men responding to the divine call, all combine to give cause for serious thought.

The trouble lies in the attitude toward the support of the ministry. So often it is not thoughtful and kindly. Numbers of our good men, true to God, the gospel, their own conscience and humankind are seriously handicapped because of an ungenerous, sometimes quibbling attitude on the part of the men of the church. More than we think are compelled to supplement their salary by some other form of income. This is not avarice, but the unwillingness to forsake the gospel message. If they are to live at all they must seek additional resources elsewhere.

Many a good man, we know from personal acquaintance, is drawing on the savings of earlier years. Others without accumulations are being forced into debt and it is only a question of time when the break will come. Little provision can be made for the higher education of children. The future holds little hope of relief from the distress under the present system of support. Little provision can be made for sickness, accident or old age.

It is not an individual church affair. The congregation which has no preacher and has had none for months feels the full force of the situation. The church that has a preacher may not now understand. It is a common cause. Every church must acknowledge her obligation to the ministry as a whole, as well as the relation to their own minister. Anything less than gracious, generous support is an attack on the whole ministry. The whole cause is at stake, every church has a part and must understand its responsibility. The Interchurch World Movement surveys show that more preachers are receiving less than $1,000 than are paid over that amount. Living expenses have increased eighty-two per cent, while salaries of ministers have increased only twenty per cent in the last twenty years. At the same time the government figures for the amount necessary to sustain the average family is much beyond this sum. One of our well-known ministers recently said that of his seminary class of 1916 only himself remains in the pulpit and only one other is engaged in any form of definite Christian service. A recent news item carried the information that in a city of the central states three ministers, one of them from our own church, had within the month resigned and gone into business. One leader speaking of the situation said, "In our state six of the best preachers we have ever had are now in business." There are sections where the cause is all but demoralized by preachers going into business, and the effect business is having upon those who are still in the pulpit.

The committee on promotion for our part of the Interchurch Campaign had recommended to them by the All Field Workers' Conference, recently held in St. Louis, that we put in as a vigorous part of the campaign the realization of the recommendation of the Cincinnati Convention regarding the increase of ministers' salaries.

If only this is completely accomplished our part in the Interchurch campaign will be a glorious success. The increase indicated is twenty-five per cent for all salaries below $1,500, graduating to ten per cent for all above $3,000. A considerable number of the churches have already acted upon this recommendation. Every church that has preaching of any kind should seriously consider and take action. Those without preachers might find one if they came up to this standard of support. If all of our churches were to do this it would set forward the cause more than any other one act.

A Quest for Souls

By JESSE M. BADER

ONE of the imperative needs of this tremendous hour is for the Church to launch out in a quest for souls. There is no more worthy or important pursuit in which Christians can engage. How often this Christ commanded duty is overlooked and utterly disregarded. Look out across the life of our world today and you will see men and women who are totally absorbed in seeking the secondary and tangible things of life. They are possessed with a spirit of quest for something, but in these modern times that something seldom concerns itself with the quest for the souls of men for whom Christ died.

Many are possessed with a quest for gold and all it represents. They are willing to give up home and health, time and eternity, if only they may fill their coffers with gold and gain. Many others are obsessed with a quest for power and position. No hardships are thought too great if only they may seize a scepter and occupy a throne. Still many others display this consuming zeal in an effort to secure the pleasures of the world, but when they are realized, disappointment comes. Such quests do not satisfy when once the treasure is possessed.

The quest that is transcendent and of highest value is that one that concerns itself with soul saving. Nothing in the universe is so valuable to our Heavenly Father as a human soul. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life." If the universe were cast into a single jewel, it would not be as valuable to God as a single human soul. We sing, "For He is so precious to me," and how true we have found that fact, but it is also true, "For we are so precious to Him." Nothing in the universe is so precious and valuable to the man himself as his own soul. "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" It is the most priceless possession of man, yet his attitude toward it is too often one of neglect. Thousands are guilty of neglect not only of their own souls, but of the souls of those about them. If we are not careful we are in danger of losing our sense of values. Our ears are so often filled with the talk on the values of the things of this world, such as houses and lands, money, stocks and bonds, that we are likely to forget the value of the soul in the sight of God. God has a blood investment in every soul. A lad made a little boat and proudly took it out to the lake and watched it ride the shore waves. Suddenly a gust of wind carried it beyond his reach and depth. With a heavy heart he went home and related his loss to his kind father. A few days afterward a boy found the little boat, which had been washed ashore. He sold it to the town merchant. The lad who had lost the boat chanced to be passing down the street with his father when his eyes fell on his boat in a merchant's show window. No amount of talking could convince the merchant that the boat really belonged to the lad. Finally the father paid the price asked and handed the boat to his son. As he held the boat tightly he said, "Little boat, you are twice mine, I made you and I bought you." God made us in His own image and bought us with the precious blood of Christ. If there had been but one soul on earth two thousand years ago, Jesus would have been willing to come, live and die just the same as he did.

The matron of the household has lost a silver piece. She does not sit down to bemoan her loss. She does not try to convince herself that somehow, somewhere the missing coin will come to light. She does not coddle the pieces in her purse, happy that so many remain. She prepares a light, takes her broom and sweeps the house diligently. In the light of this parable let us learn the value of a single soul. A solitary coin was worth the most careful search the woman could make. A single soul is worth the quest, the labors and sacrifices of a lifetime.

Jesus gave a beautiful shepherd story to teach us His mission and to give us another conception of soul values. What a hazardous quest the anxious shepherd was willing to make for one lost sheep.

> "But none of the ransomed ever knew
> How deep were the waters crossed;
> Nor how dark was the night the Lord passed through
> Ere He found His sheep that was lost;
> Out in the desert He heard its cry—
> Sick and helpless and ready to die."

A boy is lost. No one goes on a quest for him. He takes not only his portion of goods, but also his soul into the far country. His dire distress brings him to himself, he arises and returns to his father's house. In these great days of soul winning when so many thousands about us are not saved who are out in the far country, we need the compelling passion for souls that will send us out to "seek and save that which is lost."

IT was this quest that sent out the devoted Wesley on a tireless ministry of soul saving. It was this passion that sent Whitefield up and down the land and across the sea, a flaming torch for Christ. This quest consumed Rowland Hill. His friends called him a mad man. His defence was something like this: "While I passed along yonder road I saw a gravel pit cave in and bury three men alive. I hastened to the rescue and shouted for help until they heard me almost a mile away. Nobody called me a madman then. But when I see destruction about to fall on sinners and entomb them in an eternal mass of woe, and cry aloud, if perchance they may behold their danger and escape, they say I am beside myself; perhaps I am, but, oh, that all God's children might thus be fired with desire to save their fellows." It was this quest for souls that drove Robert McAll from his beautiful home in England to the Paris slums. He was a cultured man; fond of art and letters, but he put these aside and lived midst the moral destitution of the French capital that he might guide wretched souls to the cross. In his prayerful quest he won hundreds to Christ. Matthew Henry said, "I would think it greater happiness to win one soul to Christ than to gain mountains of gold and silver for myself." Doddridge in his thought of this quest for souls cried out, "I long for the conversion of souls more sensibly than anything besides. Methinks I could not only labor, but die for it with delight." David Brainerd, after years spent in the service of Christ, wrote, "I cared not where or how I lived or what hardships I went through, if only I could win souls for Christ. While I was asleep I dreamed of these things, when I waked my first thought was of this great work." Hear the cry of John Knox out from the passion of a yearning soul, "Give me Scotland or I die." Time would fail to speak of Edwards, Finney, Spurgeon.

Moody and a host of others whose deeds were mighty because they were fired with this quest for souls.

The evangelism of the present must be the evangelism of the first century, or it is not true to Christ and His word. Bounded on one side by Pentecost, the other boundary is today, and in between there must be included the work of the apostles, the church fathers, all martyrs and heroes of other days, the pastors whose quiet, earnest and ofttimes unheralded work has meant the permanent growth of the church, the consecrated evangelist has labored and toiled, preached and prayed that the unsearchable riches of Christ might be accepted by the multitude.

During the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as well as in certain parts of the nineteenth century, there were important revival awakenings, when whole nations were moved by the power of the gospel. These revivals differed widely in character, in method and in the condition from which they sprang; some had political and religious elements whose causes were complex and remote; and yet the study of them reveals the fact that each of these great religious awakenings came in connection with the preaching of a neglected Scripture truth which was precisely adapted to the needs of the time. Since therefore it is true that each revival has had its distinct characteristics we can expect that this twentieth century revival shall emphasize the need that is peculiar to our time. Many believe that we are in the dawn and in the beginning of a great religious awakening. It has been over a year now since the war closed. This gigantic struggle brought a certain crisis into the life of all Protestantism. Following the war we can expect a great religious awakening for America. It is simply a question whether or not the church at this time expects a revival, wants a revival, and is willing to be used that God may bring about an awakening. There is no question about the need for a revival. Fully one-half of America does not belong to any church, Catholic or Protestant. The preachers and evangelists cannot do this tremendous task alone. In this revival of the twentieth century the emphasis must be placed upon personal evangelism, when every follower of Christ shall seek another; when those won, win others; and when those saved, will save others. The day of the evangelist is not gone. He has never been more needed than now. The calls for his services are everywhere. He will not work less, but others should work more in this quest for souls.

The emphasis should be placed on Each One Won winning at least one other by Easter Sunday. The motto should be "every Christian an evangelist." Everyone, whether in pulpit or pew, is under a sacred obligation to enter upon this quest. In this sacred quest and glorious search by individuals for individuals none of us will have to travel far. The unconverted are in our own home and none but God knows the tremendous obligations that are upon us all as we think of those bound to us by the sacred ties of blood relationship. What joy will come this happy Easter time if the Andrews will find their brothers and bring them to Christ. There is the postman that delivers the mail to the door each day. Is he a Christian? There is the clerk in the store who sells us our goods. Is she a Christian? Then there is the banker, to whom we entrust our money, but has he the greater riches which we have to give in trust to him? There is the person who lives next door, our trusted friends and acquaintances, have we spoken to them definitely about Christ? The writer was in one of our Bible colleges a few days ago. He asked the janitor who had cared for the building for ten years, if any ministerial student or professor had ever talked with him about his personal obligations to Christ and the church. His answer was, "Only one young man in all these ten years has ever asked me about my soul." A lack of personal interest in the welfare of the unsaved is one of the terrible charges that can be made against the church today. Many denominations and communions are losing rather than gaining in membership. We try to find excuse for this apathy but in vain. As Christians many of us are guilty of an unconcern from one day to another for the unsaved. The call to the church is "repent." The prayer of us all should be, "Wilt Thou revive us again that Thy people may rejoice in Thee?"

Two leaders among us were soliciting a wealthy man for a gift to the Men and Millions Movement. After giving his gift the man gave this word that should be a rebuke to us all, "Why is it that you only come to me when you want money; have you no interest in my soul?" In the coming Interchurch World Movement drive for money, when the workers go out into "no man's land" for gifts, dare we go to a man and ask for his money until we have first gone to him concerning his soul?

The Disciples of Christ along with many other Protestant communions and denominations are in a special soul winning campaign to reach the last individual possible for Christ and the Church. Our own brotherhood is now in the culminating time of their quest for one hundred thousand souls in a special six weeks' "Each One Win One" campaign. Sunday, April 4, will undoubtedly be the greatest Easter our people have ever known. More people will be won to Christ on that date than any other single day in all our history. The Bible schools and churches will attempt at reach the last unconverted person possible before the close of this special evangelistic effort. A day of joy it will be; joyful because of the new life in nature; joyful because of the message of an empty tomb; joyful because of the new life that comes into thousands of hearts through faith and obedience to Christ.

Glorious quest this, the search for souls. It is a most worth while effort on the part of the church. It is the paramount duty of every Christian to interest himself in the welfare of everyone about him. In doing this work and in making this quest the Christian feels he is not going on a search for a Holy Grail, but is making the search for a lost soul for whom Christ died.

Will They Write It in the Platform?

By L. E. SELLERS

CONSIDERABLE discussion is being provoked over the question as to whether the Democratic and Republican parties will insert a prohibition enforcement plank in their platform this year. Many politicians, including Mr. Bryan, will insist that such shall be done.

A little piece of history bearing on this point is of interest. On May 1, 1872, at Cincinnati, the Liberal Republican party used these words in Plank 2 of their platform and nominated Greeley for President:

"2. We pledge ourselves to maintain the Union of these states, emancipation and enfranchisement, and to oppose any reopening of the questions settled by the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the constitution."

On July 9, 1872, at Baltimore, the Democratic convention endorsed all of the Liberal Republican platform and Greeley for President.

On June 5, 1872, at Philadelphia, the Republican convention in Plank 2 of their platform said: "The recent amendments to the National Constitution should be cordially sustained because they are right, not merely tolerated because they are law, and should be carried out according to their spirit by appropriate legislation, the enforcement of which can safely be entrusted only to the party that secured those amendments."

We venture to say that a multitude of voters are awaiting just such action in regard to prohibition. In fact, candidates for office from President down will be asked to indicate their attitude on the enforcement of the prohibition amendment.

Already the liquor men are mailing out millions of blanks for the signature of voters pledging themselves not to support any candidate who is favorable to the prohibition law. Here is a possible issue for the coming campaign. Some one has said that there is as yet no issue, and the Republican National Committee has offered prizes for the best suggestion along this line. In the absence of something worth while and definite we suggest that the dominant parties get busy and declare themselves as for the strict enforcement of the prohibition law.

Good citizens of whatever party should speak out at once and serve notice on their party leaders that they will bolt any platform or ticket that is silent on law enforcement, or ignores the bootlegger, moonshiner and profiteer. This we ought to do not only for our own national security, but also because prohibition will be approved abroad only in case we make it something more than a paper agreement here at home. World prohibition is on trial. The final verdict depends upon America. What will the old parties do?

To say the least it is vitally important that the temperance forces without respect to party shall return to Congress this fall members who stand uncompromisingly for the laws already enacted. There must be no backward step—America is not headed that way.

A United Forward Movement

THE church has never been without some outstanding leaders who have been calling it into action but their attempts to awaken the church to its full sense of responsibility have been limited to their personal magnetic touch or to their own denomination. Now for the first time in the history of the modern church the day is at hand when the entire Christian body is entering into a united forward movement, not confining its efforts to the conquest of the world abroad but also engaged in building a more permanent religious structure at the home base.

"The Last President"

By W. R. WARREN

THE Western Reserve, which is the Cleveland district of Ohio, was a sort of expansion unit for New England. Hither at an early day came some of the staunchest and most enterprising sons and daughters of the East. Among their honored names were Robison and Young. In the course of time one of the Robison line married one of the Young line. The couple made their home on a modest and goodly farm just west of Bedford by the side of the road to Cleveland.

To them were born two sons and three daughters. When the oldest was ten and the youngest a babe of one year, the father, Decker D. Robison, fell a victim of tuberculosis. The mother went on bravely with the management of the farm and the rearing of the children, all to the glory of God and relying upon His strength.

MRS. ANNA R. ATWATER
President of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Vice-President of the United Christian Missionary Society

Eight years after their father's death the children lost their mother. Henry was eighteen, Edward sixteen, Minnie fourteen, Anna twelve and the sturdy little baby sister nine. Of course the whole community was stirred with sympathy for the fatherless, motherless family. The Bedford Church was broken-hearted with a sense of a calamity fallen upon one of its most beloved households.

Nearby was Dr. J. P. Robison, a stalwart brother of the father. After the funeral he mastered his emotions and modulated his great bass voice as well as he could and said to the oldest of the five orphans, "Henry, the girls will have to have a mother. They must come and make their home with us. Mother will take good care of them. You and Ed can go and live with Grandpa Young." Looking his uncle squarely in the eye and raising his voice to almost a defiant pitch, the boy answered, "Uncle John, you're a great big man, and you can do lots of things, but you can't take those girls away from us. They're ours!" "All right, Henry boy, if you feel that way about it, we'll say no more."

So "the children," as the neighbors at once began to call them, continued to live together on the home place, and heroically sought to carry on everything just as their mother had. When the "yearly meeting" came round they entertained thirty persons. It was a matter of course to them, but a wonder to everyone else. Strangers passing that way were told their story and shown "the place where the children live."

The older children took very seriously the care of the younger ones. "The boys and Minnie" fondly spoke of the others as "the little girls." The older "little girl," however, often figured in the role of mother to the youngest of the flock. An especially precious tradition relates how Anna made a beautiful apron for her charge, hemming by hand the yards of ruffle required. When the masterpiece was done she ironed it with the greatest care and could scarcely sleep that night in her eagerness for morning to come. When Harriet was "all dressed up" in her new apron and had started to school Anna watched her as far as she could see her, peering under the boughs of the trees and then running up on the porch to get a glimpse of her on the next hill, wondering if any other little girl at school would look as nice as Harriet.

The mother's plan had always been that each of the five should have a college education. To everyone else that plan had now become a sheer impossibility, but not to the five! It never occurred to one of them that anything else could be. So, one and two at a time they went to Hiram, all finally graduating but Henry. Requirements were not so rigid then and Anna was allowed to leave college in the spring, keep up her studies along with her teaching in a district school, and return to college for examinations.

She was a born teacher, as was abundantly proved in the eight years she served as principal of the high school at Bryan, Ohio, and in Oskaloosa College, Iowa, whither she went with J. M. Atwater after their marriage in 1892. Mr. Atwater was one of the most distinguished educators and preachers of that day and for the next five years was president of Oskaloosa. Then they went to Albany, Missouri, to take the same relation to a newly established college, but a sudden break in his health prevented his entering upon the work and led to his death in 1900, though he had recovered sufficiently to fill the pulpit of the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, through the summer of 1899 while J. Z. Tyler, the pastor, was trying to ward off the paralysis that ended his active work, though not his life or his usefulness. Exhausted with caring for her husband and at the same time doing much of his work, Mrs. Atwater's life was all but despaired of, but her little sister of the ruffled apron turned the tables, took her to the Massachusetts seashore for a summer and brought her back to the vigorous health that has stood the racking test of manifold labors for twenty years.

SHE began easily with some Shakespeare classes in the Euclid Avenue and Franklin Circle Churches of Cleveland and the presidency of the Ohio Christian Woman's Board of Missions for three years. In 1904 she was called to national headquarters and on the first day of April, 1905, took up the task of vice-president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and editor of Missionary Tidings. Her sister Harriet was already teaching in Indianapolis and it was not long before they established a home together. You just cannot keep those sisters apart!

When Mrs. Helen E. Moses, wise, heroic and beloved, died, Mrs. Atwater succeeded her and has been re-elected unanimously every year since as president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Not all the members of that great organization were ready to go into the United Christian Missionary Society when it was first proposed. One of the most active and influential took Mrs. Atwater roundly to task for favoring the union. "Don't you see that you are sawing off the very limb on which you are standing?" Then she paced up and down the room several times and finally exclaimed, "I believe you want to be the last president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions!" "Yes," Mrs. Atwater smiled, "that is just it."

The blessing of God and the favor of His people have rested richly upon the Christian Woman's Board of Missions during Mrs. Atwater's presidency as before. Let the financial gains be taken as an index of the growth of the work in all respects. The total receipts in 1907 were $281,637.54; in 1919 they were $691,950.93. The total assets of the Board in 1907 were $300,000; in 1919 they were $1,446,588.

Being the president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has always been a considerable task. Naturally it would be doubly so through a decade of doubling receipts and resources. But it is being the last president that has made the load tremendous, and all the more since no one suspected, until recently, that there was to be such an outcome of the process through which we were passing. To walk untried paths by faith is not easy at best, but Mrs. Atwater and her associates at National Headquarters have had to lead a democratic and continental organization of American women, all keenly conscious of their approaching enfranchisement, and exercising with great diligence the right to vote where they already had it.

Events have been crowding toward greater issues. The Centennial of 1909 was quickly forgotten in the development of the College of Missions and in enlargement on every hand, entering Africa, China and South America. While increasing cooperation with the Foreign Christian Missionary Society all the national boards and colleges were brought together in the Men and Millions Movement. Both individuals and organizations had to learn team work. Out of this cooperation inevitably came unity. Again and again, here as everywhere, the women were the first to see the next step, and although the very completeness of their organization made it harder for them than for the other boards, the readiest to take the step. Everybody was surprised that Missionary Tidings should be merged into WORLD CALL. There was no more unique or successful feature or factor in the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. But faith was equal to the hour and courage was equal to faith.

From the days of the cave dwellers it has been taken for granted that woman should match man's strength with strategy. In the arduous days of the Men and Millions Movement both in council and in field, Mrs. Atwater never claimed the feminine exemptions and prerogatives. She was always splendidly womanly, but "she played the game like a man."

No one can talk with her five minutes without realizing that she is absolutely sincere and heroically fair. A man came into her office one day, saying, "I have traveled a long way and at great expense to ask why you allow higher criticism among the men employed by the Board." "Mr. Blank, I appreciate your interest in the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and I feel as keenly as you do the necessity that nothing but the truth should be taught by the Board's representatives. But let us be sure that we understand each other. Just what do you mean by 'higher criticism'?"

"Mrs. Atwater, I am a busy man. I have intended to look into this matter, but I have not had time. I really don't know just what it is." That did not end the interview. There was a frank and friendly consideration of the supreme issues involved. The visitor went away satisfied that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and its president had no other interest or purpose in the world than to advance the Kingdom of God in complete loyalty to the Christ of the New Testament.

FROM the old home by the Cleveland road, the old church in Bedford town, the old college on Hiram hill and from comradeship with a great preacher of Christian righteousness, Mrs. Atwater has drawn the habit of testing every teaching by the Word of God and every course of action by the guidance of His Spirit. This personal rule has been reinforced by the unfailing spirit and custom of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions throughout its glorious forty-five years. The tradition of fidelity to God in every trust and of waiting upon God for every decision accumulates power with every assembling of the National Board. Mrs. Atwater is the incarnation of that tradition and of the motherly impartiality that has likewise distinguished the Christian Woman's Board of Missions from the first.

Both at home and abroad, both at the university center and among the city's poor, both to the proud mountaineer and to the humble Negro, both to the choicest members of our own churches and to the sorriest slaves of savagery, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has borne the message of Christ. How natural that its president should rejoice and cooperate in the United Christian Missionary Society and in the Interchurch World Movement! Every work of God is within her mission and no worker of God can be excluded from her fellowship.

It is especially appropriate that the Easter number of WORLD CALL should carry this story, both because thank offerings, and special programs for the Juniors and Mission Bands, mark this season and also because the special mission of this issue is to promote organized benevolence among our people. This is pre-eminently woman's mission. The members of women's missionary societies have from the first been among the most earnest supporters of the National Benevolent Association, but only as individuals. In the United Christian Missionary Society the barriers are removed. The monthly programs, always comprehensive in their annual sweep, will now become universal. They will present both missions and benevolence.

Strangers wondered most that the Men and Millions Movement should include the Christian Woman's Board of Missions as well as the other national societies. That was only because they did not know our women, of whom Mrs. Atwater is type as well as leader. They may well be surprised again that the United Christian Missionary Society is formed on the same broad lines, and especially that women have equal representation on the Board of Managers and Executive Committee. To the men who have had the privilege of working with Mrs. Atwater and the other officers of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions this equality is perfectly natural. That it is not a forced balancing was shown when Mrs. Atwater was made chairman of the Magazine Committee at the inception of WORLD CALL, and in similar honors and responsibilities continually brought to her.

So it is good every way that the Second Vice-President of the United Christian Missionary Society should have the confidence of both men and women. And it is good for those who are, and for those who should be, wards of the National Benevolent Association that the gracious first lady of the organized womanhood of the Disciples of Christ, has herself known the burden and the sorrow of both the orphan and the widow; and out of her afflictions has come to such serene and constant helpfulness that no one ever thinks of her except as bestowing, not receiving, blessings; giving, not needing, help.

THE Interchurch World Movement is going to make trouble for us. It will challenge our professions, tax our resources, upset our plans and our theories, lead us on untried paths where faith alone can point the way. But it is all the more a call from God that it comes thus to test and try our professions. Only by utter readiness to become in full measure a church with a mission to the world can we escape condemnation and death in this day of reality and stern demands.—William P. Merrill.

Our Mexican Orphanage—Twenty-Six Chosen Girls

By ELMA C. IRELAN

I READ one time, in the Christian Evangelist, the sweet story of a chosen baby, which a foster mother told her little adopted daughter. The little one came to feel that her lot was rarer than that of children born into a home, for did not her mother choose the baby she wanted to love and care for?

Because we have considered so carefully the applications for entrance into our orphanage, sadly refusing as many children as we admitted, we feel that we have a family of chosen girls. Thirty-two girls have been formally admitted into the orphanage family; but of these, three never came under the direct care of the orphanage "mothers." For a few weeks they lived at the home of Professor and Mrs. Diaz; then the grandmother, who was really unable to support them in any proper way, demanded their return. It was evident that her acquaintances had made her fear Protestant influence. One girl, after four and a half years at the orphanage, was dismissed to become the homekeeper for her orphaned brothers. Two others were returned to relatives after two or three years' residence at the orphanage. We had not, in either case, accomplished what we wished for the child, but circumstances prevented further fruitful effort. We can only hope that our little labor may not have been in vain. We are glad to remember that the three older girls, who have left our family, had confessed their faith in Jesus and had been baptized in His name.

Two or three times death has come near to our little orphanage family, but the Lord of life has been very good to us, and not one of our little group has been lost through disease. At such times how we have clung to the thought that we have chosen these children not for death, but for life—for Life!

Just six years ago today, in Piedras Negras, Miss Mary Orvis and I received the first two little charges. In a short time Miss Orvis was needed at another mission station, and did not see the later rapid growth of our new institution. Just about the time our soldiers were invading Vera Cruz, in April, 1914, the little family was doubled. The international situation made it seem necessary for our mission to cross, for a time, into Eagle Pass, Texas. Miss Pearl Gibbons became connected with the orphanage work at this time, and has ever since been one of its "mothers." It was after our return to Piedras Negras, in June, 1914, that our little family began its real growth. By September there were twelve children, and the year-old orphanage cared for eighteen girls.

The orphanage idea came from various sources. From India had long come the news of the wonderful results of orphanage work in that far-away land. Dear little "Mother Westrup," who had cared for nearly a score of children beside her own, used to tell us in Monterey of the need of a Christian orphanage in Mexico. Prof. Juan S. Diaz, wondering as to the future of the many children left orphans by Mexico's civil war, begged for our mission to give them protection. Three beautiful girls, their father an exile, their mother only his deserted concubine, wanted a home, and we had no refuge to offer them. Though finally not among the first who came into the orphanage, these three sisters are with us, pretty and bright, happy in a Christian home, and themselves little Christians.

Most of our girls have had some sad story connected with their lives before entrance into the orphanage. Two of our sweetest girls were abandoned by their mother when the children were prostrate with the small-pox. The father later left these two girls with the family of a Carranzista colonel, who gave them to us when an invasion of Piedras Negras by the Villista forces was imminent. The mother took with her the baby of the family. There were still other children that we have never seen. Poor girls, what sad memories must come to them sometimes! Yet they are patient and uncomplaining, young Christians now, both of them.

One timid child had followed around after her crazy mother until she was wild and unchildlike. She bore on her body the marks of her mother's scratches; her head was full of vermin. Now she is clean and pretty, and, though timid, is not at all wild as at first.

Four of our girls lost their fathers in the war, and the fathers of two other girls were killed for political reasons. One girl came with a neighbor woman from Mexico City, after her mother's death there. Finding herself left with undesirable company, she applied to the municipal authorities of Piedras Negras for protection. The mayor telephoned to the orphanage and we saw that she was cared for.

We wonder, sometimes, if our girls really remember the physical state in which they came—scantily clothed, most of them; not a few with vermin in their hair; some with bodies scaly because of too infrequent bathing; some with sores; some with dreadful signs of malnutrition. What wonders constant care has worked! We are proud of our clean, neatly dressed girls. If they realize the change, they say little about it. Perhaps they are now so accustomed to the new life that they have partially forgotten the old. Perhaps they remember and are ashamed to speak.

We have had a school for our girls, sometimes a school open to the public, sometimes with only private instructors. The greater part of the girls have been glad to learn and have passed the grades from year to year. We have two girls in a normal school in Saltillo, one of them in the second year.

Spiritual training has been along the lines a child ought to receive in a normal Christian home. There has been family worship, including the study of the Bible and there has been the giving of thanks at the table. The children have been taken to Sunday school and church service, and almost all of them have accepted Christ as their Savior. We are not satisfied with the moral and spiritual development of all of the children, yet they have almost without exception, reached a higher standard than that of the homes they left. Some have aspirations toward definite Christian service; almost all are ready for active part in church work. Only the three youngest girls have not become members of the church. We are particularly happy in that their presentation in the church has been a matter in which they have taken the initiative. We have not persuaded them to become Christians. We have tried only to make the conditions right for their acceptance of Christ.

One proof of real advancement is the language used by our children. A few of them came from Christian homes, but the most did not. Hence they had received a Mexican child's ordinary inheritance of profane and obscene words. Great was our struggle during the first two years of orphanage history. But habits of speech have so improved that we now rarely have complaint of the children's language.

For something more than two years our institution was located in Piedras Negras. From June, 1916, until December, 1919, we and our girls made our home in Eagle Pass, Texas. However, we were not far from Mexico for we lived but a stone's throw from the international bridge. Since December, 16, 1919, the orphanage has had its home in Aguascalientes, and right happy are both girls and missionaries to be in a building we can call our own and to be in the native land of our young charges. One of the twenty-six chosen girls we have at present is a little, fatherless, motherless eight-year-old child we have taken since coming to the "heart of Mexico."

Our present day school is conducted in the building which is the home of our missionaries and orphanage girls. To the whole institution belongs the name "Collegio Morelos." The principal of the day school is Miss Francisca Mancha, the same sweet-faced, Christian teacher who formerly directed our day school in Monterrey.

We hope wonderful things for our girls in the way of service in Christ's kingdom and to their own native land. They are already helping by being the enthusistic nucleus of the work in our new school.

Miss Gibbons and I have been so happy in this work for Mexican girls that we are very sorry to have the distinction of conducting the only evangelical orphanage in all this needy land.

Mr. George McBride, who represents the Board of Temperance in Mexico, writes: "You will be interested to know that there is a great revival of temperance sentiment among the people here. During the revolution little could be done, but now with the stimulus of advance movement in other countries and the dire menace of having all the liquor business of the United States transferred to this country, people are awakening to oppose it. A young temperance society in Mexico City is becoming active."

The Home for the Aged at Walla Walla, Washington

A Trip to the Northwestern Christian Home

IT was on a hot day in August that we left Portland for Walla Walla. Auntie Basler was going to the Northwestern Christian Home and had asked me to accompany her. We had planned to go when E. S. Muckley could make the trip with us, for "Auntie", as every one calls her, was convalescing from quite a serious illness and it required more than one to make her comfortable, especially since we must change cars at Pendleton.

It was not long until other occupants of the car became interested in Auntie and when we reached Pendleton there were plenty of helping hands to carry her and her several bundles—soft pillow, dainty lunch, and favorite medicine—off the train.

When we arrived at Walla Walla, Miss Hoel was there to meet us with a car and we were soon at the Home where an appetizing supper was awaiting us. Naturally Auntie was pretty tired from her twelve-hour trip, but her attractive, comfortable room and good supper revived her. However, her very own feather bed was put on her bed and we tucked her in early and (she told me next morning) she just said "Good night, Lord Jesus" and went right to sleep too tired to tell Him fully how thankful she was to be there.

The Philathea girls of the Walla Walla church had furnished this particular room, the door bearing the name plate "Philathea". The warm, fluffy rug on the floor, the pretty brass bed (the most comfortable bed of her life, she told me), the easy chair that seemed to be made to order, another chair or two, the oak reading table with drawer for her writing material, the dresser to match it, and some pictures on the wall made indeed a very homey room.

A bouquet of roses on her table attracted our attention at once when we entered, and we did not overlook the dainty, clean curtains, dresser scarf and table runner. And Auntie was quite as proud of the radiator as anything else, for she looked forward to toasting her toes and keeping the unwelcome shiver from her back in a more satisfactory way than with a stove.

Auntie likes her cup of tea just right, so she took with her the precious tea-ball. But when I left for Portland I had the tea-ball, taking it to a friend that had liked this particular ball, with the message that she would have no need for it because the tea was just to her liking, as was everything else that was served. Recent letters say, "I haven't missed a meal since I came," which means much to those of us who know how frail she has been these latter years.

As to the home. There are eight and a half acres of land right in the city of Walla Walla, and it was a very delightful day I spent investigating the surroundings. The large, well-kept lawn with shrubs and trees and flowers and driveway; the green lattice fence with trailing vines that separates the lawn from the truck patch; the house with its broad porches both up stairs and down, make a most attractive appearance and give the impression of a well-kept home—a real home.

We almost felt we were in the country as we sauntered down by the water system (for they have their own water supply) and the milk house, across the small foot bridge spanning the little stream that runs through the place, where we found the four cows grazing, the four pigs grunting, heard the hens cackling and the roosters crowing, and saw the ducks swimming in a nearby pond; all of which means home-made milk, cream, butter, buttermilk, eggs and meat. They also raise some fruit which is amply augmented by churches and interested friends.

No less interesting than the surroundings was the "Family", which includes fifteen old people, the full capacity of the home. It was a very delightful experience visiting the old people and learning of their appreciation of what the church is doing for their comfort in their old days. It was interesting to find the average age of this family to be eighty-two years.

The Walla Walla church, we were told, conducts communion service once a month and are planning later to have this service twice a month. The Juniors of the church presented the home with an individual communion set. The Endeavorers go frequently to entertain them. The Women's Council remembers their birthdays and special days, and the day I was there the Home Department superintendent called to bring reading matter and chat a bit with them. In addition to this the Whitman College Y. W. C. A. girls occasionally have entertainments for them and the Sunshine Club, composed of society women, visits them in twos or more and occasionally takes them motoring.

Brother and Sister Hoel and their accomplished daughter seem to know just how to meet the needs of each member of this interesting family. The parlor with its organ and upholstered furniture furnishes a delightful place for the old people to assemble and visit. In fact, the whole house presents a very homelike appearance. But the building is too small. The waiting list is large and many are turned away each year. I understand the National Benevolent Association is going to enlarge as soon as a force can be put in the field to raise the money.

In closing, may I say a special word about Auntie Basler? To the ministers and other students who were in Drake University during the later eighties and early nineties the name of Auntie Basler will be familiar indeed, for it was then that her husband filled the position of caretaker for the University and Auntie mothered the boys and helped them through some of the real problems of life that tax them beyond any difficult translations of Greek and Hebrew. For what could be harder than sewing buttons, darning the rents and disposing of the shining places on the best suit? When they were sick it was Auntie who knew just the right remedy, or if it were a bit of advice that was needed Auntie had the right prescription. The spirit of Christ was her only wealth and serving her only joy. She was always ready with "the cup of cold water".

February 3 Auntie Basler will be eighty-five years old. Now that her immediate family have preceded her to the "Home Beyond", she greatly appreciates having this Christian home. And when I left she said, "Tell Brother Griffis (her minister) how happy I am."

Even though she is almost blind and can no longer read or write, her mind is keen, her hearing good, her memory retentive. And she is especially blessed with a keen sense of humor. She is interested in the affairs of her church and country, and her prayer that she might see the victory of the Allies and the close of the war was answered. She is always cheery and will brighten her corner in the Northwestern Christian Home.

Portland, Oregon.

The Cross and the Church

THE cross is the highest symbol of service, God's supreme effort to redeem the world. It is the power within the church driving it forth to serve. The heart of the cross and the heart of the church are one. Christ hung upon the one that He might abide in the other and use it as His agency to bring His strength to the weak, His health to the sick, His light to the ignorant, His liberty to the captives, His joy to the sad, His companionship to the homeless, His food to the hungry, His hope to the despairing, His faith to the disheartened.

From the cross through the church goes the influence that builds the nursery for the motherless babe, the shield for the orphaned child, the refuge for the disheartened widow, the home of rest for the weary, homeless aged.

The church that is not motived by Christ's idealism of service is not Christian. Christ is limited in His service for humanity by the faith and good will of his followers. His influence radiates no farther than we carry it. It is a tragedy that the church ever turned aside to wrangle over doctrines of questionable import while hungry, homeless children were left comfortless and unshielded. Unless the church lives and moves in the spirit of the cross it cannot serve. It must widen its circle of service. Too long have we shut out crying, hungry, forlorn children from our circle of protecting Homes. Too long have we sent dependent aged over the hills to the poorhouse because we had no room. An aged brother who was told he had been placed on the waiting list of one of our Homes asked: "How long will I have to wait?" How long? Your Bible school will help to answer on Easter Day, April 4.

The most beautiful ministry of our Lord was when, hanging upon the cross, He forgot his own exquisite agony, the pull of the nails, the crown of thorns, the leering crowd, the ignominy of it all, as he looked into the suffering soul of Mary and said, "Woman, behold thy son"; and to John, "Behold thy mother." From that day John cared for Jesus' mother. So has our Lord committed every needy mother to the care of his church. Will your church, your school, help? You must answer.

We are happy over the record of the National Benevolent Association in caring for its babies. The Child Saving Institute, Omaha, specializing in this branch of our ministry, has a record for the lowest death rate of any similar institution in the United States. We have 84 babies in our homes. Last year we received 126 new babies under two years of age. If you could visit our homes and see our family of babies and the care they receive, you would say, "A ministry so beautiful must be enlarged." If your gifts are greatly increased we can enlarge our homes and take in hundreds of babies that are now being turned away. Will you do it?

An institution that can put a smile on the face of an orphan child is worth while. For thirty-three years the association has seen the sunshine of gladness dispel the gloom of sadness from the hearts and faces of 10,087 children. About half were placed in good family homes. But the most needy cannot be placed. Nobody wants the boy or girl who is a helpless victim of crime and cruelty, or whose blood is tainted, or who has no grace of form or comeliness of face. Our six Christian homes at St. Louis, Cleveland, Denver, Atlanta, Dallas and Omaha are God's answer to the cry of these children of misfortune. We must enlarge our capacity.

Few things are more pathetic than a widowed mother, left to provide for a family of young children. You who have never had such an experience hardly know what a real heartache is. It is hard enough for a woman to make her own way in a not too friendly world. The problem is tenfold harder when she has to hobble along with a baby in her arms and two or three other children clinging to her skirts. Here the church through the National Benevolent Association has rendered a most signal service. Three thousand six hundred thirty-six widows with young children have been aided to honest self-support.

Perhaps the most beautiful ministry rendered by the association is the care of the aged. If homeless childhood is sad, homeless old age is sadder. The child's weakness and charms win for it a home, but the aged are looked upon as a burden. Private homes are closed to them. For them it is either the church or the almshouse. Your Easter offering will say which it shall be. Last year we turned away over 75 of these fathers and mothers in Israel. The capacity must be made larger by equipping our newly acquired building at Jacksonville, Florida, in order to provide for our long waiting list.

Is the Church Fiddling?

IS the church "fiddling"? What church? The church today is raising hundreds of millions for a great program. No such sums were ever heard of before. "The church is little more than fiddling." The ink of this quoted print is scarcely dry. It is not a world voice but a kingdom voice, an insider, a big, warm optimist,—but they bite, these words. Why? It is not an irresponsible utterance, but the escaped conviction of a long-time servant of one of our greatest churches. You doubt it, or maybe deny it? Then go out and try to put over some really great program. Try it twice, try it ten years, then talk. When we say "great program" we do not mean compared with the past, we mean compared with the task. No general says to a division, "Do a little better," he says, "Take the hill!" The task is the measure. Look! If you can't look, listen. Put your ear to the ground. Are you deaf? What you hear is the measure. What you see is the measure. In France the measure was never prepared behind the lines. What the scout brought back, what the airplane reported, that was the measure. It was sitting in the tent, as Grant used to when the scouts came in that inspired these words: "The church is little more than fiddling." They were spoken from a disciple lookout. Here comes a scout breathless and says the "red" terror is loose in the field. And maybe your best friend comes and says to you, "Now don't get excited, brother, just preach the gospel and it will be all right." Yes, yes, but the gospel of what and of whom? The gospel of just more fiddling? No fiddling gospel ever came from Christ. It conquered men, conquered Rome, will conquer the world, freed woman, unfettered the slave, started the crusades—not two, but a hundred. Its latest answer was ten million lives. That is the gospel of Christ.

But here comes another runner—a disciple runner. He says there are more dependents, aged disciples wandering homeless among us than we have in all the brotherhood homes. "He that will not provide for his own, and especially them of his own household, hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." Orthodoxy? Yes, straight Pauline orthodoxy. And where do disciples stand? The majority of them (steady now)—the majority of them stand fiddling or this scout's report could not have come.

But look—more tidings. Another scout says there are five hundred incurables among us, a third of whom are among the very poor, lacking essential care. What about it, fiddling? Certainly, for in all these years the church has made no provision for such. And the gospel says, "Ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." Yes, we say, that's straight goods, beautiful teaching. And who might not add, yes, and we can and could and haven't. There is but one road out and it lies by the way of simple, upright manhood. Write the check and build the homes and care for "our own." Quit fiddling. The check must be big enough to do the job, just like a liberty loan. We suddenly quit fiddling on liberty loans.

Room!—another messenger. He says that in the fight against the white plague the Church of Christ is not taking care of its own, has no sanitarium in all the fine Southwest, where the air heals and cures. How about it? Shall we preach the gospel as Christ did, deeds first and words afterward, or will we keep on fiddling?

And speaking of the Southwest, here is an emisssary right from there who reports an officer missing, a leader in Israel whose name used to ring through the brotherhood. He used to hold a great pulpit in the metropolis of the Southwest, but he is missing. In fact he defaulted by committing old age. He was last seen in Florida, U. S. A., all but destitute, though cheerful. Church of Christ, this messenger says the aged servant is destitute but cheerful, and he further says there are some hundreds of others just like him. For this there is only one reason, "The church is little more than fiddling."

Yet no. Only the majority of the church is fiddling. There is a splendid minority that have become masters of the strings. They put their soul into the music and that soul "still increaseth." The old fiddle has been consecrated, reborn, understood, mastered, played—really played! It has become capable now of expressing the inmost and inspiring the utmost. The real church music that you hear today, that the world hears, that God hears and loves, is the music of this awakened minority. It is the voice of love, a harmony of all the strings. The old fiddling is a monotonous scraping on the one string of self.

O church of God, either learn your instrument—the full, rich, all-sufficient Gospel of the Son of God—or in mercy's name give place to those who can, that a sick, tormented, threatened, perishing world be not appealed to in the name of a God of one string!

A Worthy Appeal

ONCE more we are calling the attention of the friends of the widow and orphan, of the poor and needy in our land, to the near approach of Easter. In just a word let me tell you of how much, how very much the National Benevolent Association depends on our Sunday schools for the daily support of the children and the dear aged brethren and sisters in the Homes. For twenty-seven years we have sent out an appeal to you for help in this work and you have never failed to give a hearty, whole-souled response. Last year when there was so much giving for the sad needs following in the wake of the war we, for a little while, feared our Homes and their families might be deprived of many things necessary to their comfort, but you rebuked us for our lack of faith in our brethren and our heavenly Father, who rules over all, by sending the finest contributions we have ever had. We know it will be so this year, and our purpose now is just to remind you that Easter is near and our Homes still dependent on our Sunday schools and individual friends for their daily needs.

Get the address right so there may be no trouble and send in your gifts as early after Easter as you conveniently can. Remember, the National Benevolent Association, 2955 North Euclid Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri.

"Prohibition is as inevitable in England as it was in the United States," according to Capt. Cecil Roberts, who has been during the war by turn an officer of his majesty's navy, the royal flying corps, and the British army, and was a candidate for parliament at the March elections.

"Prohibition is inevitable," explained Captain Roberts to a Chicago Journal reporter, "because it spells efficiency. It won't come to England for quite a while, I am afraid. Nevertheless, I am confident we shall see prohibition in the British Isles before ten years have passed."

The Woman Missionary of Yesterday and of Today

By ELSIE McCORMICK

(Interchurch Correspondent with the Woman's Deputation to the Far East)

"Where are you going, my earnest maid?"
"I'm going a-missioning, sirs," she said.
"That's very nice, my earnest maid,
We'll send a ticket at once," they said.

IF Mother Goose had had access to the files of the mission boards not many years ago she could have summed up the usual correspondence with candidates in somewhat the above fashion.

There are a number of women on the mission field today who were sent out without having been seen by one member of the board under which they were to work. There are also a few, sent out under similar circumstances, who are not on the field—the futile rattling of the square peg in the round hole having become too noticeable for even board members to ignore.

But the boards of today are likely to have a very different response. They might say, for instance, "That's very nice, my earnest maid, please let us see your college degree, and give us an account of your professional experience. We must also have a number of personal interviews with you, and then, if you pass the medical examination along with these other tests, we may possibly let you go."

During the conference recently held in Shanghai, under the auspices of the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions and the Interchurch World Movement, the problem of securing the right sort of young women for mission service was discussed by the Administration Commission, of which Miss Nellie G. Prescott was chairman. It was agreed that the ideal candidate is a woman who has had experience in her profession, but is still young enough to learn the formidable array of strange sounds that make up human intercourse in the Orient. A sound body, a trained mind, a strong will, and a soul guaranteed to stand endless wear and tear, are just a few of the requisites for a successful missionary. Add to these the need for experience in a specialized field, and you will see that the problem of selection has become decidedly complicated.

"It is easy enough to reach the college girl," said Miss Prescott. "Our difficulty is to establish contact with the young woman who has been out of college some years and is trying her professional wings. Often enough she is out of touch with mission affairs. Appeals in church publications do not come to her attention. It seems that the only way to reach her is by personal contact, by hearing of her through a friend. Every board should have a candidate department—and by a "department" I do not mean one person who can be called away at any moment to help the treasurer with the books, or the editorial committee with the next issue of the magazine. If the candidate department is always on the alert for suggestions it may be able to reach many very desirable young women who had never before given definite thought to mission service."

One of the most constructive suggestions of the Administration Commission was that student volunteers be given advice in the selection of their courses, so that they may prepare for a definite phase of work on the foreign field. "When I first entered college I wrote to my board, telling them of my desire to become a missionary and asking their advice in choosing my electives," declared one of the delegates. "They replied by congratulating me on my choice of life work and asking me to write to them again when I was ready to go. Very much at sea regarding my course, I turned to my pastor for help. He advised me to specialize on languages. I therefore majored in French and German, which I have not had occasion to use more than three or four times. If someone had only told me to take up economics and sociology my efficiency on the field would have been doubled." Though President Ellen F. Pendleton of Wellesley College warned against too much specialization on the part of undergraduates, she heartily approved of the suggestion that the boards give them general guidance and that they spend a year or two in intensive preparation for a definite branch of mission work after receiving their diplomas.

But even after she has had practical experience at home the young missionary's time of probation is by no means over. The Commission on Secondary Education recommended that after a period of language study new mission teachers learn China from the inside, either by itinerating with an evangelistic worker or by residing for a time in the interior.

"Unless a teacher is able to speak to old women and little children, unless she knows the home conditions of her pupils, she will never be able to enter the background of the student's lives," declared Mrs. Murray Frame, President of the North China Union Women's College. "I have been twenty-two years in China, but I always felt handicapped in understanding the people because I never lived in the interior," stated another well-known missionary.

The new candidates' knowledge of China will not be limited by what they see from the car window, plus experience in a large city. Houseboats, wheelbarrows, sedan chairs and mule litters will all do their share in impressing upon them the fact that every sixth person in the world lives on a Chinese farm and that beside the great back country, the coast towns shrivel into insignificance.

The Administration Commission, however, did not confine itself to the question of training candidates, the problem of bettering conditions on the field receiving equal attention. For several months before the conference opened Miss Prescott, and other members of the commission, toured China from north to south. They visited women missionaries living in Chinese houses where the occupants dressed for dinner by putting two coats on top of a couple of sweaters; where the air in the bedroom froze the toothbrushes and left pieces of ice floating in the water pitchers. Women who lived under such conditions in France were hailed as heroic, but nothing has thus far been said about women missionaries who put up with these conditions several months every year. The missionary merely rubs her swollen, purplish hands, drapes two steamer rugs over her shoulders, puts a little more charcoal into the ridiculously inadequate brazier, and continues to do three women's work, as complacently as ever.

The commission visited lonely women workers living so far from the railroad that they see no other foreigners for months at a time except their own associates. Often their salaries are such that magazines and books are almost unapproachable luxuries, which means that their loneliness is intensified, and that they are unable to keep up with the latest developments in their special subject or profession. When the conference voted the Chinese Recorder the best available medium for keeping in touch with the Christian movement in China, and drew the delegates' attention to the advantages of subscribing, one of the missionaries merely indicated the price mark, $4 a year. "To most of the women on the field four dollars is as far out of range as forty dollars," she declared. "If the Chinese Recorder cannot be subsidized from home, so that its price will be lower, women missionaries must remain uninformed regarding the progress of the movement to which they are giving their whole lives."

The workers, however, bear all such personal inconveniences as wretched housing, long terms of service and low salaries with a minimum of complaint. It is only when the efficiency of their work is threatened that they raise their voices in protest. "Many times I have heard a demand in the women's compounds for someone to take over the great burden of looking after repairs and of superintending the putting up of new buildings," declared Miss Prescott.

Women who know nothing of carpentry, plumbing, or stone masonry are obliged to oversee Chinese workmen in their first struggles with foreign houses. It is difficult enough for a woman, unaided, to superintend the erection or repair of a building at home. But when one considers that in China she must instruct the artisans in every detail of their work, one begins to have a faint conception of the difficulty. Every woman who has tried to have a room papered or who has struggled with the baffling directions for connecting a patent water heater can sympathize with her sister across the seas, who has the whole structure of a complicated building on her mind and who is unable to run across the road and ask Mr. Smith for advice.

A missionary with nothing to do but conduct a medical college, a hospital, a nurses' training school recently had the added worry of putting up a large building. "Many a time I perform an operation, or lecture to a class with—figuratively speaking—a leaky faucet in the back of my head," she said. "It is these little, goading worries and exasperations that cause missionaries to break down." This statement was borne out by the fact that a brilliant young missionary, who was recently called upon to superintend the grading of a compound and the erection of a pretentious stone house, collapsed under the strain and returned home incapacitated after only four years' service.

Another sin against the woman missionary, committed in the name of expediency, is the tendency to shift her from work for which she is specially fitted to some other position for which she has had no preparation. "Well-meaning mission leaders sitting in a distant American office, are inclined to consider their workers mere pawns on a great chess board.

"I have seen young women return home, broken-hearted after trying in vain to adapt themselves to a place for which they had no training," declared a member of the Administration Commission. "Under such conditions it is hard to say which suffers most—the workers or the work." "I came out here with a master's degree in pedagogy and a desire to help in a good middle school," a discouraged young missionary told the writer. "How do I spend my time? Putting drops in the eyes of girls suffering from trachoma and superintending repairs! It is not that I despise these forms of service—but I've had absolutely no medical training or experience in managing buildings." During the report of the Administration Committee, members of the conference expressed themselves on this subject in no uncertain terms, the delegates agreeing that it was better to keep a candidate waiting for a special need to appear, if necessary, than to put her in anywhere as a makeshift.

The dawn of a better day for the woman missionary, however, is already breaking in the skies of the Far East. Among the measures submitted by the Administration Commission were recommendations that the first term of service be limited to five years and subsequent terms to not more than six; that the China Continuation Committee study the salaries paid women missionaries, with the consent of the boards concerned, so that greater uniformity be secured; that women workers be given annual medical examinations while on the field, and that they be kept under medical surveillance during furloughs to prevent overworking. If these resolutions are approved at home, members of what was the hardest-worked and most poorly paid profession in the world will have, at least, some of the unnecessary burden lifted from their patient shoulders.

A Suggestion of Patriotism

WHO could have predicted or known what was in the making when Billy Sunday, a wee orphaned lad, came timid, reluctant, afraid, grief-stricken, to be reared in an orphan home? Did it pay to take this broken-hearted orphan boy in his great need and save him to be the wonderfully splendid soul saver he is today? Who would dare to balance the cost, time and labor spent in training this lad against the more than marvelous good he has done and is doing? The investment in saving boys and girls, fitting them to fight life's battles untrammeled will pay a right royal dividend.

We build arches, serve banquets, raise monuments of stone and bronze to do honor to the noble lads who have made the world stand at attention and accord to them the honor of unprecedented valor, daring and victory. We accord these honors, and rightly so, and feel then we have not been able to fittingly express our appreciation of their splendid manhood.

And yet could you fathers and mothers who have your sons spared for your comfort and the future development of a better Americanism—could you make a more beautiful thank offering for the safe return of your lad than a gracious and generous gift to the National Benevolent Association to help it grow neglected and orphaned children into worthy Christian citizenship?

Or you fathers and mothers, who have a khaki-clad lad sleeping under the flaming poppies of France, that wave a defiance to oppression and a challenge to the world to produce a more splendid record of courage and manhood than these young crusaders who dared to spill their young life's blood that little children might have a safe world in which to live, could you erect a monument so fitting or one that would bring you so great a joy or so fully meet the approval of your lad resting "over there" as to put your bonds and money into the building, enlargement or maintenance of a home for motherless, fatherless babies? Thus you would fit a life to fill into the niche left vacant by the lad sleeping where the little white cross lifts to heaven its mute appeal for life, justice and opportunity for the oppressed.

SIGHT TO THE BLIND

"A MAN blind from his birth"! Never had he seen the light of love in his mother's eyes; never had he beheld the beauty of tree or flower, the blue of the skies or the shine of the stars—this man whom Jesus saw as He passed by.

To one who loved the light, and called Himself the Light of the world, the sight of one doomed no doubt brought special sympathy and desire to help. So John, writing long afterward tells that Jesus saw the man, remembering the look which he recognized as more than merely seeing.

Not so the disciples. Jewish at heart, and influenced by recent experiences, they asked their Teacher a very Jewish question: "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he should be born blind?" It was an interesting question and one which they wished to have definitely settled, for it was a common Jewish view that the merits or demerits of parents would appear in their children.

Jesus answered without hesitation that it was neither the man's sins nor those of his parents that had caused the lifelong affliction, but because of its presence and the great need of the man, He would make it the occasion for manifesting the work of God.

The healing that followed immediately is interesting, because in it Jesus used physical means for some reason which He did not explain. He spat upon the ground and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the man with the clay and said unto him, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam." He went away and washed and came seeing.

This is more interesting when we note that the saliva of one who had not recently broken his fast was believed by the ancients to have a healing effect in cases of weak eyes and clay was also used in certain diseases of the eye by the people of old. However, this very procedure of Jesus brought down the wrath of the Pharisees upon His head. When the young man returned, full of joy in his wonderful new experience of "seeing things," there was a tumult of excitement among the people, for he had been a blind beggar in the streets all his life. Even those who knew him best found it difficult to believe his story. Over and over to friends and neighbors he repeated it, but as it was too much for them, they made up their minds to take him to the Pharisees.

Here he was again cross-examined, and these "righteous ones," while they could not deny the greatness of the miracle, immediately became full of indignation that such a deed had been wrought on the Sabbath. The rabbis had forbidden any man to smear even one of his eyes with spittle on the Sabbath, except in cases of mortal danger and this Jesus had not only smeared both the man's eyes, but had actually mingled the saliva with clay!

There resulted a most heated discussion, in which some said, "This man is not from God, because He keepeth not the Sabbath," while others replied, "How can a man that is a sinner do such signs?" Most graphically John relates the further story, telling of the calling of the parents of the young man to testify to his being their son, born blind; of their willingness to own him, but of their fear "to say too much" lest they be put out of the synagogue; of the courageous testimony of the young man, "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind now I see," and his bold challenge to the Pharisees, "Would ye also become His disciples?"

When they could not silence him or shake his testimony they did the thing that unscrupulous power always does with brave weakness, and "cast him out." But the Great Physician heard how they had disposed of their difficulty and He sought out the young man. Happy was he to see his deliverer from physical and spiritual blindness, and to make the first great confession, "Lord, I believe."

To the south of us, our Latin American neighbors are in the spiritual darkness of sin, ignorance and superstition. The Great Physician has waited long for His followers to bear to them the light of His truth. How can they believe if they cannot see?

Let us hasten "that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, may dawn upon their blindness."

Facts for the Busy Woman

THE population of the entire world—1,600,000,000—could live within the area of Latin America without peing unduly crowded.

Latin America has the largest stretch of undeveloped fertile land in the world.

The twentieth century's most wonderful advance is predicted for Latin America.

The entire group of the twenty Latin American republic spends for education of all kinds, only as much as New York City annually spends on her schools.

More letters are mailed every day in New York City between the hours of 5 and 7 p. m., than are written in Haiti in a whole year.

In Columbia there is one doctor to every six thousand people. In the United States there is one to every five hundred.

Latin American intellectuales are known the world over for their brilliancy. But they have largely abandoned the old scientific faith and know nothing of the appeal of modern Christianity.

The United States has been distracted for several years with the Mexican question. That distraction will continue until it realizes that it is not the question of stopping a fight but the matter of solving a problem. Mexico is endeavoring to change from sixteenth century to twentieth century conditions. It is not the case of a revolution to be suppressed but of an evolution to be guided. It is the problem of slowly changing a nation into the image of God—a God whose very name is unknown to one-fifth of the population and whose Book cannot be read by four-fifths.

No nation of modern times, unless it be Armenia or Serbia, has been so decimated by war as was Paraguay in her long conflict with Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay. For years she was able to defy these three powerful neighbors, but finally their armies overran the country, spreading death and desolation.

From a former population of a million and a quarter, Paraguay was left in 1870 with only 300,000, of whom but 10,000 were men. Recovery from the awful effects of the war has been rapid, but Paraguay is still a country where women do much of the heavy work, and where social conditions among the lower classes are abnormal, due to this unbalancing of sex proportion. "The Pain of Paraguay" is the apt characterization, in a recent book, of its sad life.

Although Paraguay is often called the "Barefoot Republic," the land is poor only because of its lack of development. In climate and soil it is one of the most favored nations. Already great American packing firms have established plants to utilize the product of Paraguayan cattle ranches.

It is said that every year enough oranges rot on the ground in Paraguay to pay the national debt if they could be marketed.

Paraguay's leaders are anxious for the development of their land and people, but are fearfully hampered by the national poverty, the general ignorance and the isolation of the country from world centers of culture and commerce. These leaders are eagerly welcoming Protestant educators with the program as outlined. The government has suggested that the missionaries take over its agricultural school, and officials promise to send their children to the proposed school in Asuncion.

The responsibility for the evangelization of Paraguay has been assumed by the Disciples of Christ, who have just sent their first missionaries to the capital. They have just purchased for $35,000 a two-acre site near the heart of the city for their proposed school and institutional work.

The five-year program for Paraguay calls for: Two institutional church centers; eight churches and eight outstations; ten day schools; one high school; one agricultural school; one hospital; one orphanage and an industrial school; to be manned by fourteen foreigners and thirty-two natives.

Argentina is a well-organized country, yet it is only at the beginning of its development. It has 250,000,000 acres of tillable soil, of which only 50,000,000 are under cultivation. The whole is an extent of territory, which, if as densely populated as Italy, would contain 360,000,000 people. Buenos Aires, the third greatest city and second port in America, has the finest newspaper building in the world, together with subways, motor cars, clubs and parks, that fairly take away the stranger's breath.

All visitors to Argentina are struck with the materialism of the people. "Here the people are so indifferent to all religions that they have no time to be hostile to any." Agnostic socialism is strong and the churches are weak. A recent government census reports twenty-eight Roman-Catholic, and twelve Protestant churches in Buenos Aires, with its 1,500,000 inhabitants. Brooklyn, with the same population, has about six hundred churches. There is probably no other city in the world which has so few places of worship as Buenos Aires.

The government of Argentina has done more for education than has the government of any other Latin American country, but fifty per cent of the population is illiterate. Even in Buenos Aires forty thousand children are out of school. Yet only two small mission schools have been established in that great capital and not a dozen in all the republic.

In South America

WE did not arrive in Buenos Aires until December 10, on account of our delayed sailing from England and the slowness of the boat. We regret very much that we were not here at least by the last week in November so we could have attended the commencement exercises of Colegio Americano. It seems to have been quite an important event as there is a picture of one of the commencement scenes in a Buenos Aires magazine.

We had a very delightful surprise at Montevideo when our boat came to the dock, for there was Dr. Browning waiting to come on board as soon as the gangplank was lowered. The next day we had tea at his home, at which time we met about twenty-five missionaries and Y. M. C. A. workers of Montevideo. The next day we were invited to the Methodist Boys' School for lunch, and as they have ten months of school, we had the opportunity of seeing it in action. Before our ship left Montevideo for Buenos Aires we received a note of welcome from our group of missionaries at Buenos Aires. We arrived about eight o'clock Wednesday morning, but in spite of the early hour, our good friends were out in full force to meet us. We came immediately, accompanied by Mr. Holmes and Miss Orvis, to Colegio Americano, the place of our dreams. We are very glad to say that we found the building and the surroundings exceeding our expectations. We at once found a true friend and adviser in Miss Orvis. We are sure we shall enjoy working here. Everything possible has been done to make our coming agreeable and to make us feel at home.

Wednesday evening we went to the San Martin chapel, heard one of the native ministers preach. We enjoyed the service although we could not understand very much of the sermon. The room was packed to the doors, and there was good attention. Thursday evening we were invited to the Lemmons for dinner, and here we had an opportunity to see the Norments and Leaches again, as they are staying with Mr. and Mrs. Lemmon. After dinner we heard Mr. Lemmon preach in the chapel, and Mr. Leach sang a solo in Spanish. We think our workers all very fine people, and we are proud to belong to such a group of missionaries.

A Unique Bible Pilgrimage

A YEAR ago Chaplain Samuel C. Benson of the 59th Infantry was hiking into Germany with the Army of Occupation. Now he is hiking across New York State from Niagara Falls to New York City on a Bible pilgrimage as the representative of the American Bible Society, of which he has become the Eastern Agency Secretary. He will make the trip in his overseas uniform, carrying Bibles and Testaments instead of hard tack and corned Willie in his knapsack.

Many thousands of men, women, young people, boys and girls, living along this route across the Empire State will treasure highly the copies of the Scriptures they receive from the soldier-preacher on his mid-winter missionary journey. He plans to sell the Scriptures at cost on week-days and to give free copies away on Sundays.

Each mayor, in behalf of the citizens of each city through which Chaplain Benson will pass, will receive from him at the City Hall a handsome Bible. This pilgrimage will carry him through Buffalo, Batavia, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, Herkimer, Little Falls, Amsterdam, Schenectady, Troy, Albany, Poughkeepsie, Cold Spring, Yonkers, and a large number of smaller cities and villages.

In each city and village through which he will pass, the Chaplain will give a Bible address, speaking in both large and small churches, Y. M. C. A. auditoriums, from the steps of City Halls, and on the streets. Hundreds of thousands of people who have never given much thought to the Bible before hearing this eloquent young veteran will go home to open reverently the pages of the Word of God and to offer sincere prayers for the blessing of God on the tremendous task of the American Bible Society in its world-wide efforts to distribute the Scriptures to the waiting millions, and especially to every home in America.

At each town Chaplain Benson will enlist eleven other Christians who will accompany him to the next stopping place on his route, where another company of believers will be recruited to continue the Bible pilgrimage.

Chaplain Benson will follow as nearly as practicable the Scriptural injunction, "Provide neither gold nor silver nor brass in your purse, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves, for the workman is worthy of his keep." He says that on his arrival in each town he will accept the night's entertainment from the first person who invites him, whether he be a hod carrier or a millionaire—and he has often been entertained by both.

The Chaplain expects to arouse interest in the Bible cause throughout the state, and to increase not only the reading of the Scriptures but also the gifts of individuals who desire to promote the world-wide work of the American Bible Society in supplying the Scriptures printed in over 150 languages and dialects.

Naotaro Otsuka and Family

NAOTARO OTSUKA spent twenty years in America endeavoring to get an education. He worked his way through Bethany and Yale. When he had completed his academic work he returned to Japan to give his own people a knowledge of Christ and salvation through Christ. In the time of the war he accompanied the Japanese troops to France and served as interpreter. Before the war he was in the service of the Foreign Society. Since his return home he has been teaching in Drake Bible College and in Waseda University. His wife is a beautiful and accomplished woman and in every way his equal. Their three children are fine, healthy lads. Being trained in a Christian home, it is hoped they will follow in the footsteps of their parents even as their parents follow in the footsteps of Jesus Christ.

Saving Americans for America

AMERICANIZATION is one thing and saving our own Americans is another.

On a little farm, an inheritance from a former generation, located near a small town in one of king cotton's states, lived the Wayne family, consisting of father and mother Wayne and the following little Waynes, ranging in age all the way from two to fourteen years: Lois, Esther, Fannie, James and Mildred.

Like many of our Southland and congested city families, this one was poor and the parents though refined and respectable found it difficult to provide adequately for their children. During cotton picking time this devoted little mother helped her husband in the fields and thus together they were able to keep the home going as long as health permitted.

Constant work and a lack of a wholesome, balanced diet proved too much for the father's constitution, which broke completely—he was a victim of that dread disease, pelagra, the result of inadequate nutrition.

This state of affairs drove the mother to the fields to be the breadwinner for the family and forced on the fourteen-year-old daughter responsibilities too great for a strong adult. She assumed the household duties, the care of the sick father as well as the care of the smaller children. With all this effort it was not possible to meet expenses and one mortgage after another had to be given on the small farm. Finally, to provide the barest necessities, the land was sold. Imagine, if you can, the awfulness of the feeling of despair and utter desolation this little group must have suffered when they were forced from their only home into a mere little shack on the outskirts of the town. Perhaps you do not know what a shack looks like. It is the crudest sort of a one-room hut constructed from the roughest grade of timber, having shutter windows and an unfinished interior. A shed or leanto served as the kitchen—in this mother earth was the only floor. You will not wonder that the invalid father lingered only a short time after this fatal move.

For several weeks the little boy had typhoid fever. Even with the assistance of some ladies the little family finally had to depend on the charity of the town. A letter was written asking the home at St. Louis to take this mother and her children.

On August 1, 1914, just four weeks from the date of the letter, they knocked at the door of our St. Louis Home. Picture, if you can, a more pathetic scene than this physically frail, careworn mother with a sick baby, a little boy weakened by typhoid fever, the three girls all victims of anaemia.

Their physical needs demanded our first attention. For weeks they were fed five times each day. Their teeth were taken care of, requiring the expenditure of several hundred dollars. Even those of us who are accustomed to seeing people made new under changed conditions were most gratified to see the four oldest children able to enter school in September. After several months of rest, helping when she could, the mother was able to adjust herself to the new conditions and be of valuable service in the home.

Early conditions and hardships had crushed out the natural, youthful spontaneity and plasticity of the two oldest girls, so that it was not possible for them to make the required per cent to receive the diplomas even though they did reach the eighth grade. This, of course, was a disappointment to all concerned. Fannie, the ten-year-old girl, graduated from the eighth grade this year with a creditable average, and James is in the sixth grade, which is good for his years.

The mother, who had constantly hoped to some day re-establish the home, felt safe to return to her native town and because of the experience and training she had had in the home in the care of the sick, she was able through the cooperation of the Red Cross to secure work as a practical nurse.

The oldest daughter is a saleswoman in one of the town stores and thus supplementing the mother's efforts they are together able with the help of the next daughter, who has the oversight of the housekeeping and the care of the younger children, to keep the home.

You who believe in saving Americans may look through your imaginations into this newly rebuilt American home and see developing in a normal way the five children who now promise to be able later to accept their responsibilities as useful American citizens. All that was needed was a stay until this little group could "grow to it." They are now in a position to attract and choose good, wholesome companions and friends; to want and provide better home conditions; to practice better habits of living there by exerting helpful influences over others.

Our home is happy to have been your instrument in rendering a service that has saved both physically and mentally this worthy family of our own Americans for America.

Three Special Workers Needed for the Congo

A Steamboat Captain, a Printer, and an Industrial Manager

OUR African Mission is in almost desperate need of some special missionaries just now. They need:

1. An experienced printer who will take charge of the printing of books, leaflets, Sunday school supplies, Scriptures, and hymn books.

2. They need a special man to run the new saw mill and get out the lumber and material for the construction of the new buildings in their ten-year program. This man will need to superintend the native workman and plan materials for the whole building program.

3. Men are needed who have had practical experience in building houses and general construction. Such a man or two would greatly relieve the missionaries who have been trained for their work and do not understand building.

4. The Mission is in great need of a man who has had some experience with engines and can be captain of a steamboat and train the natives in mechanics. The gospel steamer is a great avenue for Christian service.

Who will answer these urgent calls?

Write the Foreign Christian Missionary Society or the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, or to D. O. Cunningham, Candidate Secretary, College of Missions Building, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Christian Woman's Board of Missions

Thank Offering

FOR a quarter of a century the women of the Woman's Missionary Societies have observed the memorable week preceding Easter, with prayer and thank offerings. In 1895 Mrs. Burgess wrote an article which was published in the Missionary Tidings, in which she suggested a thank offering be made by the women in recognition of the twenty-first birthday of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Out of her suggestion has grown the week of prayer and Easter thank offering.

The observance of the Week of Prayer brings the workers apart with the Master for counsel with Him. It gives a quiet time in which to prayerfully plan for the future, while we give thanks for the past, and it opens all hearts to a glad affirmative answer to the Master's question, "Lovest thou me?"

Since this is the silver anniversary of this unique occasion, every member of every society should bring to her Master a worthy offering of thanksgiving. How the women have loved the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, through the years. Should not our offerings at this Easter time be in proportion to that love?

Children are being turned away from the doors of our orphanages, boys and girls must be told they cannot enter our schools, hospitals are filled to the limit, and missionaries are begging for more workers and more equipment. It is evident that ordinary methods and ordinary giving will not suffice. The giving of money has been called "the acid test of consecration." Mr. W. E. Doughty says, "No part of our Christian program is more spiritual than securing the needed money; but only if it is done in the right way. Prayer is the greatest human influence in raising money."

Woman's Missionary Society

Following the observance of the Easter Week of Prayer the Continuous Calling Campaign should be again pressed with renewed energy. No doubt on Easter Sunday there will be a large ingathering in all churches and these new members should be visited and urged to at once become identified with the various organizations of the church. Begin at once to conserve all the results of the evangelist campaign. A working church is a live church and best results can be gained through organized effort.

Enlisting Women

The local secretary should have a complete list of the women and young women who should be enrolled in the Woman's Missionary Society and Young Woman's Missionary Circle. Divide the names among the division leaders. The division leaders will then assign callers for certain women. Women who have heretofore declined to become members of a missionary society, as well as the new women, can be won if tactfully led to realize the importance of missionary work.

Where the Division Plan is not being used, the president of the local society should give the names to women who are deeply interested and enthusiastic about organized missionary work. It is advisable for them to go two by two. These callers should go into the homes in the attitude of prayer and for the one purpose of winning women to give more definitely of their time, talents and means to help save the world.

All callers should have in mind some striking facts of needs in different foreign countries as well as in the homeland.

Call attention to special articles in the WORLD CALL, and if the paper is not coming to that home, leave a marked copy.

Tell what the local church should be doing in response to the great call of the world. Tell about the fine features of the local missionary society's work and of the splendid women who are members.

Urge membership for the sake of the woman herself, not for what her offerings will do, or in order to reach an aim for the society. Some will hesitate to give their names for membership for fear they may be asked to take parts on programs at the monthly meetings. Such women should be assured that their presence at the meetings will be an inspiration and encouragement, even though they at first cannot take places on the programs. As they become better informed about the work and the part Christian women must take to help carry the message of love to all the world, they will accept their parts gladly. She in turn will go out after others. Our aim for two hundred thousand women by 1921 will be reached if every member of the society will assume her responsibility. Dare we do less than win one woman for this great world task?

Cooperation in Extension Work

Hundreds of new missionary societies should be organized before the close of this missionary year.

This can only be done by the fullest possible cooperation of all members of the local societies. Study plans outlined for Extension work in your district and county. Appoint women to visit churches where there is no missionary society, calling on the leading women of the church, and telling of the great work being done and of the many open doors where millions are waiting; and we must now hasten or the door of opportunity will close. Carefully selected literature should be left with each non-cooperating church. Such literature should be left in care of a woman who will see that it is circulated.

Women of the local society should count it a real privilege to be asked to assist in the cultivation of non-cooperating churches. Let this service be a small expression of appreciation for all the blessings that have come through the great missionary organization.

Young Woman's Missionary Circles

Our Circles grieve to know of the sorrow which has lately come to our former leader, Mrs. Esther Treudley Johnson. Mrs. Johnson is well loved by all of us who know her and were led by her; and it is with heavy hearts that we have learned of her loss.

Only recently there had come to Circle Headquarters a letter from Mrs. Johnson written from Constantinople in December. With her old-time friendliness she asked to be remembered to all the Circle girls; "and tell them," she said, "that from this angle, right on the mission field, there is nothing quite so interesting, and surely nothing more important than missionary service." Mrs. Johnson had been teaching English classes in a girls' school in Constantinople for awhile and knew whereof she spoke. Her enthusiasm was even greater than of old.

Our Circle girls are remembering Mrs. Johnson with love and prayer throughout these days.

With the close of March the first half of our international year of 1919-1920 has come to an end. It is a timely moment for each Circle to pause and take account of how far it has progressed since October and of what must still be done in the coming six months if aims are to be realized. Each organization could not do better than to thus study itself at the April meeting and to make thoughtful plans for the completion of its work by next October.

On the practical side we are striving to win more members and to give more generously than ever before. But let us never forget our deeper purpose to think largely, to see widely, and to serve outreachingly as we have not in the past.

One of the ways which will accomplish this is the consistent reading of the splendid books at our disposal. Needful, changing, new-molding phases of world life are set forth in interesting and in formative style. Knowledge obtained from systematic perusal of such books will be translated into missionary enthusiasm and activity. No Circle should fail to guide its members in individual reading as a supplement to the monthly program material.

Two new leaflets are just published for our organizations. They are "Circles at Work" and "Winning Girls." The former discusses ways and means of enlisting the activity of the largest number of Circle members. The latter deals with effective methods of interesting girls in our work. They are written by an experienced state Circle worker and will be of value to every group interested in such live topics. The leaflets may be secured from the Literature Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for three cents each.

The Triangle Clubs report pleasure in their task of serving our Mexican orphanage this year. They are also busy and interested in pursuing their study of our mission work in China.

400 Colleges in Interchurch Campaign

FOUR hundred colleges and universities are participating in the Interchurch World Movement. Upon them is the burden of preparing for their work the 100,000 volunteers for Christian life service who must be recruited during the next five years if the Interchurch program of Christian expansion is to be carried out as planned.

Our Chance in the Magic Cities of West Virginia

By HIRAM N. VANVOORHIS, District Evangelist

"THE COG CITY" is the pseudonym by which the thriving capital city of West Virginia prefers to be known. From an egotistic standpoint, the average Charlestonian might say that his city is so known because it is the cog wheel or hub about which all the other cities of the state revolve, but such an allegation might offend Huntington. The real significance of the nickname "Cog City", is that the first letter chosen from each of the three words that mean most to the industrial life of Charleston, spell the word "cog", and the three words in question, as any good guesser of conundrums might discover, are "coal, oil, and gas." To these natural products nursed from the bosom of Mother Earth, might, with equal propriety, be added salt and timber, but they would spoil the spelling of Charleston's favorite designation.

Coal, oil, gas, salt and timber, these gifts of nature have conspired to make Charleston an ideal manufacturing center, in fact the heart of a splendid industrial section extending in all directions for many miles; with a population of close to forty thousand, which is mounting upwards weekly; with two splendid railway systems and some minor lines, with two interurban electric railways and two navigable rivers; with a healthy mountain climate; with capital unsurpassed and a hustling citizenry; with a religious life preponderantly evangelical and protestant; with schools unexcelled anywhere in West Virginia, Charleston offers exceptional advantages to commerce and manufacture, and is attracting nation-wide attention on the part of new enterprises seeking a suitable location.

Uncle Sam took cognizance of all these facts when he decided to build his mammoth seventy-million-dollar munitions establishment at Nitro, sixteen miles west of Charleston, and when he selected South Charleston, located within the bounds of Greater Charleston, as the permanent location for his United States Naval Ordnance Plant upon which he is now expending millions upon millions of dollars.

Furthermore, it was recognition of the rapid growth, not only of Charleston, but of other splendid communities in Kanawha County, bringing a steady influx of people into this section, that caused the West Virginia Christian Missionary Society and the American Christian Missionary Society last April to locate an evangelist in Charleston, jointly supported by those two organizations. Their judgment was the result of surveys of the field conducted by our two pastors in Charleston, C. N. Williams and R. W. Lilley; by John R. Clark, state secretary; by Grant K. Lewis, secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, and by the writer. Their verdict has since been confirmed by separate reviews of the field made by I. J. Cahill, Ohio state secretary, and by Frederick W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society.

The evangelist, practically without any equipment except some song books, is doing his best to spread himself out over the industrial communities of Kanawha County, outside of Charleston proper, gathering together such nuclei of Disciples as he is able to discover, founding mission points, preaching in lodge rooms, moving picture theaters, school houses and, in one community, the dining room of a hotel.

The following communities are worth a few words of description in an article of even this brief scope:

Dunbar: Located six or eight miles west of Charleston, equidistant between the capitol and Nitro. Bear in mind, please, that Charleston, Dunbar and Nitro are all on the northern bank of the Kanawha, whereas all the other communities mentioned are on the southern shore. Dunbar is connected with the capital city by means of an electric line which maintains a half-hour service. Two big glass plants and one enameled ware factory of considerable dimensions furnish employment for the citizens of Dunbar. To these industries are soon to be added the Dunbar Rubber Tire Company and also a concern for manufacturing tractors. Only one completely built church is to be found in this thriving community, although two other congregations have obtained a foothold. A suitable room in which to meet is all that precludes the Disciples from making a beginning in Dunbar.

Nitro: Completed just ten days before the armistice was signed. Built at a cost of $70,000,000; turned out six million pounds of powder before hostilities ceased; embraces a total of 737 manufacturing buildings, together with housing accommodations for 20,000 workers, and with all the utilities and civic improvements of a modern American city. Covers a space of eighteen hundred acres. Recently knocked down to a syndicate of Charleston capitalists for a song, the chorus of which is set to the refrain of $8,500,000 (approximately). Although Nitro in its balmy days had a population running up into the tens of thousands, it is now practically a forsaken city; but the syndicate that now owns Nitro and maintains an armed government guard over it, plans to dispose of it to certain large vested interests, and hopes to see a population of 25,000 people thronging its gates within a year's time. Owing to the present deserted condition of this city, we are attempting nothing definite there. We are waiting for the crowds to come.

Saint Albans: Population in 1910, only 1,200. Located twelve miles from Charleston, diagonally across the Kanawha from Nitro. An old, old community, but one that has experienced a recent growth proportionately as great as Charleston's. East of the Coal River division of the C. & O. railway, which enters St. Albans from the south, is a new residential section which will rival the older portion of the city in size. This whole neighborhood is unchurched and will make an ideal location for a New Testament church, the nucleus for which is already meeting regularly in the Knights of Pythias Hall in St. Albans, under the pastoral oversight of the evangelist.

On the night of November 25, Ex-Governor Wm. A. MacCorgle, speaking in that city before the Chamber of Commerce, said: "Take the matter at your very door, the great Coal River basin. I have worked forty years in the Coal River Valley, all of which will be the city of Saint Albans in the years to come. Within a short time no man will call this a town, but it will be third or fourth city of the state. We've been developing this valley, but it is only partly developed. Six million tons of coal come out of that valley, passing through St. Albans. Still, you have just begun. You're getting all this coal from only three places, Marsh Fork, Horse Creek, and Clothier. You are sitting here with this vast empire of coal behind you, the greater part of which has not been touched . . . . You have here over 500,000 acres of the best coal in the world with developments at only three places. All this valley will make its developments through St. Albans, and when the developments are completed you will have a pulsating city of 25,000 inhabitants."

President Burnham was much impressed with what he saw of South Saint Albans on November 23 and 24.

Highlawn: A small but beautiful suburb, springing up near East Saint Albans as one travels toward Charleston. The Virginian Rubber Company is soon to construct a modern plant at Highlawn. We expect that some of their employes will come from Akron, Ohio. If so, there will doubtless be a number of Disciples in the lot. Our hope is that Highlawn will be a feeder for our prospective congregation in East Saint Albans.

Spring Hill: A bustling residential community, the older portion of which is older than Charleston. Located midway between Charleston and Saint Albans. Two thousand people there now and more coming. Has a large community of new homes absolutely unchurched. Only one church in the old part of the town. Is expanding gradually toward South Charleston. Fine factory sites. Good prospects for rapid growth.

South Charleston: Scene of the Government's two-hundred-acre project known as the United States Naval Ordnance Plant. Connected with Charleston by means of a fast, double-tracked interurban line upon which frequent service is maintained. A string of eight or ten cars, all loaded to capacity, running between the two cities, is no uncommon sight. Also connected with Spring Hill, Highlawn and Saint Albans by means of the same interurban system.

The Government plans to manufacture all its own armor plate here. In addition, Uncle Sam will make projectiles and large guns in this plant. About 23,000 tons of structural steel are now being erected into enormous buildings under contract let to the American Bridge Company. The projectile plant, which can turn out a projectile weighing 2,200 pounds, is already in full swing, and, to utilize this, a gun of 16-inch diameter, capable of throwing that projectile twenty-five miles, will be made on the spot. A 14,000-ton press, the largest in the world, will be part of the equipment, as will also six miles of railway track. The heat treatment building will be higher than the tallest skyscraper in Charleston.

The making of chemicals and dyes and the manufacture of glass are also industries of considerable magnitude at South Charleston.

To this suburb of five thousand souls will be added other hundreds, possibly thousands of people, thus offering a handsome opportunity for the eventual planting of a Church of Christ. Negotiations are now under way for the rental of a suitable hall in South Charleston for our people.

Kanawha City: Located three or four miles eastward of Charleston. Home of the Owens Glass Bottle Company, and of the Libby-Owens Window Glass Company. Splendid new town, absolutely unchurched, except for two churches in what was once open country, midway between Charleston and Kanawha City. Our evangelist is preaching two Sunday nights a month in the dining room of a hotel in the heart of Kanawha City.

Cabin Creek Junction: Sixteen miles east of Charleston. Connected, as Kanawha City, with Charleston by a splendid electric line. Home of one of the largest and finest electrical power plants in America, furnishing electricity for Charleston and for the mining and industrial enterprises, electric lines, etc., for twenty-five or fifty miles in every direction. Gateway for the Cabin Creek coal fields with an estimated population of 20,000. Cabin Creek Junction, East Chelyan and Coalburgh form practically one community, wholly unchurched. Your evangelist is preaching twice a month in a picture show in East Chelyan, and conducts an occasional mid-week service in Coalburgh. We have a small nucleus of brethren with which to work at each point.

We have not the space to consider more of these splendid fields. We have not touched at all upon our opportunities in the rural sections, nor in the mining districts up and down the many creeks and valleys of old Kanawha. We have not told of our Aimwell Church, which we won back through the courts, after we had been locked out of it by some obstreperous, non-cooperating brethren. We have not said a word about the whole of Cabin Creek, a populous mining community stretching out into the hills of Kanawha County for twenty or more miles, and which has been characterized by Governor John Cornwell of West Virginia, as the I. W. W. stronghold of our state, and into which territory we ought to send a full-time missionary at once. It was out of this country that an armed battalion of fifteen hundred miners marched, not so many weeks ago, into the Logan field, with the idea of compelling the operators of that district to submit to having their mines unionized. Our governor stated that, if this overt act were repeated he would regard it as an open rebellion against the constituted authorities of West Virginia, and would deal with it accordingly.

We are working with our hands tied, so far as equipment is concerned. President Burnham recognized our immediate need of a folding organ, and a tent in which to hold meetings, or a portable tabernacle completely equipped which could be moved from community to community. He also saw the necessity for our buying two or three lots in as many different live towns, where we hope to plant churches of the New Testament pattern—for buying them now while they can be obtained at a price somewhere within reason.

Above all, we need an interest in the prayers of our brethren all over the country.

Shall We Shut the Door?

THIS question is one that comes to the mission board frequently in these days: Can we give the missionaries full opportunity to do the best things for the people, or must we constantly hold them back? Which will be better? Which is the most reasonable thing? What would the Master say?

When the school is full shall we say we cannot increase the size of it? When the orphanage supplies do not hold out shall we turn the children away to continue in their need? When our hospitals have only a few beds, and many need Christian care and guidance, what shall we say? We must face the question in regard to that home of ours in Kulpahar, India. Read what Miss Mary Clarke says about present conditions. She wrote on the last day of the old year:

"My big family keeps me busy, increasingly so, as it grows bigger and bigger. This is the last day of the old year and I have just written the roll for the next month. Instead of one hundred and thirty, or forty, as the number in the home used to be, we have now two hundred and six. Sixty-four of this number are small children, thirty-three boys and thirty-one girls. Thirty of these have mothers in the institution. We have great hopes of these children, and of the older ones too, but the children have more of life before them and they can be educated. There have been more than two hundred and six in the home during the year, but a good many babies have died, and some women and girls have been settled.

"We have far and away overspent the money allowed us for food and clothing this year. We are wondering what you will have to say to us, and whether you will think we are doing right in taking in so many women and children. Both Miss Vance and I find it very hard to refuse admission to any one. It seems to us a poor game to turn any away while we pray that people may become Christian. It is hard to win people to Christ where they are wedded to idols, and are enchained in caste.

"We had big doings at Christmas. The mission allowed us Rs. 500 for bedding, so every one in the place received a red or brown blanket as a Christmas gift from the mission. All are delighted and thank you all at home for this gift. Friends in England are sending a box for us, but as Mr. Menzies could not get out in time we could not give the girls and children the little gifts they are sending on Christmas day. One of the churches sent a gift of paper for our blind class, a welcome gift. This came by post, and was delivered here Christmas day. Perhaps some Christian Endeavor Society or Sunday school in the United States might like to send us more by the missionaries who are returning this year. To visitors this blind class seems to be the most interesting of all.

"Our little children looked so gay for Christmas. Each had new clothes, and each boy a red waistcoat and gay colored cap. They were the happiest children alive, and the proudest too."

An Appreciation

THE Bible school at Canton, Ohio, is delighted to give a helping hand to the work of the National Benevolent Association. We believe there is no more urgent need than caring for the widow and the orphan, and serving the sick and the aged. This is practical Christianity. Nothing else makes so strong an appeal as the hunger of a little child. We are commanded to do good unto all men, especially those of the household of faith. And again, we are told that "He that provideth not for his own, has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

Children in our orphanages, the aged in our homes, and the sick in our hospitals are our own. They belong to our household of faith. It is not only a duty, but it is a joy to minister to their needs. Tender appeals always touch the human heart, and there are none more tender than that of the National Benevolent Association.

P. H. WELSHIMER.

A Little Teacher

THE following may be of interest to those who are working for our home at Atlanta, Georgia:

Our children attend Highland Avenue Grammar School. Some time ago one of the principals was asked how the children were getting along, and what was thought of them, that is, how they compared with the other children attending school. The reply was that they were different in these respects: that they were cleaner, better behaved and with lessons more thoroughly prepared than the average of children at the school.

While visiting the home a few days ago, the writer was conducted quietly into one of the bedrooms (unfortunately we have no spare or play room for the children in the building now being used), and found a little girl, about nine years of age, seated in a large chair and playing the part of school mistress. She had under her direction about twenty-five children, seated in chairs, all intent on the instruction which she was giving them. The teaching talent displayed by this little girl was wonderful. It would almost pay to make a long trip to Atlanta to witness this scene, if you are a child lover.

A Bundle of Love Letters

HERE are a few letters written by members of the family of Havens Home for the Aged to Miss E. E. Gould, Junior Superintendent of the Temple Bible School, Wellsville, New York:

"I think it is very kind of you to so kindly remember us here in the Havens Home with gifts. It is a pleasure to receive and enjoy them. It is a great comfort for us to know that we are so kindly remembered. I have been a resident of the home for four years. I am contented, feel I have a home and have good friends to care for me.

"MARY B. FLOWER."

"I have just heard of the great interest you are taking in our home. We appreciate it beyond anything which mere words can express. Our superintendent and matron have so much ability in various directions that they provide for our comfort and pleasure in a remarkable degree. They could not do that if it were not for their brains and kind hands. We hope and pray that you will continue interested in the work and that eventually, at least, we will meet in the better land just as soon as our Savior takes us by the hand and leads safely across the great river which we have to cross.

"MRS. E. G. GETZENDANNER."

"As I am too old to write, being eighty-four, Miss Cooley is writing for me. I have been here just ten years this month, and came from Columbus, Indiana. W. H. Book was my pastor there. I have had seven children and they are all dead but one, and I am afraid he, too, is dead for I have not heard from him for a long time. My father was an old-time minister, but I have almost forgotten about things so long ago. AUNTIE COOK."

"I have been in the home now about four years and I like it; am thankful for being taken good care of. I have not had a father since I was five months old and I have had a hard time. I am happy in the home and well cared for. I help wash the dishes with the others when my day comes and help the nurse carry the trays and do other little things to help. I am willing to do anything when asked. MISS ALICE HARDY."

"Just a few lines to say that I am at the Havens Home and a lovely home it is. I have been here over two years; if I should live until the fifth of March, I will be here three years. I have never felt as though I wanted to go away. I don't get away from home. I suffer very much with rheumatism. I don't walk any distance, though I am perfectly satisfied to stay at home, they are all so good and kind to us here. It is a pleasant place, a nice house, nice lawn, and a big garden in summer. I am now eighty years old. I am perfectly happy and hope I shall always be while I live. We have services here at the home Sunday afternoons. That makes it pleasant. Thanking you for your kindly interest. MRS. G. A. KREIDLER."

"I have been a resident of the home now for about four years and have seen quite a number of changes in that time, but I think the last change, namely the appointment of R. A. Burriss and his wife, of Port Arthur, Canada, as superintendent and matron, has resulted in the greatest improvement in the home and of the greatest benefit to all the inmates. I came from Philadelphia, where I lived all my life up to four years ago, being connected with the First Church of Christ.

"A. R. SCOTT."

"Yesterday our superintendent gave us a kind message requesting us to write letters to some of the Bible schools so that you may become better acquainted with us personally and to get a glimpse of our home. Although under age, I came here at the suggestion of Mr. Mohorter, who saw me struggling against heavy odds to take care of myself. I prepared to teach, graduating from Valparaiso University in 1912. Since then I have taught in Kentucky and North Dakota. I have been handicapped greatly on account of my lameness, as many of the states refuse to employ lame women. I was in very bad health when I came here three years ago, but am much better. Last winter I went to Niagara county and taught in a private family, completing the school year. I thoroughly enjoyed the work. While not able wholly to care for myself, I have a good home here. Our excellent superintendent and his estimable wife are doing all they can to make the people in their care comfortable and happy. Mr. Burriss has given the Christian Church here some delightful sermons. He is not only an able speaker but is an all-round good business man. God was very kind to send these people to us. MISS HARRIET MATHENY."

"My wife and I came here to the home about four years ago. I was entirely blind in one eye and nearly so in the other at that time. About two years ago the Board had the one eye operated on, and it was finally successful. I can see to get about, although not seeing very distinctly. Yet it is very better than being entirely blind, of that I am glad. My wife died about two years ago and it left me very lonely. She was a good little woman who always did her part to help me on. Thanking you for your interest,

"J. EDWARDS."

"I am seventy-eight years old tomorrow and too poorly to write, so Miss Cooley will write for me and tell you how I want to send my love to you. I am always very much pleased with the little letters we get from you. I came here a year before it was a regular home like it is now, and I was so sick that Mr. Colgate, brother of the big soap manufacturer, carried me in and I have been here ever since. I am sick in bed now, although I have been so I could go about town until a few months ago. I think we have a lovely superintendent and matron to fill the position. MRS. EMMA HILDRETH."

"My memory is so bad I cannot remember very much. But I know I had lived in Washington, D. C., for a long time, ever since I was a young girl. I was married there and united with the church in Washington over twenty-five years ago. My husband was a building contractor and has been dead twelve years. I have here a little room by myself and all my meals are carried to me by my nurse, for I am eighty-two years of age. I have been here a year now and am very fond of my nurse. MRS. ALLEN."

"I am the last to come into this home and am over eighty years old, and fifty years a widow. I came from the old Dutch Fork Christian Church, organized in 1834, and only six miles from Bethany. I have often listened to Alexander Campbell and other noted men. About a year ago I dislocated my hip and it is with the greatest difficulty that I can step at all, and as I am so nearly helpless, I belong to the tray division and have my meals brought to me. I have no one to care for me and I am very glad of the care I have here.

"MRS. MARGARET MCQUOWN."

"As I cannot write I am having this letter written for me. I began to get blind last January and slowly my sight went away until now I am totally blind, as well as deaf. About eleven years ago I was taken with rheumatism and after ten months in Valparaiso Hospital I came to the Havens Home on two crutches and here I have been ever since. I love the people of the home, both the officials and the inmates, and they are all kind to me. I was born in Canada but came to Tonawanda in the 80's. About thirty-four years ago I obeyed my Lord in baptism and since then I have done what I could in church work and here in the home after I recovered from the rheumatism. Before I was blind I helped all I could about the grounds and in the garden. I appreciate very much all that the dear brotherhood is doing for us.

"THOMAS CREEKMORE."

"I have had letters from some of the little people of your school and take pleasure in remembering them. I came a stranger from Ohio to this state. In addition I might say that I have been in the home for nearly six years. During all that time I have suffered much from rheumatism. Lately I have had less pain and believe that in answer to prayer God has relieved me. Mr. Burriss certainly has accomplished a great deal since he came and is trying to do all he can for our comfort. The churches, too, in this section of the brotherhood have responded so beautifully to his requests it certainly does make us feel that however lonely we may be there are those who truly have our interests at heart. Thanking you for the interest you have had in us during the years past, I pray God's blessing upon God's children in the Temple Bible School, whether they are young or old; we are His little ones, I think.

"HATTIE A. COOLEY."

"I am very well for an old lady. I have been away for two months. I have been at the home less than four years and like it very well. We are all well cared for. I am seventy-four years old. My home was in Mansfield, Pennsylvania.

"MRS. ELIZA JAQUITH."

"Being one of the residents of the home, and at your request, I make an effort with some of the others of the family to write to you a little letter. Glad to know you are kindly interested in us. I have been here since 1914. I am sixty years old. I have got a good home and am contented and happy.

"MRS. S. M. MYERS."

"In answer to your request I am pleased to write you of our home. In the month of May, 1919, Mr. and Mrs. Burriss came to us as our superintendent and matron. Since coming their only desire has been to make us happy and comfortable. Mr. Burriss is one of God's noblemen and Mrs. Burriss kind and motherly. How we do appreciate them. Our home is a paradise, surrounded by great old apple trees, flowers and shrubbery. Our home stands well back from the street and is approached by a semi-circular driveway, apple trees on both sides, and a beautiful lawn in between in the shape of a crescent. The building is four stories high with wide porch across the front, where we live during the summer months; flowers and vines cling across the whole front of the porch. The house will accommodate twenty-five people, with those in charge and the help, making thirty. The officials are hoping to enlarge the building as so many poor ones are begging for admission. May the good Lord aid their efforts. I am sixty-eight years old and have been here four years. Before coming my doctor gave me two months to live, but the kind care I have received here has made me some better, though I can never be well. I wish I could. I wish you all could visit us. I hope I have not wearied you with my long letter. MRS. M. J. NEAR."

"As one of the residents of the Havens Home, hearing that you were interested in us, I thought I would write you and tell you a little about myself at the home. I came here from Detroit, Michigan, about five years ago at the age of seventy-seven. Although past eighty, I still have an interest in life. About a year ago we attended a meeting of the Red Cross at a neighbor's. I pieced twenty-two crib quilts and three large ones; I did enjoy it very much. The Lord has greatly blessed us by sending us two lovely Christian people to take care of the home. Our superintendent, Mr. Burriss, is not only a good speaker, but can turn his hand to almost anything. Mr. and Mrs. Burriss are doing all in their power to make us comfortable and happy. I know that we are very kindly remembered by the generous donations that are coming in.

"MISS K. E. WALSH."

"I am glad I am able to write at my age, eighty-seven. I came to the home in 1912. Have been a widow for fifty years, taking care of myself until I was obliged to give up work, though I am not idle by any means. I take my turn washing dishes. I don't see any more to do sewing, for my eyes have failed the last year; the sight is entirely gone from the left eye, but I can tat. I am sending you a sample of my work. I am doing that to earn money for my church offering. We have a beautiful little church in this town. I go to services every Lord's day. I think I have written enough about that. Now I must tell you something of our home. Our home is a beautiful one, with a splendid lawn and garden. Our garden was something wonderful this summer. We have fruit of different kinds, such as grapes, currants, raspberries and twelve apple trees. The apple trees failed to produce fruit this year, nothing but leaves. Some apples have been sent in and we are so thankful. I hope some friends will send some more. The only fault with our home is it is too small, but we are looking forward to having a new building.

"MRS. M. R. DICK."

Southern Christian Home, Atlanta

A GREAT start has been made by the officers and Board of the National Benevolent Association toward providing a home for the orphans and destitute children of our southeastern states. A splendid location has been provided by the purchase of the Waldo home, consisting of about five acres of land in the heart of Inman Park, one of the most exclusive residence sections. This lot is on high ground and the second story windows of the new building will give a view of nearly the entire city.

It is intended that this home shall at first take care of one hundred children and later on of probably two hundred. The grounds will be laid off artistically, with driveway and walks by our architect, Mr. Lynch, and it is hoped that none of the many grand old oak trees will have to be sacrificed in arranging for the building or for the driveways.

With the assistance of our good friends of the Southeast, it is planned to erect a beautiful building, which, taken with the surroundings, will be a real show place, not only for the citizens of Atlanta, but for visitors to the city as well. In this way, we hope to become better and more widely known as a church organization than we could possibly anticipate by other means.

It may be said that the local board of managers have given unhesitatingly of their time and means for the last ten years in helping to arrange for this home, and now that their hopes and prayers are about to be realized, it is their intention to do more effective work for it in the future, if it be possible, than heretofore.

We hope that our people are preparing for the Easter offering for the Southern Christian Home in a way that will bring happiness to all who are interested in it. While our people have been generous in the past, the need is now greater than ever before, as the cost of maintaining the home and caring properly for the children has more than doubled in the last three years. If our people could but realize the necessity for the permanent establishment of this home, and how gladly every manifestation of interest is received, their hearts would be opened, and the necessary amount to erect and equip our building would be immediately available. J. C. GENTRY.

Nevada Leads in Supporting Ministry

NEVADA is the star of all the states in supporting its Christian ministers. The per capita contribution to pastors' salaries, which earns this distinction for the state, averages $11.12 a year for each church member.

The Interchurch World Movement also announces that of the country's 200,000 evangelical ministers, a great majority receive less than the officially estimated minimum annual requirement for the support of an American family in moderate comfort.

New Jersey ranks first among the states in the average salary paid its clergymen, with Massachusetts second. The average salary in New Jersey is $1,270 a year. This is less than $25 a week, or below the average pay of a stenographer in Newark.

Annie Street Colored Church, Ft. Worth, Texas

Eleven Years Ago, and Now

By Arby W. Jacobs

Minister Annie Street Colored Christian Church, Fort Worth, Texas

THE steady South breezes which characterize the summers in Texas unveiled the clear blue sky on the 6th of June, 1909, and the warm sunshine fell upon a little congregation of black folks who had agreed for a meeting to organize a church. We can not doubt that the spirit of Jesus was leading them as we trace each event from then till now.

Fort Worth was a town of more than seventy thousand inhabitants. William H. Littles, a Christian, believed that among so great a number as that surely, there could be found, ten who had accepted the simple teachings of the New Testament faith, first delivered on Pentecost, and wearing the one name Christian. He expressed his desire to W. M. Alphin, State Evangelist of Texas, by letter, which resulted in his coming. It was learned that no Colored minister of the Church of Christ had at any time entered the city to preach, therefore the pure Gospel was a strange message. The first ten days were spent in making personal calls upon those who had been located and fixing the time for organization.

There were twenty-one present that day. It was a great meeting. Each one was glad to meet the other and filled with joy to begin a work so important as that of the church.

The first three months were spent in the Masonic Temple. After that it moved to a little abandoned church which had been occupied by some white folks in a Negro settlement. A big bend in Sycamore Creek was used to baptize the first convert, W. M. Tucker, now State Evangelist of Oklahoma.

Conditions became such that this house could no longer be used for services and the little congregation wandered across town to the South side. Mr. George Webb, who now sleeps in endless rest, had united and was a faithful soldier in the army, opened the door of his home for church services. Every Lord's Day morning there was a signal for early rising in that home. The good housewife, two daughters and son were all busy making ready for the coming of the merry group of children for Bible school and the older ones for church. It was here that a real church site was planned and a building.

Again W. H. Littles showed a rare spirit of unselfishness by selling his proposed home location at a very low cost. A small house was then erected by the brethren. Free labor was given at odd times till the building was finished and ready for use.

W. M. Alpin was a real shepherd. He taught the young church things that it needed to know. The calls which came from the various missionary organizations over the state and country were held up before them as their financial duties, equally as great as the one to the minister at home. And many times his own change was cut short in order to collect representation money for the convention. He gave this fatherly watch care for seven years. The membership grew to sixty with a well-attended Bible school. Being called to a larger work he resigned as State Evangelist of Texas.

The town was growing more progressive. The need was great for more room and a new church building. But the burden had rested so heavily upon those who had planted the seed they feared to attempt a task so great as building a new church.

We were told of the Board of Church Extension by friends who had experienced its help. And the first letter of correspondence revealed the anxiety of the Board to help the needy. A two thousand dollar loan was first granted. Sufficient pledges and cash were secured to complete a spiritual work shop with every needed convenience for teaching the Word.

Just then the war congested the demand for material of every kind, causing a complete holdup in building, and prices advanced beyond the financial mark previously set. This was made known to the Church Extension Board and without any delay an addition of five hundred dollars was added to the former amount and we began again. The work was hindered on every side by still higher prices, and when the final day came for dedicatory services we were forced to pray to the Extension Board for more help. One plea was sufficient—it came.

We now occupy a new church building valued at $15,000. The structure is made of red brick. The roof is a combination of asbestos and crushed slate. The wall plastered and calcimined. Different departments are arranged so as to accommodate twelve Bible classes in rooms; boys' reading room, girls' reading room, choir box, church office for the minister, ladies' rest room and kitchen.

The baptistery has an entrance from the dressing rooms and a beautiful river scene as a background. A beautiful mahogany set of pulpit furniture was the gift of the First Christian Church of this city. The main auditorium is provided with oak pews and has a seating capacity of five hundred. Thirty 70-watt electric lamps are placed so that a soft light falls in every corner of the room. Natural gas stoves are stationed about so as to make it comfortable on a winter's day.

We thank God that we are thus situated and feel that had it not been for the aid of the Board of Church Extension these comforts could not have come at such a time as this.

Since dedication day there has been a great reviving in the membership, and a continual growth. A two-weeks' meeting with G. W. Taylor as minister, fifteen were added to the church; only four of that number were children, the rest were men and women.

And we feel that whatever comes by way of growth or interest or power it must surely be credited to the favor shown by this great church-building organization, the Board of Church Extension.

"Their Works Do Follow Them"

LAST Thursday the three schools held a memorial service for Mrs. Coe here in our large assembly hall. We were happy that the suggestion came from the Chinese themselves. The service was very dignified and impressive. In Mrs. Jordan's letter, of which you sent a copy to us, she mentioned the Scripture and songs which her mother repeated the evening before her death. The boarding school girls repeated in concert John 1:1-18. The high school girls sang, in English, "Lead, Kindly Light." A Chinese poem, dedicated to Mrs. Coe, was read by one of the high school girls. Mrs. Stevenson, who has a beautiful voice, sang, "Crossing the Bar." Mother, with Miss Collins as interpreter, gave a brief history of Mrs. Coe's life. In conclusion, our science teacher gave a most forceful address to the girls, choosing as his text, "Freely ye have received, freely give." The faculty presented a pair of scrolls with an appropriate inscription, and the girls presented another pair. This is always done by friends at the time of a death. These scrolls, with the poem, I am sending on to Mrs. Jordan.

The memorial service was conducted, and largely arranged, by the president of our Endeavor Society, who became a Christian last spring. She is a source of inspiration and a constant joy to us all. Her Christianity is a vital thing to her, and she is a great influence in school and in her own home.

Progress at Garrett, Indiana

THE local congregation of the Church of Christ at Garrett, Indiana, is sixteen years old. As is the case with most groups of Disciples, this congregation had quite a struggle. Meeting first in a rented lodge room, then in a rented church building and later in a frame building of their own, the bond kept on growing and expanding for the first thirteen years of their existence. The church remembers with love the work of the leaders during the beginning and such names as O. L. Hull and J. O. Rose and J. D. Hull are reverenced by the older members. During the ministry of J. Marion Small the balance of the mortgage on the lots and frame building was paid off and through his efforts membership was given a vision of the greater work that could be done with a new church building in place of the old. Pledges were taken during the evangelistic campaign conducted by C. L. Organ and the church decided to erect the new building.

During the time that the building was under construction the congregation met in the City hall, which was very kindly offered by the city officials. This covered a period of time from April, 1916, to March, 1917. During this time the pastor was greeted by the largest crowds of any Protestant pastor in the city, and the church now enjoys the second largest membership in the city.

Garrett is a railroad town with a population of 6,000, and the church has no wealthy members, most of the members being dependent upon the Baltimore & Ohio railroad for a livelihood. March 4, 1917, was Dedication day. There were enough pledges to cover the indebtedness of the building, but unfortunately there were many class and society pledges which worked a hardship upon those who made personal pledges and belonged to these societies. Another unfortunate thing was that very little cash came in at this time and of the $24,000 cost there remained about $19,000 to be paid. There was a loan of $15,000 covered by a mortgage and held by the Garrett Bank. The remaining amount was owed to the contractors, seating company, hardware companies, lighting fixture company, and a great number of other concerns. It was both tragic and amusing to attend the official board meetings during these days and to make plans only to have them shattered and to try and pay bills when the funds were exhausted. If any of the members should be asked now how they succeeded in getting the money and reducing the indebtedness to the amount of the bank loan, it is very doubtful if any could answer. It was through the combined efforts of all the members that these things were accomplished. The Schenk Evangelistic party held a meeting immediately following dedication. The church was again strengthened for its tasks.

After a very successful pastorate Mr. Small resigned in June, 1917. Earl F. Nauss of Huntington, Indiana, was called by the church in July, 1917. Mr. Nauss saw the need of the Garrett church in a financial way. He knew that the only safe way to carry a church loan was to place the loan with the Board of Church Extension. The Board had granted the church a loan of $10,000, which the church had not been able to take. Mr. Nauss tried to have the Board influenced to raise the grant, which was not done and which proved to be a blessing to the church.

The Church at Garrett, Indiana, Aided by a Loan of $10,000 from the Board of Church Extension

In January, 1919, an evangelistic meeting was held for the church with 97 additions. This brought the membership up to 420. This membership was mostly active and was eager for the task and it was soon formed. The plan to raise $5,000 and put the balance of the debt in the Church Extension was launched at a meeting of the Men's Bible class in March, 1919. At this meeting $1,700 of the money was pledged and committees appointed to call on the balance of the membership. The campaign was to continue eleven weeks with all money paid in at the end of that time. Money to the amount of approximately $6,000 was raised in cash to pay on the principal, for interests, insurance and legal papers. The loyalty of our sister churches in this county and neighboring counties must not be overlooked. The Garrett business men helped splendidly. With all this help came the encouragement and help from the Board of Church Extension. Without the inducement of the $10,000 loan, the church would still be owing their $15,000 here in Garrett. No finer fellowship could be had than was had when all the men were working together for the one good. The financial results were even surpassed by the spiritual results and closer friendships learned by working together. Feeling secure in the Church Extension, the church is planning on more advancement under the leadership of J. D. Duskill, who began his work on the third Sunday of January, 1920. The harvest is indeed waiting and this church is ready for the ingathering.

The Tonic of Church Extension

NORTH LITTLE ROCK is a town of some 15,000 population. Early in 1912 Frank Thompson, who was in business in Pine Bluff, began preaching here. At that time we could rally less than a baker's dozen who were willing to reorganize and do the work of the Lord as those who had been called by His holy name. About a year ago the Extension Board, through Mr. Muckley, assured us that they would stand by us in a church building enterprise. At that time we were few in numbers and feeble financially, but as in days of old we rejoiced at the promise of a loan and thanked God and took courage. We were worshiping in a hall. It was a popular place for lodges and dances, but as a place of worship, it was a heart-breaking failure. Sermons which would have filled an ordinary church were wasted. Even music failed to allure folks to that building. Our church members attended occasionally—except a faithful few who remained steadfast, immovable, but not abounding in the work of the Lord. People who were members in good standing in the Churches of Christ in other places moved into our city to live, they visited us once or twice but soon lost heart and cast their lot with the brethren across the river in Little Rock, or else united with denominational churches. Thus we struggled on unfruitfully—the spiritual candle burned dimly, flickered, almost went out. There is no doubt if the Extension Board had not come to us at the time it did we would have gotten utterly discouraged and disbanded. Just as soon as we got started on a new building things began to brighten. Our audiences are large and responsive. Exceptional is the Lord's Day that passes without souls being added. The loan is not a burden, not a hindrance at all. We have met our payments promptly. It is rather a tonic energizing us on and on to greater efforts. The church was dedicated last September, but it has already served its purpose; it has assisted in drawing such large crowds that we now feel the necessity of a much larger auditorium which we know the board will help us to build. These things have come to pass in a town which had the reputation of being heartless and hard to reach.

R. C. FOSTER.

Our Home at Jacksonville, Illinois

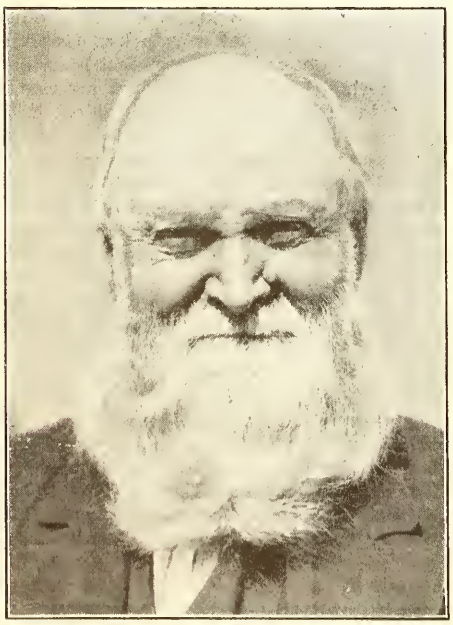
FOR twenty years the old people's home at Jacksonville, Illinois, has been ministering faithfully to the aged saints of the Lord who have gained admittance. The work accomplished by this institution has been often mentioned and justly praised, and yet how little do we know of the real service which this home is rendering. Those who come under its care are not merely made comfortable during the remainder of their lives, but this period is actually prolonged. This is not an idle statement, but one which is based upon careful observation. The average period of life for these old people is five years longer than that which they would have enjoyed under any other circumstances. Is not this ample justification for this beautiful Christian ministry?

Even the bitter cold could not alter the warmth with which the people of Jacksonville greeted me when they learned the purpose of my visit. They are proud of this institution, and I found that this pride was not limited to the members of the Christian Church. The entire community stands behind the National Benevolent Association in this worthy enterprise.

My inspection of the home began early one afternoon when Frank Baird met me at the door and gave me a hearty welcome. Shortly afterward Mr. A. C. Rice, the president of the board of directors for the home, came in and guided me about the building, explaining as he went the various features of the work. On this tour I met Grandma Jasper, who is nearing her ninety-fifth birthday. Her face was wreathed with smiles as she greeted me.

"Yes, I have been living a long time," she said. "I don't know why I am here today, but perhaps it is to have my picture taken." Evidently the purpose of my coming had been announced.

There are forty-three aged men and women in the home at the present time, and there are twenty whose names are on the waiting list because there is at present no place for them. Not long ago the demands for admission became so numerous and so urgent that a nearby cottage was rented and furnished as a lodging place to accommodate a few of those who were knocking at the doors. Some of these old people are invalids and require constant care, but many are active and eager to do the various tasks that lie within their strength. On my arrival I saw Mrs. Melissa Hoffman, who is totally blind, setting the table with a sureness that few housewives could have excelled.



Charles Madison Gilley, Whose Smile Reflects the Spirit of the Jacksonville Home

There is a real homelike atmosphere in this institution. There are two parlors which can be used together when all of the old people gather for companionship or worship. Every Sunday afternoon a communion service is held and once a month M. L. Pontius, minister of the First Christian Church at Jacksonville, comes to the home to preach. These visits are eagerly looked forward to by the old people, many of whom are regular attendants at all the church services.

On the second afternoon of my visit I went from one parlor, where I had been talking with several of the people, and sat down at the piano in the adjoining room. Before long the old people had assembled from various parts of the house and they showed particular preference for the old gospel hymns which had been their heritage from childhood. The blind woman whom I had met on the preceding day came in and asked me to play again. Then she thanked me, saying, "You see, I love music." I learned that she had once been a singer of considerable ability. I was also interested in an old man who, although he was too feeble to move from the adjoining room, also displayed his appreciation by beating time with one still active foot.

I have mentioned the civic pride in this institution. It is nowhere better exemplified than in the care of the bodies of those who have passed on. A beautiful section in Diamond Row cemetery has been donated by the city and in this bit of God's acre thirty-seven from the old people's home have been laid to rest.

The original building in the Jacksonville home is a large, old-fashioned residence, which for a time served the purpose of the institution. About three or four years later a two-story brick wing was added to this building. The equipment of the home is inadequate to meet the growing demands, and there is urgent need of improvements. The results which have been achieved are surprising in view of the antiquated equipment of the home for the large and growing family. Improvements are asked for which will include the tearing away of a portion of the original structure and the construction of a larger and better equipped kitchen and dining-room and the installation of modern laundry equipment.

The money which is given to the National Benevolent Association for this work is carefully accounted for. I was surprised to learn that $200 per year is the amount required for each person in the home. Such a sum appears ridiculously small in consideration of the high cost of supplies. This is due in part to the generosity of the people of Jacksonville, who provide many of the expenses of the home without charge, or at a very low cost. And yet I am told that even this might be reduced by the installation of modern equipment to perform work for which several helpers are at present required. In spite of the economy which is practiced, every effort is made to satisfy the wants of all. The dinner which I shared on one occasion was excellent, and food was plentiful.

Mr. A. C. Rice, President of the Board of Directors for the Past Eight Years

Enlargement is necessary if the home is to care for the growing list of those whose applications for admission have been received. Mr. Rice relates the pathetic story of several who have been turned away because they could not be cared for. One aged woman came to Jacksonville bringing with her the few possessions which she cherished. Entering the home and placing her baggage in the corridor she pleaded, "Won't you take me in? I have no other place to go." Such instances are all the more pathetic when one remembers that only those above seventy years of age are admitted except in cases of extreme need, and that many of those who are rejected have indeed no other place to go. The board of directors is asking that the home be enlarged to accommodate sixty persons and that in addition to the necessary equipment additional help be secured, including the services of a trained nurse.

Much of the credit for the capable administration of the home is due to Mrs. W. J. Fell, who has been a member of the board of managers of the institution since its founding and matron for the past two years. Mention must be also made of Mrs. Lillian W. King, a member of the board for twenty years, and Mr. A. C. Rice, who has been the president of the board for the past eight years. The last two named are giving their time and services to the work without compensation. The lack of space precludes mention of others who have been equally devoted.

The visit to our old people's home at Jacksonville has given me a new and enlarged appreciation of the work of the National Benevolent Association. An organization which is doing such a gigantic work and ministering so effectively to the aged and the young in many homes deserves the hearty and generous support of all.

EARL V. EASTWOOD.

A Question of Life or Death

AMONG the various results prophesied for national prohibition here is one worth keeping an eye on. Dr. Haven Emerson, formerly health commissioner of New York, addressing an academy of medicine, declares:

"The day in which national prohibition went into effect will go down in history as marking the most important advance any nation has ever made in disease prevention. The beneficial results of the federal prohibition amendment will exceed those of vaccination for smallpox, or any other modern medical triumph over communicable disease. I believe we can now expect a new record of low death rates for a series of years for the entire nation."

And now comes The Journal of the American Medical Association, which is the official organ of more than eighty thousand physicians, asserting that the expected drop in the death rate for certain causes since the prohibition of alcoholic beverages, is a fact.

"Recent statistics show that for July, August and September, 1919, the number of deaths in Boston from alcoholism amounted to only 7, as compared with 31, 46, 38 and 34 for the corresponding period of the four preceding years. Similarly, accidents diminished from 152 in 1915, 176 in 1916, 197 in 1917, and 151 in 1918, to 112 for the corresponding three months of 1919. Suicides also diminished to a very marked degree.

"On the other hand, homicides showed no material decrease, a fact that has been noticed in other cities. It seems probable, however, that certain unusual factors are at work to increase the number of murders. As is usual after a great war, familiarity with means of violence and readiness to resort to such means are circumstances that must be reckoned with during the slow return of law and order."

Decrease of Alcoholic Consumption in the Far East

America's stand for prohibition has been carefully noted by her sister countries, not only in Europe, but also the Far East. Where she leads others will follow in this as in everything else. The consumption of alcoholic beverages has decreased in China during the past year. The supply in this country was short, with the result that it was necessary to import foreign varieties if the usual record of consumption was to be kept up. Some wines came from America, a small volume was shipped from Australia and South America, but for the most part soft drinks were used as substitutes for alcohol.

Representatives of the Interchurch World Movement who have been making a survey of social, religious and economic conditions in the Orient, state that a very profitable trade in China is the selling of soft drinks. Not only are they to be had in shops and restaurants, but on the street as well. It is possible for the pedestrian to quench his thirst at almost any time or place, for the itinerant soft drink vendor is always within earshot. He carries his wares in a jug suspended from a yoke about his neck, and frequently has other refreshments concealed in a basket with which to lure the hungry as well as the thirsty.

In the Philippines prohibition is one of the most important governmental issues. The Senate has taken a firm stand in favor of it, and while the House has come out less favorably, it is expected that a bill for prohibition will soon be carried.

For fourteen centuries, alcohol has been forbidden to the followers of Islam, but the prohibition edict has been largely disregarded in modern times. Now that America has come out boldly on the side of temperance, a prohibition campaign has been launched throughout Islam, and the old law bids fair to be universally observed once more.

Pressing on to Other Reforms

The prohibition victory only demonstrates what a free people can really do when they undertake to put an end to an age-old evil. Those who recently contended that prohibition was absolutely impossible had not reckoned with the immeasurable moral forces that lay unorganized and only needed leadership and united action to bring about the tremendous results we now behold. Back of it all, of course, is God.

We have yet to see the full blessings of prohibition. Time only will reveal them, but the future holds wonderful things in store for our nation, as well as all other nations of the earth that follow our example in the fight against drink.

Since we see what can be done when once the forces of righteousness are aroused we ought to be encouraged to press for other reforms that somehow relate themselves to the movement against the liquor traffic. To accomplish such reforms seems a very small task as compared with the temperance reform. To restore Sunday to its proper place in the conscience of the people and in the life of the church; to make a final end forever of commercialized vice; to put the Bible back into the public schools, where by right of its essential values it belongs; to correct the divorce scandal; to break the power of the cigaret trust, especially as it affects the boys of the nation—all these seem easy of accomplishment when compared with the long struggle against the liquor traffic.

May God hasten the day when these reforms shall become a fact in our national life.

Mr. I. E. Deppen has resigned as doorkeeper of the prison at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. Business has so fallen off since prohibition that it is thought it will not be necessary to appoint a successor.

Mrs. Paul H. Stevenson, a Graduate Nurse, Luchowfu, China.

China Calls for Nurses

THIS is the day of the trained nurse's opportunity in China. Never before, not even in the days of the World War, has there been as great a challenge to the ideals of service as there is today in the need of China for Christian nurses. With all the pathos and earnestness with which it formerly called for doctors, this great nation is asking the nursing profession of America to volunteer their best women for the task of training a body of Chinese young women for nurses in the new hospitals throughout the land.

After a half century of strictly pioneer work, the medical profession is beginning to reap its reward in China in no small way. Everywhere the old is giving way to the new, the old mission hospitals and dispensaries are a thing of the past and in their place are springing up new plants and institutions the equal in buildings and equipment to anything in the world. Furthermore, the doctors of China, instead of being all alone in their work, with no assistance except that of their own immediate training, are rejoicing in the new day when good modern medical schools are being established and are turning out well-trained, bright and capable Chinese doctors in sufficient numbers to more and more adequately staff the new hospitals. With the knowledge that it can be invested here with the largest returns in service rendered to humanity, money through religious and other channels is coming to China in amounts that would have been unbelievable a few years ago, and much of this money is going directly into medical education and the reconstruction and reorganization of medical and hospital work everywhere.

But doctors, good buildings, modern equipment, and ample funds do not make a hospital in China any more than they do in America. There must be nurses. To raise up and train a body of Chinese young women to take their place at the side of their brothers in the healing of their great nation, is the greatest problem of modern medical effort in China today. In fact, the next page in the development of hospitals in China must be written by the Christian American trained nurse, and until the task is begun in earnest the process of hospital development pauses and marks time. Hospital plants, well built and equipped, will remain with closed doors, awaiting the establishment of a training school for nurses as a part of their necessary life.

But the call of China that sounds so clearly today is no ordinary call for sacrificial service.

The specific task that offers its challenge to the American trained nurse in the call for service in China is only a part of the greater problem; that of education among the women of the Far East. The Chinese women, wonderful in their capabilities and amply able to enter into and to hold their own in the new responsibilities that await them in the new China, are rapidly emerging from the position of inequality assigned to them by century-old traditions. But the relationships of men and women in Eastern countries, and the implications attached to any kind of work, as far as the better class of women is concerned, make the field of nursing a very delicate one. Those who volunteer for this important work, therefore, must be from the very best that our American institutions can turn out, both from the standpoint of training and of personality. The call comes for minds that are plastic and adjustable, souls that are true, and spirits that are unafraid—for lives big enough to be offered upon the altar of service before a world's need. The call of China today is a call for the investment of life, where life counts for most while living, and the investment pays the largest dividends in the end.

The call of China today, is the call of tomorrow's civilization. Politically, economically, and socially, the scene of tomorrow's activity is shifting from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to the very center of the world's crowded stage. All of the possible issues of the new day are bound up in embryo in the younger generation of the Far East, and to him who lives in this vantage area at the present time there comes the incalculable pleasure not only of being an eye witness to but an active participant in the working out of these great issues. A life that at home would live out its days in obscurity, lost in the conventional routine of existence, in China becomes not only an active factor in the growth and development of a great people but a vital force producing definite and visible results toward a new world.

No nurse in formulating her plans for humanitarian service can afford to ignore the incomparable advantages that China offers for the investment of her life.

Easter in Armenia

EASTER in America has become in so many places a fashion opening, the time for new bonnets and straw hats, that some of us have perhaps forgotten the days, so long ago, when these customs first found light.

Even the bright-colored eggs left by agile bunny rabbits in grassy nests in the garden or queer corners about the house, have in the far away land by the Mediterranean sea a meaning very much more serious and sacred than the mere pleasure of children.

In Armenia, where for the last five years there has been no Easter morning, this year will prove of new significance, a light after darkness indeed. In the days before the war, according to one of the young refugees who found her way to America through the Near East Relief, Easter and its preceding days of fasting and repentance, was a series of ceremonials, of great interest, and beautiful memory.

And it is strange, and yet not so, since Armenia is the oldest Christian nation to realize how close our own customs follow those of the Near East; to know that as our children are "cracking eggs" on Easter morning that over there little children are playing the same quaint game.

Before the days of fasting, which correspond to lent, the little maid related, there are two weeks of carnival; during the first week everyone abstains from all meat, and during the second week only dairy products are allowed. This is known all over Armenia as "Cheese week," when milk, butter, cheese and eggs may be eaten, for after this period of feasting all animal products are prohibited. The truly pious Armenian will not touch meat, fish, or even milk and eggs or any animal fats during the forty days of fasting and prayer.

Perhaps we have found the origin of the Easter egg in the fact that eggs are the last bit of "food of the flesh" eaten before lent begins, and the brightly colored Easter eggs are the first food of this kind tasted after the lenten season.

In the Greek and Armenian churches during Passion week, which begins with Palm Sunday and ends with Easter, the greatest events in Christ's life are reiterated with appropriate ceremonies. Christ's entrance into the city amid the enthusiastic demonstrations of the people, the pageant of the ten virgins where, with proper services, ten maidens enter the church and march toward an inner door. Five enter and the door is closed while those without wail and sing a chant of mourning. The Thursday before Easter, in both the Greek and Armenian churches the ceremony of foot washing is performed in memory of the Master who, at the last supper, washed the feet of his disciples.

The bishop of the church, after the communion, washes the feet of twelve priests, while twelve passages are read from the Scriptures on the sufferings of Jesus.

On this day also the eggs which have been stained with henna and other native vegetable dyes in beautiful shades, especially the brilliant purples and deep red, are taken to the church, where they remain throughout Passion week, to be taken home on Easter morning for the breaking of lent.

Good Friday, the day of Christ's crucifixion, is commemorated by a very beautiful procession, when the tomb of the Lord, represented by a shrine, is carried through the church and into the surrounding grounds, that all the crowd may see and touch the hangings.

At midnight between Friday and Saturday there is the "crying night," celebrated with hymns and Scriptural reading, regarding the suffering and burial of Jesus.

The real Easter service takes place early Sunday morning when the spiritual leader stands in front of the altar with a lighted candle. As he looks into the shrine, which represents the tomb of Christ, he calls out,

"He is not here." This is the dramatic climax, when the whole nature of the congregation changes to rejoicing, the singing takes on a new glad note and as the cry is heard, "He is risen," the people in one voice acclaim, "Blessed be the resurrection."

For three days following Easter morn this is the greeting of friend to friend.

"Christos harcav!" Christ is risen. And the salutation in return:

"Orhneal ch harootunc Krisdosce!" He is risen indeed.

From the candle on the altar all light their little tapers, signifying that Christ is the light of the world, shedding hope on a world of darkness.

To Jerusalem, at the holy sepulchres, where the fire is always kept burning, pilgrims journey from as far off as Russia during the Easter week, and there, on Easter morning light their tapers from the candle of the prelate as he returns from the altar. If it is possible to reach home with the flame still burning the light is regarded as sacred and guarded carefully.

Now follows rejoicing and merrymaking, and friendly greetings. One is very impolite in Armenia if one does not pay respectful calls on all one's friends, sometimes with little gifts, sometimes with a word of greeting, and always served with sweetmeats, cakes or similar delicacies.

On Good Friday the church is draped in mourning, the people wear black and business houses close. On Easter the house of worship is decked in its finest hangings, flowers strew the aisles, and the congregation is garbed in gala attire. Perhaps from this originates our intense desire for new millinery and dresses for Easter day.

Another quaint custom follows the Sunday after, for while there can be no marriages during lent, the week after Easter proves a day of nuptials, the day of marriages.

So the Armenians in their deep sincerity and great Christian faith celebrate this greatest day in the history of all the world. So today they are again able to turn once more to their friends with the glad greeting, "Christ is Risen," and receive the reply, "Blessed be the Resurrection."

The Near East Relief has brought hope to the country once more. Through the help of America this gentle nation is again looking forward to the light of a new day. So long as that help lasts, that the strong arm of a friendly brother is held out in support, that the hearts of these people of the west beat in sympathy for those unfortunate ones of the Near East, so they may say, "Christ is risen indeed."

A Divine Right

WHAT is the National Benevolent Association doing, and what right has it to ask Christian people to support it? Our Heavenly Father will hold us responsible for the annual expenditure of nearly a half million dollars unless we can show practical Gospel reasons for our stewardship. On the other hand, if there are practical Gospel reasons for the support of such an institution, the Lord will hold us responsible if we withhold His money from such a worthy cause.

James tells us that pure and undefiled religion consists in care for the fatherless and and their mothers, and Jesus says that little ones are the units of value in the Kingdom of Heaven. If Jesus and James knew what they were talking about how can we escape if we neglect the ones whom Jesus loves so much?

I wish it were possible for every member and friend of our great and growing brotherhood to visit the Christian Orphans' Home in St. Louis. The principle of Benton grade school, the school where the orphan children attend, recently said to the writer, "The children from the Christian Orphans' Home are a real help to this school. Their fine deportment, good manners and neat appearance are an inspiration to the other pupils." She said it was an easy matter, when the school physician visited the school, to pick the orphan children, or "Mrs. Brown's Children" as they are known in the school, from the rest by their cleanliness. I have been told by city authorities who have investigated other institutions that our institution is one of the best ordered and most sanitary in the state.

King's Highway church, where the writer ministers, is located on the same grounds, a fine ten-acre tract, with the institutional buildings of the National Benevolent Association, and the children attend our Bible school and church services. It is a beautiful sight, on Sunday morning, when these little ones come marching in a body to the church. They are always immaculately dressed (not uniformly), neat and tidy in appearance, and their happy faces would dispel any gloom. They are taught to pray from their very start in the home, to read the Bible, and to honor God, home and country. The most beautiful and impressive Christmas exercises I ever witnessed were rendered in the chaped at the institution last Christmas by these children. The exercises were repeated, to the delight of a large audience, in the church on the following Sunday evening.

We are all proud of the orphan children in the church. There is nothing about their dress or manner that would proclaim their misfortune, nothing uniform in their appearance or dress, but they come and go and mingle just like children from the best private homes in the city.

One of the greatest joys that comes to their minister is when these little ones, some without fathers, some without mothers, and some with neither father nor mother, come to him for the expected tender greeting which he always loves to give. The National Benevolent Association is clothing, feeding, sheltering these, Christ's little ones, but it is doing more; it is training them up into Christian men and women whose lives will tell for God in the days and years to come. Yes, the National Benevolent Association has a divine right to ask Christian people to help in this wonderful work. F. Z. BURKETTE.

Interchurch Fights Drugs in Asia and Africa

ALARMING reports of the growth of drug and liquor evils in Africa and Asia reaching headquarters of the Interchurch World Movement have caused the movement to inaugurate a survey department on Temperance and Moral Welfare. Opium is being procured by Chinese addicts in large quantities through vendors who use the Japanese postal system in China, it is said, and the Chinese government and the missionaries have not been able to stop the traffic. Liquors new and strange to the Chinese are also being sold in increasing quantities and farther into the interior. In parts of Africa natives are being blinded for life or otherwise injured by trade liquor akin to the American wood alcohol.

F. M. Baird—An Appreciation

By H. H. Peters

THIRTY-FIVE years ago, as a small lad I walked into Mt. Carmel and went to Gordon's Drug Store to get a little vial of spirits of nitre, which in those days was used to reduce fever. My little sister was on her last bed and the good man, who met me in front of the drug store, talked sympathetically about the little girl and our home. He was more than a druggist. He was a Christian man who looked upon his profession as part of life's ministry. The other day I had the privilege of a two-hour visit with this same old saint in the Old Peoples Home at Jacksonville, Illinois. The water has flowed beneath the bridges since the day I first met him in the drug store in my home town; but F. M. Baird is the same man of God he was then. I shall never forget the kindness he manifested in the days of my youth and one of the sweet memories I shall carry to the end is my interview with him the other day in the Saints' Rest at Jacksonville.

Mr. F. M. Baird was born on Lick Prairie, one of the numerous rural communities of Wabash County, Illinois. His home was three-quarters of a mile southeast of the Lick Prairie Christian Church. February 16, 1848, is written down as the day of his birth. He joined the neighborhood church under the ministry of the sainted G. W. Morrell, the second Sunday of April, 1866, in his eighteenth year. I cannot help but weave into this story the personal element. The old Baird homestead was subsequently owned by an uncle of mine, for whom I worked as a hired hand in my fifteenth year. Mr. Baird lived on the old homestead until he was twenty-three years of age and then went to Mt. Carmel. For fifteen years he was a druggist in the Robert Gordon Drug Store in that city. In 1894 he was elected county clerk on the Republican ticket. He is the only man of that party that ever held the office of county clerk in Wabash County. Mr. Baird was never a politician and takes but little interest in partisan politics today; but his popularity as a citizen and his character as a man commended him to the voters of Democratic Wabash County and gave him the office with a good substantial majority. At the expiration of his term as county clerk, in 1898, he went into the drug business for himself and continued for several years.

A few years ago I read in the paper that F. M. Baird had failed in business. He had a paralytic stroke and was not able to give proper attention to his business; he could not dispose of it for what it was worth, and, to make the story brief, was closed out. Yes, F. M. Baird failed in business, but did he fail in life? As I talked with him the other day and heard his wonderful expressions of confidence in God and the gospel, I said, "F. M. Baird may have failed in business but he never failed in life."

There are some other chapters. When this young man went to Mt. Carmel, in 1871, he went as a Christian. For twenty-five years he was the leader of the choir of the Mt. Carmel Christian Church. In commenting on this he said, "And now, just think, I can't sing a note." He was an elder of the church there for thirty years and remained in the fellowship of that congregation until about three years ago.

Two children graced the home of the Bairds, Ralph, who is now in California, and Nora, the wife of Edwin Marx, professor in the University of Nankin, China. When Mr. Baird retired from business he went to Lexington, Kentucky, to live in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Marx. Mr. Marx was in his fifth year as a student in Transylvania and the College of the Bible. The test of Christian character came at graduation time when the call came to Edwin Marx and his wife to go to the foreign field and take a position on the faculty of the University of Nankin. It was not the question that comes up sometimes under similar circumstances, "What shall we do with father?" The children said, "First of all father must have a home. We must decline the call. We must stay in America. We must make the sunset and evening hour of our father pleasant and peaceful."

Then it was that F. M. Baird, strong, sturdy and steadfast in Christian character said, "The call is from God; you must go to China. The brethren in love have prepared a home for those situated as I am, and with gladness in my heart and joy that I can thus serve I will enter the old peoples home at Jacksonville. The days of my pilgrimage are few, but while I remain all three of us will be missionaries for China. I cannot go, you can; but I can pray. I can give you my blessing and rest in the home of the saints at Jacksonville until the last great hour when the call comes to enter Our Father's House."

You say it was a great decision. Not for this man. He had made it many times. His life for a half century had been one decision for Christ. This was not hard for him. To have his children in the far distant land, of course, is not easy; but he has no regret and receives their letters as a maiden receives her love notes. September 25, 1918, after graduation in June, the two missionaries and the father came back to Mt. Carmel for a visit. Mr. Marx preached and Father Baird had a good time visiting with old friends. And then came the separation, father coming on to Jacksonville and the children returning to Lexington, then via New Orleans on to Nankin, China.

Two saints are watching their children and helping them. Mr. Baird is in the Old Folks Home at Jacksonville and Mrs. Baird has been in glory since 1909. If she were here she would join her distinguished husband in his Christian decision. She loved the Master with womanly tenderness. She knew the problems of the preacher's life for her sister married a preacher, T. J. Clark.

Next to the Bible now is the monthly letter that comes from the children in China. They are mindful of father and thoughtful of all the nice little kindnesses they can show him. He is in very close touch with their work, knows what they are studying and what they are doing, and enters hopefully into their future relationship to the educational and religious life of China. He showed me an album which the children prepared and sent to him as a Christmas present. Among all the nice things that came to him he treasures this most highly. With an interest almost boylike he told me the story of every picture. I noticed one thing that pleased me very much. Someone had prepared typewritten descriptions of various buildings and incidents. The energy was not wasted, for the father had committed to memory nearly all the descriptive paragraphs.

Well, my story is almost ended. I said, "Brother Baird, what do you think of the Old Peoples Home in Jacksonville?" I wish I could tell you all that he said. He loves the Lord and His people and is glad that our folks are engaged in this ministry of love. Brethren, we used to say ministry of mercy, let's use a stronger term. Suppose we say love. As I walked away from the old peoples home that Monday afternoon, I paused in front of it and firmly resolved that that institution should have funds for enlargement and for even better care for this family of God. In the name of F. M. Baird and the company of forty brothers and sisters who live with him in this Saints' Rest; but greater than all this, brethren, in the name of the Lord of Love, I plead with you to give larger support to the National Benevolent Association that this splendid organization may do the work it would like to do, and that, especially in Illinois with all her riches, we may have a home that will be a credit to ourselves and an honor to our Master. May the blessings of our God and the kindness of my brethren be a comfort and support to the good old friend of my boyhood and manhood, F. M. Baird.

A Baltimore woman, owner of a large wholesale liquor house, made a generous donation of whisky to the Marine Hospital. The whisky is a part of the distribution which was to be made among hospitals and charitable institutions. Major Vogel, in charge of the Marine Hospital, promptly refused the donation, as no whisky is used in the hospital in the treatment of patients. The Marine Hospital is controlled by the Treasury Department.

Letters to the Board of Ministerial Relief

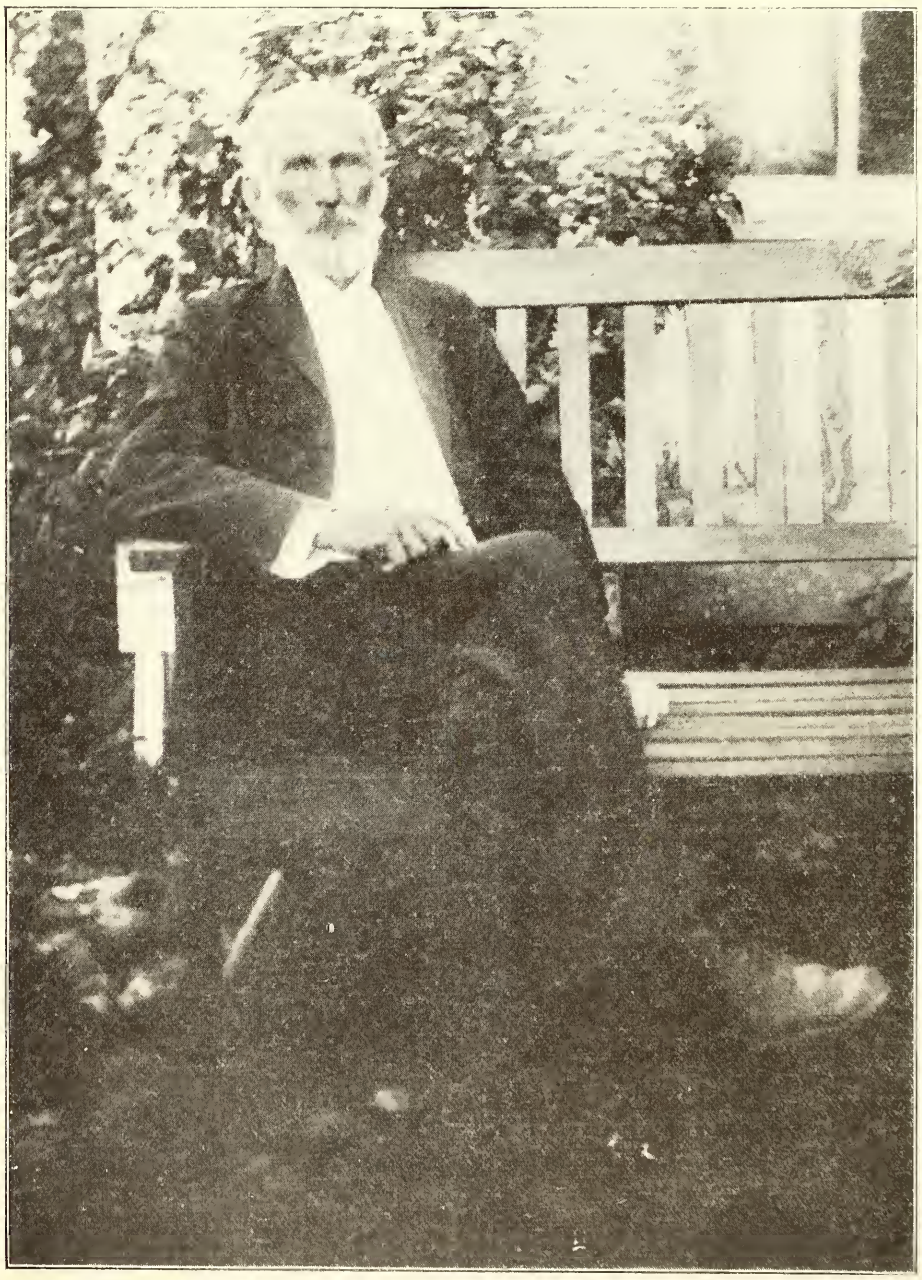
My dear Brother Smith:

Your kind letter gives me a lighter heart than I have had before for many a long day. It is like the sunburst that comes in the rift of the clouds that hangs over my head as I write these lines. The gracious words with which you are pleased to speak of my humble ministry in the Gospel move my heart to gratitude and my eyes to tears. Such a message from such a source does one good like a cordial. Be pleased to express my grateful thanks to the Board for their action in this matter and also for the check. The best I can wish for them and for those whom they represent is that as they have done for me so under like circumstances may it be done for them.

When a friend brought my mail a few moments ago there was a card the Western Union Telegraph Company had mailed to me saying "to call at office for message." I have talked with them over the phone and while all I know is that it is money and from you, Oh, may the dear Lord bless you, and bless you, and bless you, for your kind heart, is my prayer.

I have not seen any of our church people except Miss_____ since the weather turned bad; she was out yesterday, but before she happened to come, neighbors had relieved my situation somewhat, so I said little to her about it. All have been so kind. And now I know the Lord will take care of His own. Oh, you are so blest to be one of His ministering spirits. Words cannot express my gratitude. SISTER_____.

In the old family Bible my father (himself a preacher in the Christian church for sixty-two years) wrote "Willie (i. e. myself) preached his first sermon at the Shed in Wythe county, Virginia, July 15, 1864, aged sixteen years and eight months." From my childhood I had no other thought than being a preacher and my father's idea was to have me commence early. Shortly after the above date, I was ordained. * * * * What was my surprise yesterday on receiving from you another letter, announcing the decision of your Board in my case, and enclosing check. How our hearts did swell with joy and gratitude. That feeling of comfort, and that spirit of repose and trust can be felt, but cannot be fully expressed. Showing my wife the initial check—"that is the guarantee of our daily bread"—I said, and her eyes filled with grateful tears. I first thank our Heavenly Father, that He put it into the hearts of our people to supply this fund—and your beautiful and comforting letter (which I shall preserve) makes the intermediary of this bounty an added blessing. I will ask you to convey to each member of the Board our deep feeling of gratitude. Knowing that the Fund was very small, I did not hope for so much. With your decision in our behalf, it is long since we had such a feeling of rest and comfort.



Waiting in the Fellowship of the Board of Ministerial Relief after Forty-three Years of Service in the Gospel.

Hollister, California, February 3, 1920.

Board of Ministerial Relief, Indianapolis, Indiana.

Dear Brethren:

In February WORLD CALL there appears the picture of a beautiful young girl, with a statement concerning her that is intensely interesting to me.

I have never seen the little lady, neither have I ever seen her father or her mother, but I know who she is, and I want to know the address of her mother.

This girl is the daughter of William Wirt Warren, son of W. W. Warren, who was a son of Dr. William Warren of Dover, Missouri. The twin brother of this child's father is R. B. or Bailey Warren, a Missouri preacher.

These boys were the sons of a brother of my mother's and were born in Osceola, St. Clair county, Missouri. Wirt was killed in an explosion of an acetylene gas tank that he had gone to inspect at York, Texas. He had been dead several years before I heard of it. I spent one week with Bailey, in his father's house when the family lived at El Dorado Springs, Missouri. This is the last time I ever saw any of the family. My work has been among the smaller churches, but wherever it has been I have not forgotten the old guard and glad I am to know that my small effort has inured to the benefit of my own flesh and blood.

Yours sincerely,

W. A. MCCAUSLAND.

Such surprises would come to thousands of others if the names on the Ministerial Relief roll were published. When I became secretary of the Board seven years ago there were only seventy names on the roll, but among them were this widow of a distant relative referred to above, an honored former pastor, R. M. Missick, a predecessor in my last pastorate, the beloved J. F. Sloan and the widow of one of my Alma Mater's greatest teachers and preachers.

W. R. WARREN.

Why I Believe in the New Pension Plan

Scriptural, Scientific, Economical, Dignified

I BELIEVE in the new Pension Plan of the Board of Ministerial Relief of the Church of Christ for the following reasons:

First, because the plan is scriptural. Any one who has made a careful study of the early church cannot fail to recognize the emphasis which is laid upon the care of those specially intrusted with the work of the church according to the early Christian plan. The method employed to secure this end was not the same as the method which will most effectually guarantee the same result today, but the end itself admits of no question. The church which neglects making some sort of adequate provision for the material needs of those who give their lives to its service is essentially un-Christian.

Second, because the plan is scientific. It is based upon the most careful study of the various factors which enter into the situation and it guarantees the appropriation of the fruits of years of experience and observation in this particular field. It strives to achieve its goal with the least possible loss or waste.

Third, because the plan is economical. It is economical for the preacher because it furnishes him protection on much more favorable terms than he can secure elsewhere. It is economical for the church because it provides the most scientific and satisfactory method of handling a problem which it must handle if it is to remain Christian in fact as well as in name.

Fourth, because the plan is dignified. During the Middle Ages the idea that the true servant of Christ should be a pauper obtained wide circulation and the tradition still lingers in the religious world. It has done great harm to the minister and to the church which the minister serves. No one, be he preacher or bricklayer, is improved by being made a pauper. The Pension Plan is dignified, simple, and enables the minister to retain his personal independence.

For these reasons and many others which the space limitations allotted me will not permit me to name, I am whole-heartedly and thoroughly in favor of the New Pension Plan.

(Signed) FREDERICK D. KERSHNER.

Nothing More Urgent

Every one of our ministers should take out a pension certificate at the earliest possible moment. It is the only hope for a competency in old age. With the high cost of living it is impossible to lay up money in any considerable amount. Even if salaries are increased, they will not keep pace with the growing demands. Besides, there is always pressure upon the minister to give to the many causes he represents. He cannot save money without endangering his soul. There is only one way of safety and that is the Pension Fund.

No life insurance policy or other investment will give such returns. These contracts take care of disability, they guarantee a definite income after sixty-five, and in addition make provision for the dependent ones. I understand the guarantee at present is $200 a year; we can increase it to $500 in a short time. The churches will respond gladly to this appeal.

It is regrettable that many have passed the age of eligibility. We owe it to these faithful men who have given their lives to the gospel to push up the general fund so it will take care of them generously. All things considered, there is nothing more urgent among us just now than Ministerial Relief.

(Signed) C. M. CHILTON.

A Delicate Line That Must Be Respected

A reflection, often undeserved, has frequently rested against the ministry because men failed to provide against "the rainy day." Lives of sacrificial service have been discounted because, at the last, there was need of help from others.

It is in vain that we plead against the injustice of this. The man of the world cannot understand the language of the absolute surrender of self to spiritual service. And when it is remembered that this man of the world is the one whom we want to influence favorably in relation to the Kingdom of God, we should delight to have opportunity to remove the stumbling block of our indigence from his way.

The world would be as little influenced by an outstandingly "prosperous" ministry as by men whom they count impoverished. The line they draw that leaves us unhampered is a delicate line, but it must be respected. And it is the line of modest competence for passing days and adequate provision for necessities of the uncertain future. And to this happy state of things our Board of Ministerial Relief is calling both pastors and churches in the upbuilding of our Pension System. The whole suggestion is for more adequate support during active years and a freedom from even sacred "Relief" lines in days before us all.

The plan merits cordial approval. It means, as far as it goes, a sense of security for ourselves and loved ones. It yields the self-respect that comes from looking after our future ourselves. And while doing this we have the joy of helping others also, for what we do makes possible real blessing to our fellow workers in the ministry. And then it does another thing that is tremendous as a motive in the heart of every winner of men. It takes from the heart and lips of men of the world a criticism lodged against both the church and the ministry. My certificate costs money for I am older than I once was, but I am proud to have it and happy, too, in the fine fraternity for which it stands. I feel deeply that men of the middle years should support this sane project in the brotherhood's life—availing themselves of its privilege—and that every prudential consideration urges our young men to make it unanimous!

Charles P. Hedges, Monicka, Africa: We have one hundred and seventeen boys and young men whom the Mission is supporting in school. Twenty of the young men are being trained as evangelists. School began this month. The first day there were fifty-seven in Dr. Jaggard's New Testament Class, and in his class in Hygiene, and in Miss Smith's Training Class. We are encouraged about the school.

Dr. Shelton Released

ON the evening of March 11 the following message was sent to the offices of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society by Dick T. Morgan, a member of Congress:

"State department has received message dated Peking, March 11, from American Legation stating that they have been advised by military attache and by the French Legation that Dr. Shelton has been released."

The circumstances of Dr. Shelton's release from captivity have not yet been received. The following account of his captivity is intensely interesting:

Dr. A. L. Shelton, the head of the Mission of Disciples of Christ in Tibet was held in captivity by bandits in southwestern China, about 400 miles from his station at Batang. Advices to the State Department at Washington indicate that he was well February 24 and that Colonel Drysdale, military attache of the American Legation at Peking, was at Yunnanfu directing negotiations for the Doctor's release.

The Chicago Tribune's correspondent, Frederick A. Smith, J. P. Thornton of the Standard Oil Company, and Dr. E. I. Osgood, missionary at Chuchow, China, left Yunnanfu, the end of the railroad where Mrs. Shelton and their two daughters are safely housed, March 3, as a rescue party.

Mr. Smith's cablegram of March 3, published in the Tribune of March 10, says:

Dr. Shelton's cook, a Tibetan, who came with their caravan from Batang, succeeded in going from Yunnanfu and buying his way through the lines of scouts, reaching Dr. Shelton in the mountains. He returned yesterday with a report that Dr. Shelton's illness was not critical. He also brought Dr. Shelton's diary penciled on the margin of the pages of a little volume of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush."

The diary alternately inspires tears and laughter, telling how the bandits kindly gave him $7 to spend as he pleased, and he bought crude sugar for his faithful mule.

While the bandits were rushing him about the wilderness, refusing to permit him to rejoin his wife and daughters, he is teaching the bandit leader the A B C's and nursing the sick and wounded among the band. The bandits persistently try to get him to join in gambling games and to smoke opium.

Dr. Shelton has agreed to take Chief Yang's son to America when released and to educate him. Dr. Shelton has a loyal friend in the mountains in an old French padre who worked weeks indefatigably for his release, his hair turning white through worry in fifteen days. The bandits continually are promising Dr. Shelton his freedom, but they always postpone his release when the time comes. The bandits want money from the governor of Yunnan, arms, full pardon for all, a major's commission for Yang, and control of the main caravan trail to Ta-li-fu with the privilege of collecting toll from caravans crossing to Tibet.

"Among the customs of the Tibetans, perhaps the most peculiar is polyandry, the brothers in a family having one wife in common. Monogamy, however, seems to be the rule among the pastoral tribes, and polygamy is not unknown in Tibet, especially in the eastern parts of the country."

Budget of Interchurch World Movement for 1920 Campaign

THE budget set forth in the accompanying table represents a combination of the askings of those denominations and boards which found it possible this year to cooperate in the financial campaign through the Interchurch Movement.

It is a campaign budget to be raised in a special drive covering the period April 24-May 2.

The amount raised will be used by 182 boards and organizations officially related to the thirty different denominations cooperating in the Movement to prosecute their regular work of missions, education and philanthropy both in America and foreign lands. Every department of this work has for years been in need of greatly increased funds to permit the execution of larger programs.

This budget represents the first attempt of the churches to get together in a really great effort to solve the problems which have been pressing upon them for past generations, and it is only a beginning. Such a "united—simultaneous" campaign is bound to effect great economies in the matter of meetings, publicity and the many other details related to the task of gathering funds.

The Interchurch World Movement forms a clearing house for these denominational groups in this particular effort and will not itself undertake to administer work in any of the fields covered by the denominations or their executive boards.

The budget is based upon a world-wide survey which has been conducted by the Interchurch World Movement during the past year by the six Survey Departments of the Movement. The denominations have cooperated in this survey, which has not yet been completed, but will be continued throughout the year. The budget as presented is a conservative statement, carefully revised by joint committees, of what is now imperatively needed to maintain and develop the work of the church.

In the case of some denominations and boards the amounts asked for represent the needs of one year only. In other cases the askings cover periods of from two to five years, a certain portion being paid during the first year.

The thirty denominations which are cooperating in the campaign represent approximately 60 per cent of the Protestant Church membership of the United States.

Total Protestant membership in United States	23,038,194
Membership of denominations cooperating in whole or in part in the Interchurch World Movement	14,939,413
Percentage in Interchurch World Movement	59.60

The omission of certain denominations from the list should not be taken as indicating hostility, but inability to cooperate at this time, due in some cases to the fact that it has not been possible for the higher church authorities to meet and authorize cooperation.

The total amount asked for represents about five times that administered by the agencies listed in any previous year for the same objects, but is still far below what would be required to meet the needs which are looming on every side.

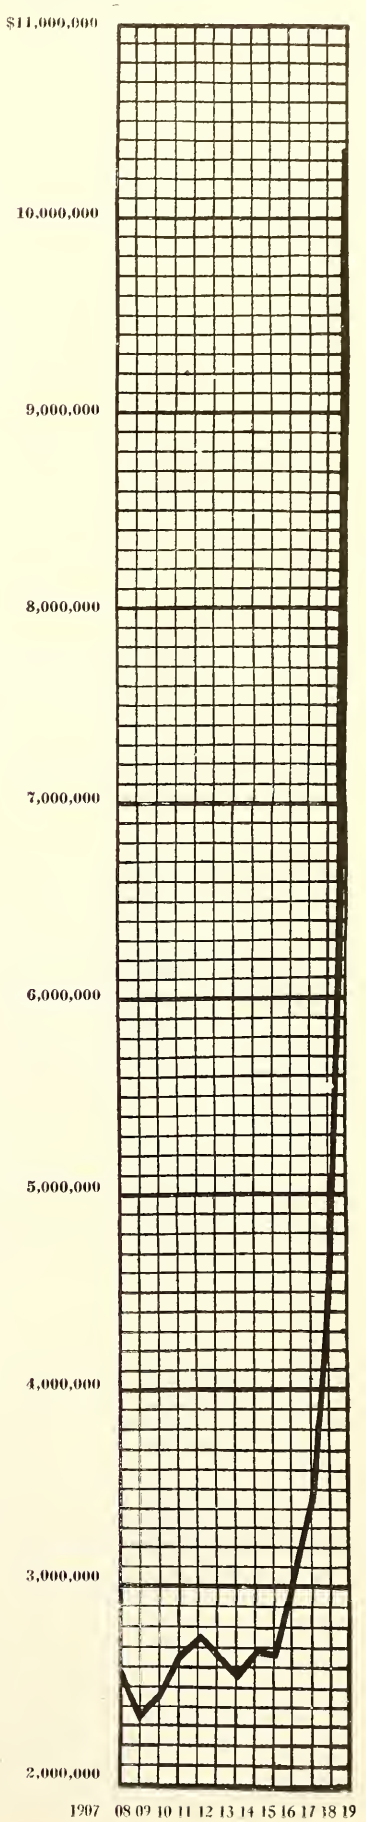
Ask Your Methodist Neighbors How They Did It

IN 1919, the one hundredth anniversary of Methodist Episcopal Missions, the Church began to give in an adequate way. The results are amazing. From 1907 to 1917, just before the Centenary, missionary income varied but little, except during the Laymen's Campaign. With the Centenary came the rise. During the first five months after the close of the Campaign $10,350,000 had been received by the treasurers of the Board of Foreign Missions and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church. And this but the beginning. The Centenary pledges run five years.

The Methodist Episcopal Church believes in the task to which it is called. With these millions of offerings has come a new day spiritually. The ends of the earth are feeling the power set free by people who accepted God's challenge by faith, and met it.

Each horizontal line in the diagram represents $100,000 in cash receipts.

Cash Receipts for Methodist Centenary



Canada Sets Pace

FIVE Canadian denominations, Angelican, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian, have just completed a successful joint campaign. The financial drive of one week, February 9-14, brought in about $12,000,000, as against an official joint objective of $11,440,000. The organization represented 10,330 congregations and 1,066,000 communicants.

The askings were for home missions and social service, for foreign missions, for enlarging superannuated ministers' annuities, and for colleges. Each church made its requirements clear and definite. Each church appealed to its own people by means of pamphlets and other general denominational publicity, directed by men of experience. Returns are still arriving. It is certain that a grand total of $13,000,000 will be reached and exceeded.

The same scale of giving by the 14,939,413 members represented in the Interchurch Movement of the United States will put us well beyond the $174,447,211, which is the first year's goal.

It is worth noting also that with a total membership considerably less than that shown by the statistics of Disciples of Christ in the United States, the five Canadian churches gave more than we are attempting to raise.

Porto Rican Judge Recommends Scriptures

THERE is a prophet among the Porto Ricans. No less than Sr. Emilio del Toro, Judge of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, recently gave a message to the Puerto Rico Evangelico, of which the following is an English translation:

"If I had the privilege of communicating with all of the mothers of Latin America for only one moment during my lifetime, I would employ it entirely in recommending that they place in the hands of their children the New Testament, being sure of obtaining for them the most noble and enduring influence of all the influences which could exercise themselves in the human conscience of this world."

Important Bible School Statistics in the 1920 Year Book

THERE is much of interest in the 1920 Year Book to Bible school workers. Statistical statements bearing upon Bible school progress and achievements are always worthy of careful study, and this year they are especially important as they seem to indicate that there is need for renewed activity along several essential lines.

1. It will come with something of astonishment to many to learn that the total Bible school enrollment for the brotherhood is 41,470 less than it was a year ago. This is the more alarming when it is remembered that the 1919 Year Book also reported a net loss of 42,303. So that in two years our Bible schools have fallen short 83,773. This is at the rate of almost a thousand per week. The loss in pupils this year is scattered over almost the entire country. Thirteen states report gains and all the others losses. The Canadian provinces are a little more fortunate, but four of the nine are in the black, indicating a loss of pupils. This map, number two, should be reproduced on the blackboard and explained in every Bible school in the brotherhood.

2. There are 230 fewer Bible schools listed on the 1920 Year Book than were included in the 1919 Year Book. It will be remembered that last year the epidemic of influenza closed thousands of Bible schools for many months and it would seem that some of them were never reopened. Of the 230 schools lost, 173 were mission schools, where no church organization exists. So that we have now only 122 mission Bible schools in all the land. When it is remembered that from the mission Sunday school most of our churches have grown, it will be realized that increasing emphasis must be placed upon this extension work. Last year our Bible school field force reported the organization of only 46 new Bible schools, the smallest number they have reported in many years. "Every church its Mission Bible school," would be a worthy slogan for us all.

3. A list of the ten largest Bible schools is given, as is also a list of the ten largest churches. Canton, Ohio, where P. H. Welshimer is both superintendent and minister, leads in both lists. The church reports 3,600 members and the Bible school 5,000 pupils. Independence Boulevard, Kansas City, is second in both lists, reporting 3,480 church members and 1,341 Bible school pupils. Now that David H. Owen has become the director of religious education for this school, we will expect to see it grow in numbers and in every good work. The other eight leading schools do not appear on the list of largest churches and all run over the eleven hundred mark. There are ten others that pass the one thousand mark—only a score in all the brotherhood enrolling one thousand pupils each.

4. In the amount given to missions through the Bible schools, commendable growth has been made. For American missions, Foreign missions and benevolences a total of $326,199.27 was given last year, a gain of $61,537.64 over the preceding year. The average gift per pupil has grown from 20 cents two years ago and 28 cents one year ago to 35 cents in this report. We ought to make that at least 52 cents for the next report, and that would be only a penny per pupil each Sunday for missionary and benevolent offerings. It is serious to note that there are only 1,323 schools that were unanimous in their gifts to Home and Foreign missions and benevolence, a loss of 91. It is also disquieting to see that 3,774 schools made no offering whatever, over one-third our entire number of Bible schools. Here is a challenge to the whole church, when one remembers that from the Bible schools of today must come both the contributors and the life recruits for the missionary cause of tomorrow.

5. All the statistical records are listed by states and provinces. This gives an excellent opportunity for state pride to exert itself in the various reports. Kentucky has been gaining from year to year, and this year leads all the states in the total amount given to all causes through the Bible schools, the amount being $46,220.25. Ohio, the former leader, drops to second place with $41,330.63; Missouri, which has almost as many schools, as Kentucky and Ohio combined, takes third place, while Illinois, Indiana and Texas follow in the order named. Indiana and Ohio are the only states reporting an enrollment of over one hundred thousand pupils, while Missouri, Indiana, Kentucky, Iowa and Texas have from fifty to a hundred thousand each in their schools.

6. The most alarming situation revealed in the 1920 Year Book is the matter of life service. The total number of white ministers reported is 5,830, a net loss of 78. It should be said in this connection that the number of colored preachers shows a gain of 44. Even more alarming is the increase in the number of preachers engaged also in secular pursuits. These have increased from 986 to 1,129. Eighteen per cent of the preachers listed in the Year Book are also engaged in some other business. The report is not given of those who have entirely ceased to preach and therefore do not appear in the Year Book at all. The number of churches served by a full time ministry have fallen off 557, that is, 557 fewer churches report a preacher giving them full time service than did so last year. This life problem, of course, concerns the whole church, but it is of particular concern to the leaders of the Bible school work. We must make a more insistent call upon our young people to give themselves to the ministry and the mission field. We must so hold up to them the claims of such life service that they will not falter or turn aside in economic crises such as the one through which we are now passing. And at the same time we must bring to bear every possible pressure locally and otherwise to secure for our preachers an adequate compensation and a deepening appreciation on the part of all our congregations. All our money will be of no avail if we do not have the consecrated life through which to spend it in the extension of the Kingdom.

Some statistics are dry, the 1920 Year Book, however, is of most vital interest to all. It is hoped that every Bible school will look up its own record and study it in comparison with other schools of like strength and opportunity. A most profitable hour may be spent in the workers' conference going over the statistical report for the year both of the local school and of the brotherhood. Then by means of graphs, charts and maps, let the secretary or some one else present the salient points to the whole school. A knowledge of the facts will help to make better records for 1921.

Bible School Secretary.

Why Not $2.00?

THE announcement of the increase in the subscription price of WORLD CALL from $1.00 to $1.50 a year has been received with all but universal approval. Instead of objecting to the advance people are asking, "Why did you not make it $2.00?"

If the Magazine Committee had known that the cost of paper was going to continue to advance, perhaps they would have set the new price at $2.00. When the action was taken it was estimated that $1.50 would meet the cost of production. As the aim is wide distribution and not profit the price was fixed at that figure. We hope that there will soon be a turn in the paper market that will make that sufficient.

Until July 1 the absurdly low price of $1.00 a year holds good, not only for those whose subscriptions are expiring in the meantime but also for any that expire not later than September, 1920.

But please remember that only one year's subscription can be accepted from anybody at the $1.00 rate.

Notes and News

The Keeley Cure Institute of Columbus, Ohio, is reported to have closed its doors.

Returns from the taxes on soft drinks will probably aggregate eighty millions of dollars this year.

The work in Duluth, Minnesota, continues to grow. S. T. Willis writes: "During nineteen days in January we had eight additions to the church and I made 43 calls. We have put the new envelope system into the Sunday school with fine results. The amount has increased between 300 and 400 per cent. The finances of the church have come up wonderfully this winter—the financial secretary says, "by far the best in the history of the church." The musical talent of the church is remarkably good. We are entering into the evangelistic campaign and will enlist all the personal workers possible. The outlook for the future seems to be full of promise. The Christian Endeavor has just become a "Life Line" Society.

From Rockford, Illinois, comes the following message through the minister, Guy V. Ferguson: "Miss Beulah Thomas has gone out from our church to attend the College of Missions and to prepare herself for the mission field. Miss Berneda Mabil has also volunteered, but has her college work to complete before she can go. These two are the fruits of a mission study class recently conducted."

O. E. Tomes, Gary, Indiana, writes: "Every Member canvass taken in December, but finished in January, increases the number of contributors about sixty per cent. The number pledged to give to missions is an increase of one hundred per cent."

Our work in Deming, New Mexico, has taken on new life as a result of the recent Scoville meetings. N. J. Reasoner, the minister, writes: The Charles Reign Scoville Union revival campaign closed February first. He has proven a tremendous force for righteousness in this community. He drew a sharp line between right and wrong, created a conscience in things where none had existed, strengthened the moral fiber of hundreds and left Deming a better place in which to live and raise a family. The church as a whole has a better spirit of unity, is alert, aggressive and enspirited. There remains much work to be done, but we are hopeful. Sixty-four tithing pledges were turned over to us, but not all who signed were members of this congregation. Thirteen were men and twenty-five were women. Three of our young girls volunteered as life recruits for any work to which the Lord may call them."

Charles H. Trout of Lakeland, Florida, reports: "Our work here is doing fine. Our slogan for this year is one hundred additions and so far we are running ahead. We baptized four last week and we have three more now waiting to be baptized and they are all fine people. Nearly all are young married people. Four of them are railroad officials and wives. The wife of one was a teacher in the Presbyterian Sunday school and secretary of one of its departments. Another is the daughter of the ex-superintendent of a Methodist Episcopal Sunday school and he is now teacher of the big men's class."

Lewis P. Kopp, Brownsville, Texas, reports: "The outlook in plans for future work, attendance at regular services and prospects for growth is better now than at any time since I came on the field. Assigning me as a Living Link missionary of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., is an added incentive to make our work such a success as to be of real profit and pleasure to the church and Sunday school that supports us. We rejoice in the fellowship."

From Dunkirk, New York, where O. F. McHargue ministers, we learn that during the last two months the Bible school has three times broken its previous high record of attendance. The young people have organized an Endeavor Society. The men's Bible class resolved to keep open house in the church parlors every Monday evening.

The secretary of West Washington, Ben N. Mitchell, writes: "Have had another busy month. Put on the every member canvass at Aberdeen. Visited six churches and attended the conference of secretaries and field workers at St. Louis. During the month of January two churches, Toppenish and West Seattle, have paid off all indebtedness. Our work in the state is steadily improving. We have many open doors which we are unable to enter because we lack men and money."

From W. P. Bentley of First Church, San Francisco, comes this cheering message: "During 1919 practically every department of church activity surpassed its record for 1918. More members were received. There was a greater net increase in membership. The church raised more money. It paid more to missions. It paid more on the church debt. The Bible school gained. The Endeavor membership was almost doubled. The church and Bible school observed fifteen special days. United and consecrated effort can win—even in San Francisco."

Pensacola, Florida, where Minor J. Ross has recently taken up the work, reports: "Glad to be able to show an increase for this month. An average of thirty-six in prayer meeting for month. All departments of work growing, with the finest fellowship I have ever enjoyed and excellent cooperation. Planning pre-Easter campaign, with home forces. The church seems to be very much pleased with the results attained so far and I am sure that the preacher is just as delighted with the location and the splendid opportunities that this work offers. I want to express my very great appreciation to the American Christian Missionary Society for the kindness shown me and the opportunity they have given me. This is one of the finest fields I have ever worked in and it is all because of their support."

E. C. Sechler reports the work in Florence, Alabama, as follows: "We set apart Sunday, February 1, as Christian Literature Day, and secured fifteen subscriptions to our church paper—most of these were new subscriptions. Our budget for the new year is materially increased. We are especially anxious to build up a church that is strongly missionary. We are planning for a Decision Day at Easter time. The church is enthusiastic and loyal; Florence presents a very promising field."

Marion A. McQuary reports a recent meeting in North Hill, Spokane, Washington: "Closed meeting here January 26. With Mr. and Mrs. Percy G. Cross. Had 72 additions, organized a band of 25 tithers. Raised money to pay all expenses of meeting, clear all debts on the church, including two payments we owe to Church Extension Board."

Benjamin W. Tate, Englewood, Buffalo, New York, reports: "Fifty per cent of membership this year are tithers; thirty-five per cent of families have instituted family altar in home. We unite with the churches of the brotherhood in the 'Each one win one' campaign. Our goal is a fifty per cent increase in church membership by Easter."

Miss Wenona Wilkinson is rejoicing in having her mother with her in Luchowfu, China. She writes that her mother is keeping quite well, and takes to chop sticks and all things Chinese very easily. She is teaching some English and studying some Chinese, so her days are well filled. Miss Wilkinson writes: "Our school work has been going on during the semester without many ups or downs. Our good matron and our science teacher, who is such a strong Christian influence, are helping wonderfully to maintain a high standard for the school. We surely must find some way to open more lower primary schools throughout the city and in the country. The great hindrance to opening such schools is the lack of Chinese teachers.

"Our Christmas season was the happiest we have known in China. We asked the teachers of the day schools to prepare programs to which the mothers and friends should be invited. Here at the boarding school we asked the Endeavor Society to take the program in charge. Formerly we have prepared an elaborate program ourselves, which was given at the church, for which the native teachers and children took no responsibility. This year the teachers and children entered into all the preparations with a beautiful spirit. The programs were all three very good, and the mothers and friends were preached to very directly and earnestly and fearlessly by the children themselves. The children, for the first time, brought contributions of rice, which in all amounted to about a bushel and a half. This, the matron, one of the teachers, and the Endeavor president, distributed to some of the worthy poor in the city."

Doctor Mary Longdon of India is rapidly recovering from the injuries inflicted by the panther. The little group of workers at Pendra Road are rejoicing over the happy reunion.

The Secretary of State has notified the friends of Mrs. Esther Treudley Johnson that she is well and is returning to Constantinople by way of Egypt. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson were on their way to India for work with the Young Men's Christian Association. For several months they have been detained in France, Constantinople and the Near East, where Mr. Johnson was assisting in special work needed at this time. When they reached Aleppo, Syria, it was arranged that Mrs. Johnson should want these while Mr. Johnson and Mr. Perry, Y. M. C. A. secretary for Turkey, made an overland trip to Aintab and Marash with American relief supplies. It was on this trip that both Mr. Johnson and Mr. Perry were murdered by Turkish brigands. Letters written by Mrs. Johnson are now reaching this country. She writes: "The name America has been a magic word out here and we all felt safe. This trouble came up like a flash—even the women are armed and fighting. None of us are safe now." Since this letter was written the above word was received from the Secretary of State.

Clifton, Colorado, is arranging to build a church to cost from $15,000 to $20,000 and is asking for $7,500 from the Church Extension Board. Clark Bower is the pastor. He has been in the Clifton congregation for ten years, living on a farm. The church is really rural. Clifton has a population of 165 and 1,500 people live within a radius of three miles. The church has a great missionary record. With their gifts to the Men and Millions Movement their total gifts to missions and benevolences in 1919 were $1,184.61, and the church was a unanimous giver. The church building is to be concrete basement, Romanesque style and stucco superstructure, with eleven class rooms on main floor and balcony, besides an auditorium. The building will be on the Transcontinental Highway. The whole community is taking pride in this new and beautiful building.

The Board of Church Extension is just now negotiating an Annuity with a friend for $4,000. This same friend gave $10,000 to Church Extension on the Annuity Plan, showing his great friendship for Church Extension and the Annuity Plan. During February Annuities of $700 were given by a friend in Iowa, $1,000 from North Carolina, $100 from South Dakota and $100 from California. This California friend has made nearly a dozen separate gifts.

At the meeting of the Board of Church Extension on March 1, the following loans at four per cent interest were promised: Lonsdale Church, Knoxville, Tennessee, $1,300; Morgan Park Church, Chicago, Illinois, $7,200; Grafton, West Virginia, First Church of Christ, $8,000; Batesburg, South Carolina, First Christian Church, $1,500; Louisville, Kentucky, Central Church, $6,000; Hugoton, Kansas, First Christian Church, $1,750; Maryville, Tennessee, $1,500; Bigheart, Oklahoma, First Church, $3,000.

Dr. Jenny Crozier expected to sail from Hongkong, China, to San Francisco, California, March 4. This is her regular furlough period. We know she needs the rest and change. In one of her letters she speaks of her dread of leaving the work at Bilaspur Hospital, without any one in sight who can carry it on. She has regretted for some time the lack of equipment for that hospital and need of a larger staff of helpers. We hope that before she returns to the field things needful may be supplied to the work for which she is giving her life.

Mr. E. T. Cornelius writes from Aguascalientes, Mexico, that the school there, which opened in January, has already enrolled somewhat over one hundred pupils, and that the English night classes have approximately sixty pupils in them. The missionaries on the field plead earnestly for more workers. We are thankful indeed that the College of Missions will furnish four or six new ones this year. We are trusting there will be others to follow a year later.

A recent letter from our missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Garrod has much interest in it. Our readers will remember that these workers are at Manigotogan on Lake Winnipeg in Manitoba, Canada. The "Harlan," our missionary boat on Lake Winnipeg, continues to serve a purpose in the mission.

They tell us that many young men are coming to the services of the church and they are very much worth while. Some of them are transient people, working in the lumber regions, but the missionaries feel that they are getting a touch of Christian life that will do them permanent good.

An every member canvass in the little congregation there has been very satisfactory. They are trying to send some of their offering to the various boards of the church.

They have put a new ceiling in the church building and have ordered material to improve the walls. This has been done from funds raised among the people, Mr. Garrod himself doing a good deal of the work.

They report a severe winter. Much of the time it has been 50 degrees below zero. They are encouraged with the thought that spring is coming.

The friends of Miss Wilhelma Smith and Dr. Lewis F. Jaggard may be somewhat surprised to hear that they were married on November 13, at the home of Emory Ross, Bolenge, Africa, Dr. Ernest Pearson officiating. We are sure that all will be ready to offer their hearty good wishes to these earnest missionaries who are doing so much for the suffering people of Africa. Their work is at Monieka.

Some months before her marriage, Miss Wilhelma Smith wrote, "Ever since I came I have been making friends among the town people as well as in our own Christian community. I wish I could show you my kindergarten, with from twenty-five to thirty-five little brown tots in it, who can't be restricted to one hour, but come to see me at all times. They are often irresistible, even though the color does sometimes rub off."

S. G. Rothermel, Maudaha, India: It is now about four-thirty in the morning. Tomorrow is Thanksgiving Day. We shall go to Mahoba today on our little red Indian motorcycle to be on hand for the service tomorrow. We have much to be thankful for this year. Our greatest cause for gratitude is the progress the work has made. During this month we have had eleven baptisms. That makes twenty-four in all this year so far, of which twelve were from one caste, the chamrs. We expect others to become followers of Christ shortly. Rejoice with us and pray for us.

R. D. McCoy of Japan writes that he and Mr. Yokoyama of Sendai have just visited all of our Japanese churches, speaking on stewardship and urging the churches to pay fifty per cent of a proposed increase in the salaries of all of our native preachers and evangelists. He states that almost without exception the churches agreed to increase the stipend twenty per cent and the mission will do the same. He states that the people were very happy in being able to do it and that they are getting a new vision of their responsibility for the development of their churches. He writes: "I feel that the prospects for the future are very bright." The step they are taking now will give them confidence and courage to take other steps in the future.

Edited by D. S. CAIRNS, D. D.
Preface by the Bishop of Winchester

Perhaps, as never before, the British Army during the Great War represented a sort of cross-section of the nation's life. Here, then, was an exceptional opportunity for an enlightening analysis of an army that represented the life of the men of the nation itself.

"It would be difficult to present the religious revelation and results of the war more skillfully and judiciously than they are presented in this report."

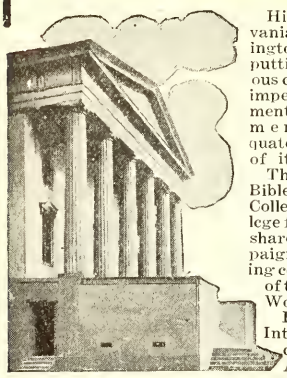
Transylvania's Big Plans

College of Bible and Hamilton College to Share Results of Campaign



Entrance to Main Building

Historic Transylvania College, Lexington, Kentucky, is putting on a vigorous campaign for the imperative enlargement of its equipment and for adequate compensation of its faculty.

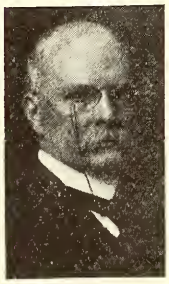
The College of the Bible and Hamilton College (Junior College for Women) will share in the campaign, which is being conducted as part of the Inter-Church World Movement.

Previous to the Inter-Church financial drive in April, Transylvania and its friends will concentrate on the importance of education among the 130,000 members of the Kentucky Disciple Church, and the former students and the alumni, in order to inform them concerning the urgent needs of these institutions.

Hon. Champ Clark, a product of Transylvania

A reasonable increase of the salaries of the faculty is absolutely necessary. They must have enough for a decent living, which they have not had since the doubling of living expenses. One of the first needs is a fire-proof building to house its library of rare old scientific works and other books of priceless value, the loss of which would be a real calamity.

Funds are also needed for additional endowment, to pay off indebtedness, to provide new buildings and repairs to old ones, and for an adequate athletic field with stadium, in order to maintain its rank and the progressive policies maintained since its founding, 1798.



James Lane Allen, noted author, graduate of Transylvania

The approved askings for these needs are $2,454,953 for the five-year period, $588,124 for 1920.

Among the noted men who have been connected with this institution are the two whose cuts appear, and Henry Clay, Jefferson Davis, Albert Sidney Johnson, Major General Duncan, Senator Mark Smith, Dr. Virgil Gibney, and John Fox, Jr. Dr. Richard H. Collins, the historian of Kentucky, characterizes its graduates as "statesmen, jurists, orators, surgeons and divines among the greatest in the world's history—men of mark in all the professions and callings of life."

In order to secure the addresses of all former students, it is hoped that those seeing this will at once send their present address to the Registrar; this will also insure their receiving full information regarding the campaign.

Requests for information regarding the campaign should be addressed to Gloversville, New York, expresses through the minister, C. W. Houston, gratitude for missionary aid: "Church is in splendid working condition. In November we took pledges amounting to $1,650, to be paid on or before June 1. Forty per cent of pledges are paid. This will reduce the building debt to a single mortgage of $5,000. We will take the Every Member canvass the first Sunday in March, with self-support as one of our aims. Nothing phenomenal has featured the past year, but it is conceded as being one of the best in the history of the church. There were fifteen splendid additions by baptism. Excepting a defunct country church, we are the only Disciples in the county; but it can be truthfully said that we have become a vital factor in the religious life of the city. We press on to larger things in the Kingdom, ever grateful for what the American Home Missionary Society has done for us."

H. M. Hale, minister of Highland Park church, Chattanooga, Tennessee, writes thus encouragingly: "We have been with the Highland Park church twenty months. A number of good people have come into the church. There have been some fifty added and a great list of prospects we will reach later in the year. We are quite confident that the church will soon grow into one of the strong churches of the brotherhood. We are having a delightful ministry, and peace and good will reigns in the church. These are a delightful and generous people. The church is progressive and wide awake. It is a joy to serve the warm hearted Southerners."

Norman Brighton, Boston, Massachusetts, "Glad to report progress being made in spite of the fact that within a radius of one-half mile around our church there are twelve other churches. And in spite of the fact that in Boston and in Greater Boston there are 900,000 Irish Catholics, 200,000 Christian Scientists, or leaners in that direction, 100,000 Jews, 50,000 Universalists, about the same number of Unitarians. All of this in a population of 1,500,000."

Moody Edwards. San Luis Potosi, Mexico: We have been directing the repairing, locating and cleaning of the rooms we are going to occupy in our work; providing plans, methods and means of caring for the ministerial students we have here; announcing and arranging for our work; giving attention to the colporteur and evangelistic work. We had no idea how many to prepare for in the school. We began work today, January 5, in the Kindergarten, Spanish school, English school, and the Ministerial department. We have fifty-nine enrolled now, and more are coming. We think this is a good beginning. The news has spread over the city. We hear it mentioned in all parts. We have worthy teachers in all departments. The colporteur work is important. Sr. Francisco Velasquez is working under our direction in this, and is supported by the Bible Society. He is a very faithful worker; has sold, to date, eleven Bibles, a number of New Testaments and Gospels, and has given out a large number of tracts. We have organized a complete follow-up system and find it working well. We had our first communion service last Sunday. We have had seven confessions. They are the first fruit of our work here in San Luis Potosi. We had 115 in Bible school.

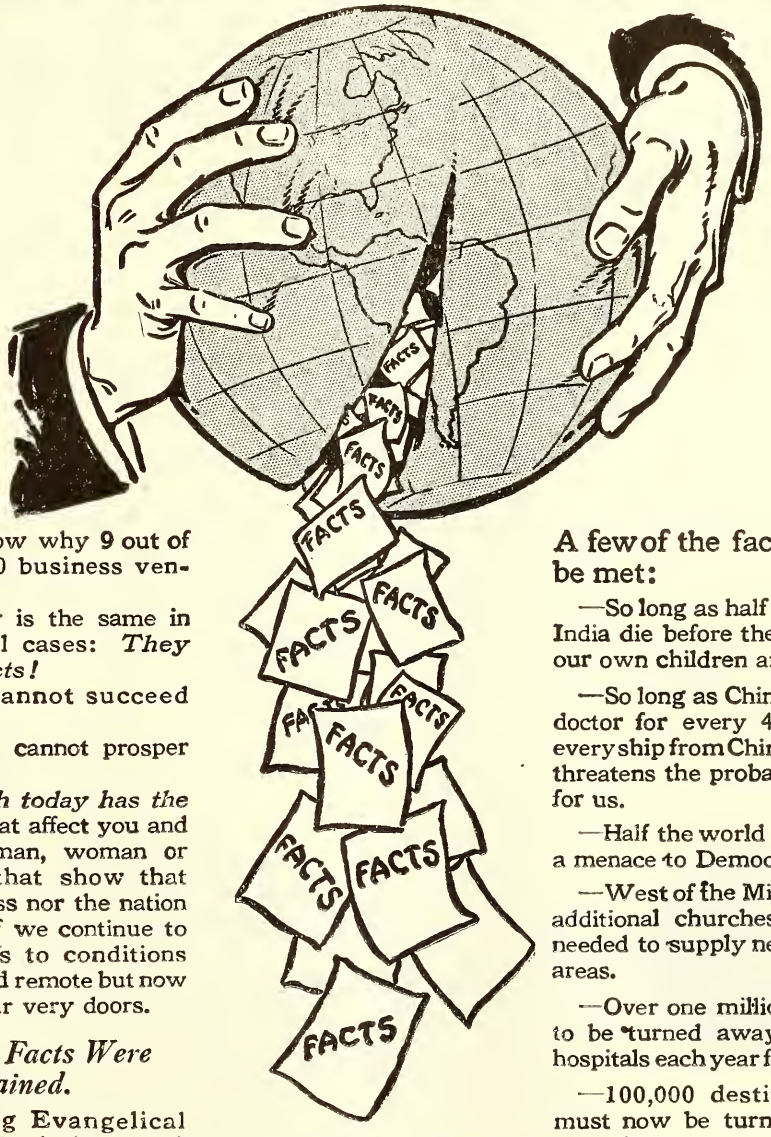
Now the Church Has Taken A Leaf From Successful Business



DO you know why 9 out of every 10 business ventures fail?

The answer is the same in practically all cases: They lacked the facts!

Business cannot succeed without facts.

The Church cannot prosper without facts.

The Church today has the facts—facts that affect you and every other man, woman or child; facts that show that neither business nor the nation itself is safe if we continue to shut our eyes to conditions once considered remote but now squatting at our very doors.

How the Facts Were Obtained.

The leading Evangelical Churches of North America have formed a league in a great co-operative movement in order to gain greater efficiency by eliminating waste and duplication of effort. This co-operative movement is known as the Interchurch World Movement.

The Movement set out to find the facts. No superficial survey was this. It searched the most remote corners of the world to discover things as they were—not as they might be. The results of this scientific survey reveal for the first time the whole task of the whole Church.

A few of the facts that must be met:

—So long as half the children of India die before their second year our own children are not safe.

—So long as China has only one doctor for every 400,000 people, every ship from China to our shores threatens the probability of plague for us.

—Half the world is illiterate and a menace to Democracy.

—West of the Mississippi, 5,000 additional churches are urgently needed to supply newly populated areas.

—Over one million people have to be turned away from church hospitals each year for lack of room.

—100,000 destitute children must now be turned away from homes and institutions.

How You Can Help Your Church and Your Nation.

Men and money are needed to carry out this world program. Not merely for church maintenance but for hospitals, colleges, schools, children's homes and social welfare around the world.

When your church calls upon you give—and give from your heart as well as your pocketbook.

A Good College

Miner Lee Bates, Pres. Hiram, Ohio

C. T. Radford, recently located in Willcox, Arizona, writes: "Members enthusiastically adopted the slogan '100 additions during 1920'. We will organize evangelistic teams and hold meetings in three or four towns near Willcox. A hard field, but some noble helpers."

Nampa, Idaho, reports a good work. B. F. Shoemaker, the minister, writes: "We are paying off our church loan. We will probably pay another $100 soon, leaving $1,000, which is all pledged but $200, and we plan to have it all paid in by April 1 and burn the mortgage. All feeling fine over it. Mr. Burr made a stirring appeal last Sunday and we pledged $650 during the day. Had seven additions by letter also. We expect others soon. Our Benevolent Society offering for the American Christian Missionary Society was $31.80. Our Benevolent Society offering for Ministerial Relief and Armenian Relief was over $25."

S. W. Brown, Warren, Arkansas, reports: "It is well known that the Warren church is less than eighteen months old, and like any child needs close attention and care. Though we are new we assumed some heavy obligations at the outset, getting hold of a piece of property where we could have a home and do the Lord's work. The part which the American Christian Missionary Society has had in helping maintain the work this past year has meant so very much to us, and we assure the Board that we appreciate what they have done. As we compare conditions now with those of one year ago, at which time the American Christian Missionary Society came to our assistance, we see a great difference. At that time we were owing $1,300, and small provision made for paying what would be due in the month of August following. Now we find ourselves with the indebtedness on the property reduced to $600.

"Thirteen have been added during the year 1919, and all services regularly held. This could not have been done except for the help given by the missionary society, in paying the minister's salary. We rejoice that there is such an agency to which we can turn in cases of this kind. As we view the situation help will still be needed for a year or two more. After that we trust with the Lord's blessing to be self-supporting. Our plans for this first six months include putting a floor in our tabernacle, which means an outlay of about $300, and the holding of a revival meeting in the early summer—June or July."

C. E. Robinson, Osaka, Japan: H. C. Sarvis has arrived in Osaka and will assist in teaching English in the Christy Institute. He will do other teaching also. I made trips to Gose and Shinjo in order to attend the Christmas exercises. The programs were especially good in all of our churches this year. Offerings were taken for relief work in Siberia and for other worthy causes, and the response was generous. The most marked improvement in our Christians for the past year is seen in their increased liberality.

Mrs. Idella Higdon, Manilla, P. I.: We are very enthusiastic about our work and life in Manila. I wish I had words to tell of all the kind things the older missionaries have done. We appreciate them more and more all the time. We are particularly enthusiastic just now over the plans for the Union Christian College. If we can have a regular compound it will mean a permanent home for us. It is rather inconvenient to move so often, but we are the smallest family, so we are the ones to move. Don't even think that we are complaining, for we are not.

Miss Edith Eberle, Laoag, P. I.: I had not been out in the province for an evangelistic trip for many a day; so was glad when I found myself packed up and away for a few days of real living among the people. We visited churches in three places, had conferences and special services, had three baptisms and a delightful time of fellowship. To reach one of these churches we followed a narrow roadway—too narrow and rough for the automobile—down a portion of which a river, suddenly appearing because of rains in the mountains, found its course. This we waded, slipping over sharp stones. Homeward bound late in the evening we were stopped by a river which we "couldn't get across" although the flood of water had come down from the mountains just a few minutes before we arrived. The men who had charge of the ferry were obdurate so we turned back, although Laoag and home comforts were less than one-half hour's ride away, and spent the night in the nearby town where we superintended the cooking of our belated supper and looked after cholera precautions. Then we held a short service and slept as soundly as though we had not been thwarted in our plan to reach home. Delays are a matter of course in the Orient.

Mrs. Minnie F. Ogden, Batang, Tibet: I have had vacation from school this month and have put in the forenoon studying Tibetan. Lee Gway Gwang and I are having a meeting every Tuesday for women and young girls who are asking for baptism.

J. C. Ogden, Batang, Tibet: Enrollment in the day school, 104; new pupils this month, 11; average attendance, 110. Gardening and farming among the pupils are very encouraging. Sewing, weaving and knitting belts require a small outlay, but appear to be of much benefit to the girls. They take great interest in their work. Since 85 per cent of the pupils must live by farming and the trades, we believe a small outlay in these lines is justifiable. The shoemaking department is self-supporting. The teachers do fine work.

The Nation's Peril and The Church's Shame

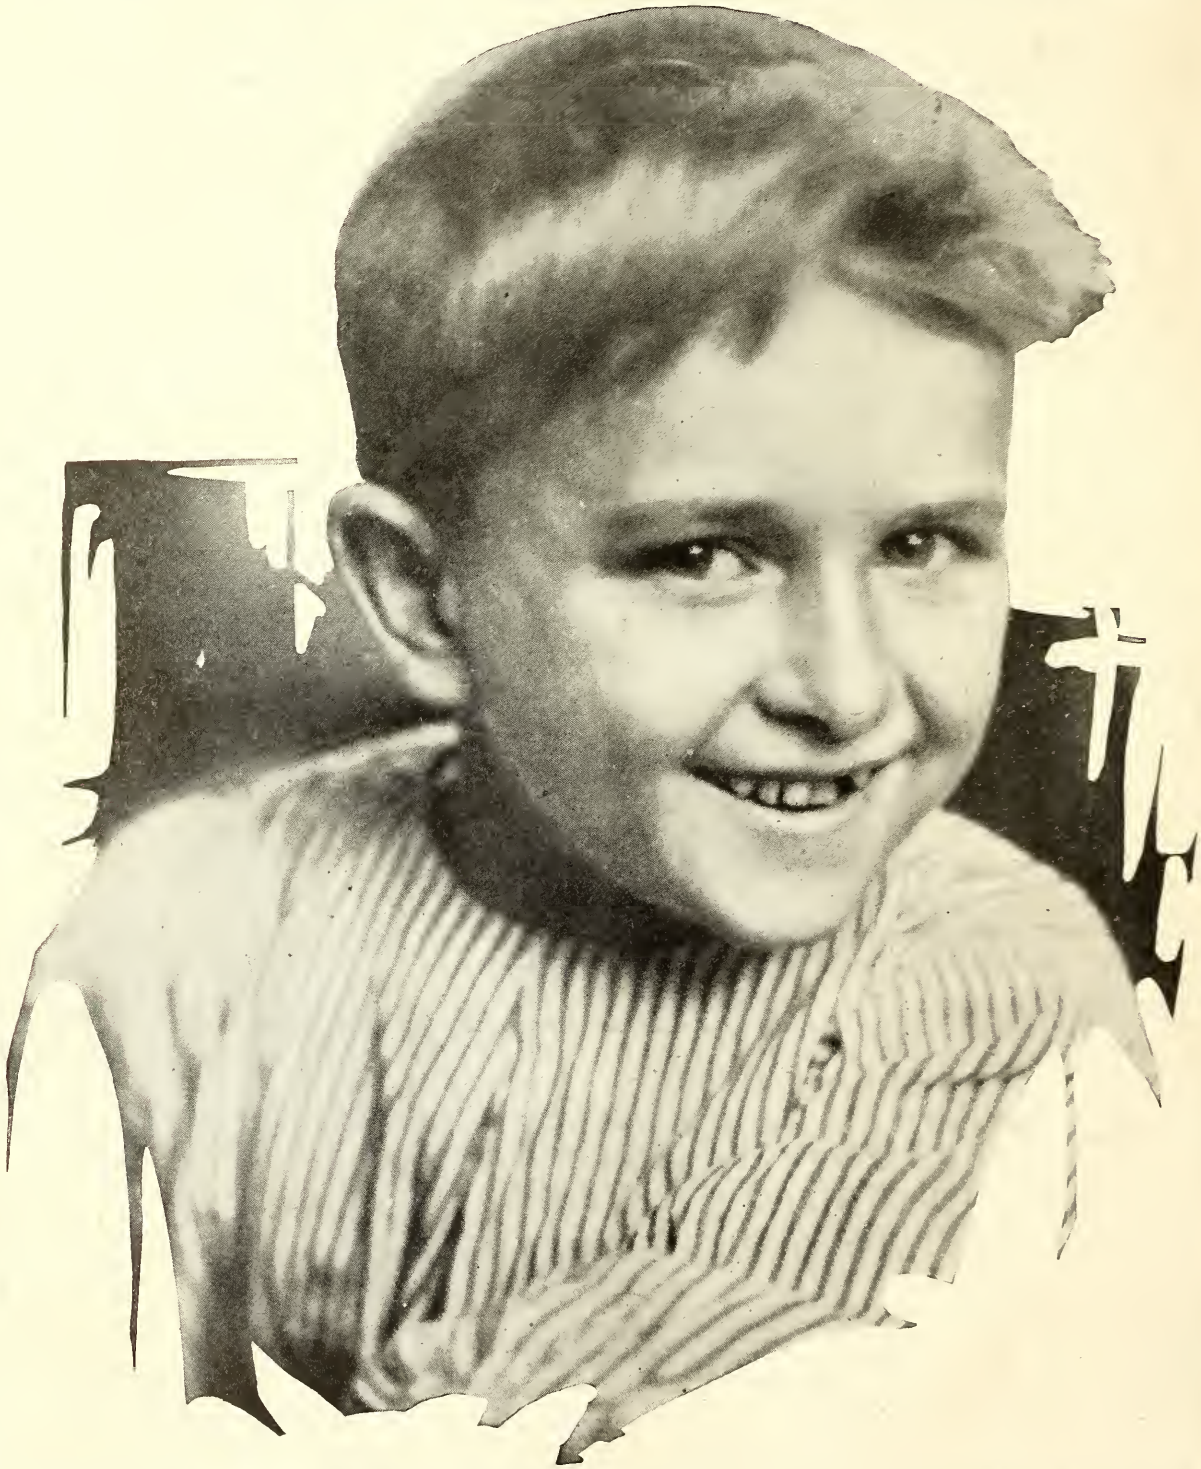
Well! What Will You Do About It?



You see I'm all right, but the rest are not. I couldn't use my legs at all when the church people brought me to their hospital. But the treatment is helping me, and maybe some day I'll be able to walk and run and play like other boys. So I'm all right! But what about other boys and girls? Doctor and nurse say all the homes and hospitals are full, and every day boys and girls that have no home, no father, no mother, are turned away. They say it'll take a million dollars this year to let the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church do its part. You'll help big, won't you?

Promotion on Merit

NOTHING need be told Disciples of Christ who attend conventions about Miss Daisy June Trout, a daughter of Kentucky who left a Y. W. C. A. secretaryship at a heavy sacrifice of salary to work in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. When the five magazines were united in WORLD CALL the Board was asked to release her to become Circulation Manager. The increasing duties and decreasing personnel of the Board finally compelled it to ask the Magazine Committee to permit Miss Trout to return to her former work, or rather to the larger work of the churches, womanhood in the United Christian Missionary Society. The change is a promotion.

Two things made it possible to do this without serious loss to the magazine. First, all secretaries, state and national, men and women, are field representatives of WORLD CALL. Second, Miss Bertha A. Haffield, who had come to WORLD CALL after two years' experience on Missionary Tidings, and had served with marked efficiency as Assistant Circulation Manager, carrying on the work of the office while Miss Trout was in the field more than half of the time, was ideally fitted to take over the entire responsibility of the Circulation Department. Our subscribers have already found her a prompt, courteous and capable correspondent, and the staff rejoices in her fellowship in our common task of producing and distributing a magazine that we hope will increasingly deserve at least a part of the generously flattering praise that comes to the office.

MAY 1920

The Church's Zero Hour

IT is 2 p. m. Sunday, April 25. Then begins the canvass for pledges in the Interchurch World Movement. This canvass will continue a week and a day, through Sunday, May 2. It is not a mere every-member canvass, but a thorough-going, intensive campaign, to reach every member of course, but not to leave him until he is adequately enlisted.

The askings of the cooperating churches for missions, benevolence and education amount to $336,000,000, of which $175,000,000 is to be paid within one year.

The amounts are too small, whether measured by the work that is to be done or by the resources of the 15,000,000 church members who are represented in the campaign.

This is war.

The supreme issues of the military war were not settled; the way was merely cleared for their settlement. It is the Christian war that must permanently save the world from greed and lust and tyranny.

Nothing but immediately impending disaster drew the Allies and America into the unity that marked the other conflict, and it has taken a like serious situation to lead 60 per cent of the evangelical churches of America to make common cause through the Interchurch World Movement. The campaign is united in some features and simultaneous in others, but cooperative in all respects. The same devil is fighting all the churches.

The battle line runs clear round the world, athwart every nation, and into every human situation. Wherever man is, there is the conflict.

This advance was ordered by the Prince of Peace nineteen hundred years ago. Today it is clearly seen that all the incalculable cost of the European war was due to the Church's failure to obey her Lord. She will now go and sin no more lest a worse evil come upon her. For every dollar of the budget that we fail to give now America will have to pay ten dollars in taxes in years to come. For every missionary she fails to send today ten soldiers will be required tomorrow.

So manifest is the necessity that the principal denominations not cooperating with their fellow Christians in this campaign have independently undertaken similar unprecedented forward movements.

The church that today shuts its eyes to the world's need of Christ and stops its ears to Christ's marching orders must hereafter call itself something else than a church of Christ or become an object of contempt in the eyes of all intelligent people. For this thing is not being done in a corner and participation in it is not being limited to church members.

The Interchurch World Movement is to continue five years. Some of the cooperating churches are taking their pledges for the entire period. The goal of the Disciples of Christ is definitely set for the first year at $12,000,000, equally divided between missions and education. The tentative aim for five years is $60,000,000.

Consider carefully the statements in this and the two preceding numbers of WORLD CALL regarding the needs to be met by this budget and you will see that instead of being a large sum it is altogether too small.

How can a great body of a million and a quarter people count itself doing more than its share when it gives in a whole year for the redemption of the whole world and for the education of all its own sons and daughters less than the cost of one battleship? Yet this is all our $12,000,000 budget amounts to.

The issue comes home more sharply to the Disciples of Christ since the culminating day of the campaign is May 2, our annual Home Mission day. The budget for Home Missions is $2,064,965, almost equal to that for all foreign fields combined, if the $197,331 for Religious Education (Bible school work) be included.

Even if we dared to slight the evangelization of Asia and Africa, we could not fail to see the immediate necessity of making North America Christian. If we were willing to let Latin America remain illiterate and without the Bible, we could not refuse to improve the Sunday schools of the United States and Canada or to train preachers for our own churches.

In the long run the two are one, for America, Christian, will inevitably share her faith with all the world.

A peculiar responsibility attaches to every reader of WORLD CALL in this supreme hour—the responsibility of knowledge. It is your privilege not only to make your subscription in the light of what the missionaries—call the roll and measure their sacrifices—are doing, but to report the facts to those who are not informed, and secure their cooperation.

Every citizen had to be enlisted in the support of our soldiers before the other war was won; every member and friend must be enlisted in the World Movement of Disciples of Christ for the support of our ministers, teachers and missionaries, before our part can be done toward the realization of the greater purpose of our Savior.

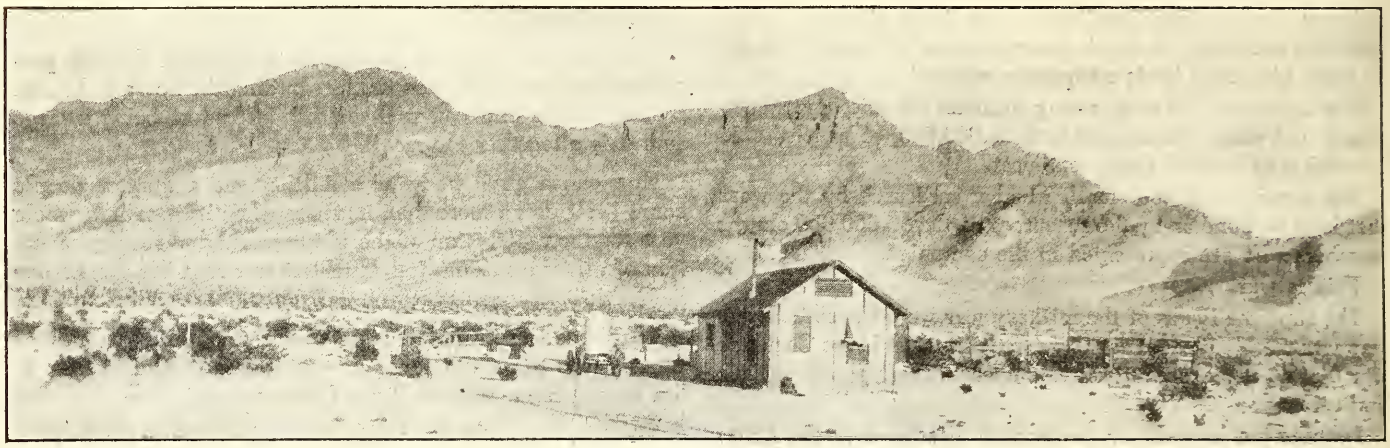
And let us come to the Zero Hour with prayer, as did our soldiers over there—prayer for guidance in doing our whole duty; prayer for those we should lead into fellowship with our missionaries; prayer for the cooperating churches and for all friendly citizens who are helping; prayer for all non-cooperating churches that separation from us may not mean unfaithfulness to their Lord; prayer for the front line that it may hold until relief comes and the victory of our Lord is assured.

False Prophets

By GRANT K. LEWIS

THE course of empire has made its way westward across the American continent, always in the face of the ignorance, prejudice and opposition of the conservative back home. Thus in the days of New England settlement, at the first general town meeting of Cambridge, Massachusetts, the town council was instructed to build a road to the west "as far as it would be needed." At the second meeting, one year later, the council was severely criticised for building the road so much farther than it would ever be needed, thus wasting the people's money. They had built the road eight miles!

One of the first missionaries ever sent to Chicago complained that the location could never be anything more than a swamp and that it would be a waste of missionary money to attempt to establish relief work there.



A Shack in the Desert Where a New Home Is in the Making

If Daniel Webster were only alive today we would like to have him visit the Pacific coast, stopping at Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland and Seattle. If Daniel could see the big ocean liners in that magnificent harbor at Seattle, he might recall that once upon a time he said, "What can we hope to do with the western coast of three thousand miles, rockbound, cheerless and uninteresting and not a harbor on it? Mr. President, I will never vote one cent from the public treasury to place the Pacific coast one inch nearer Boston than it is now."

And Senator Benton of Missouri said, "The ridge of the Rocky Mountains may be named as the convenient, natural and everlasting boundary. Along this ridge the western limits of the Republic should be drawn and the statue of the fabled god, Terminus, should be erected on its highest peak, never to be thrown down."

And in all seriousness, Senator Dickerson of New Jersey said, "Is this territory of Oregon ever to become a state, a member of this Union? Never! A young, able-bodied Senator might travel from Oregon to Washington (D. C.) and back once a year, but he could do nothing else. It would be more expeditious to come by water around Cape Horn, or to pass through Bering Straits."

But Senator McDuffie of South Carolina, in 1843, capped the climax when he said, "Have you made an estimate of the cost of a railroad to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. Of what use would it be for agricultural purposes? I would not give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory."

From that so-called "Oregon Country" there was carved three states, Washington, Oregon and Idaho, whose population in 1910 was 2,140,349, and whose estimated valuation in 1912 was $5,771,020,234. And to think that less than seventy-five years ago a wise United States Senator said it wasn't worth "a pinch of snuff"!

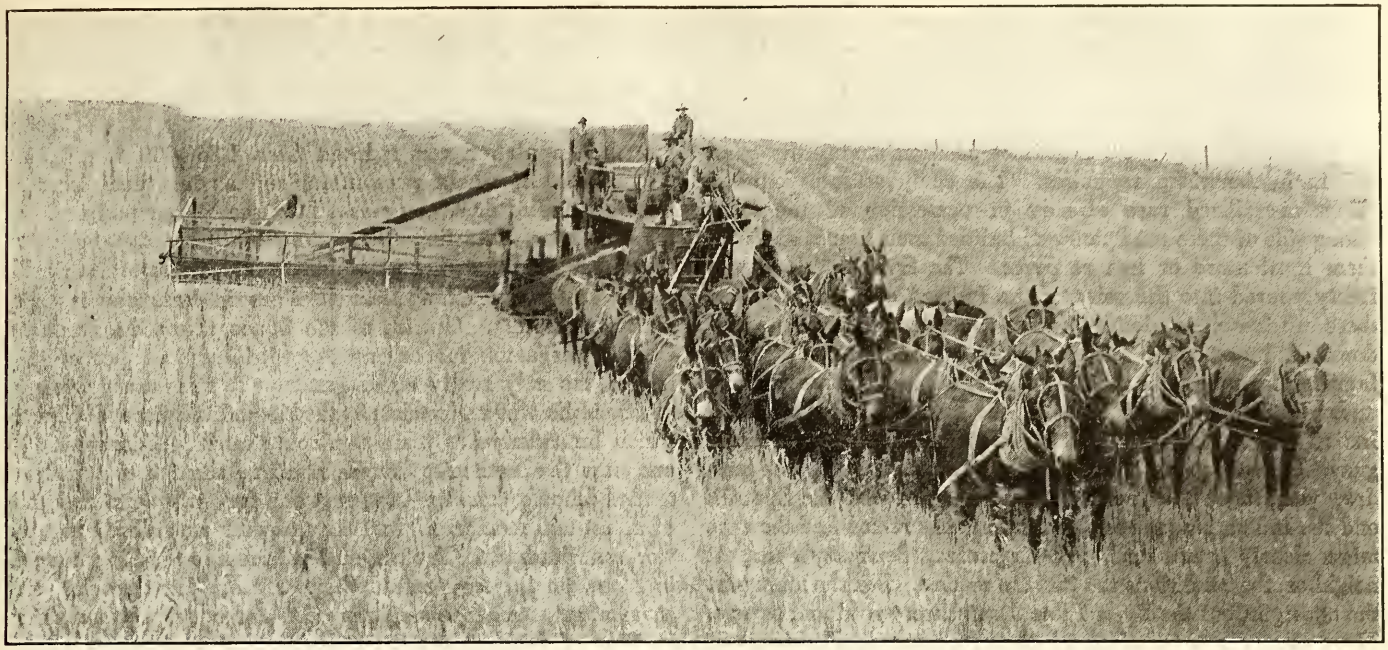
Proctor Knott's speech on Duluth has become a classic of satirical literature. It has found a place in many standard publications of oratory and has been published in many editions by the Commercial Club of Duluth. In it he said:

"Now, sir, as to those great trunk lines of railroads spanning the continent from ocean to ocean, I confess my mind has never been fully made up. It is true they may afford some trifling advantages to local traffic, that they may even, in time, become the channel of a more extended commerce; yet I have never been thoroughly satisfied either of the necessity or expediency of projects promising such meager results to the great body of the people." And again:

"'Duluth!' The word fell upon my ear with peculiar and indescribable charm, like the gentle murmur of a low fountain, stealing forth in the midst of roses, or the soft, sweet accents of an angel's whisper in the bright, joyous dream of sleeping innocence. Duluth! 'Twas the name for which my soul had panted for years, as a hart panteth for the water brooks. (Renewed laughter.) But, where was Duluth? Never, in my limited reading, had my vision been gladdened by seeing the celestial word in print. (Laughter.) And I felt a profound humiliation in my ignorance that its dulcet syllables had never before ravished my delighted ear." (Roars of laughter.)

Yet in 1914 Duluth had 90,000 population, bank deposits of over $23,000,000, an assessed valuation of over $323,000,000, grain shipments of over 93,000,000 bushels and a lake shipment of over 33,000,000 tons, worth over $287,000,000.

The barren waste to which the speaker referred has become a great agricultural section. Duluth has in a measure attained the commercial and industrial prominence he attributed to her in extravagant phrases and the predictions made in jest have thus come true.



Combine Harvester at Work in the Big Bend District, Lincoln County, Washington, Cutting, Threshing, and Sacking as It Goes

The whole world knows now how lacking in vision these great statesmen were. In 1889 the American Christian Missionary Society sent William F. Cowden to the Northwest. Then, one by one, churches began to appear in growing towns. So also men of God were sent into the great state of California, and churches about Los Angeles and San Francisco Bay began their development. Because of this far-seeing vision of the American Society hundreds of churches are growing on the west coast. In the states of California, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho we now have 506 churches, which gave last year to benevolences, in addition to supporting their own local churches, $170,116.20.

This same misunderstanding based on ignorance and prejudice has been voiced against the development of Alaska. When Secretary Seward proposed to buy Alaska he was greeted with shouts of derision from Congress, and the members vied with each other in piling vituperous epithets upon his unhappy head. They called it "Seward's Folly," "Walrussia," "The Frozen Empire," "Icebergia," and the like. Nevertheless, just as the "Oregon Country" fooled the wise men, so Alaska is fooling the folks of a later generation. While the eminent statesmen railed over the expenditure of $7,200,000 used in the purchase of Alaska, it is interesting to know that the value of the 1918 catch of Alaska salmon was $20,000,000, and it has produced in minerals, furs, fish and other products more than $550,000,000. It is coining money by the millions, its fish and its copper now exceed its gold, and its agricultural development has only begun. Alaska is our last great frontier. It has the room, the resources and the climate. It is now getting the people and the transportation facilities.

The American Society in 1917 sent Harry Munro as its first missionary to Alaska. He explored this great country and noted the strategic places and developed an acquaintance. As a result of his labors the Society can now wisely plan the future of our work in this great empire. Plans are in the forming for sending two missionaries to Alaska when the opportune time arrives, one to do itinerant work among the new towns and camps; the other to establish and develop a permanent church at Petersburg, and from that base render service by motor boat to the canneries and lumber camps in adjacent territory. The estimated cost of this program is $6,000 per year.

THOUSAND SPRINGS

One of the most remarkable pieces of scenery in the State of Idaho is "Thousand Springs," issuing from the northern wall of the Snake River Canon. The flow is several thousand cubic feet per second and is constant throughout the year and maintains a temperature of about 60° F. They come from a subterrancan flow of "Lost Rivers." The largest single spring is "Snow Bank," discharging 1,500 gallons per second. The waters from "Thousand Springs" are used to generate electric power and for irrigation. Thus man is assuming dominion over nature and making the desert glad and fruitful. The gospel must accompany material progress or it will be a peril. The picture was sent to World Call by Mr. H. L. Cook, of the Idaho Power Company, Boise, Idaho.

Now or Never in Paraguay

By C. MANLY MORTON

PARAGUAY occupies a distinct position among the other Latin American republics. The early settlers found a semi-civilized race already in possession of the land. Along side of these the Spaniards builded their homes and with them lived more or less at peace. The Spanish blood was freely poured into the veins of the Indians until today, while there are few pure blooded Indians in Paraguay, yet the predominant blood of the Paraguayan race is Indian and the most familiar language, the most widely used and the most freely understood, among the mass of the people, is the Guarani Indian language. Very little immigration has reached Paraguay. The race today is practically the same as it was one hundred years ago, with perhaps the exception that the Spanish and the Indian bloods are more thoroughly mixed and the type more clearly established. In Argentina, Paraguay's nearest neighbor, the conditions are just the reverse. For the most part the aborigines of the River Plate district were wild and savage. There was no compromise with the new comers. The result is that as in the States, the Indian population was either killed or driven back into the wilds, where today in ever diminishing numbers they rove and live their nomadic life. Argentina has received a vast stream of immigration. Buenos Aires is almost as cosmopolitan as New York City. Spanish, Italian, German, Irish, Russian and many other races have there found their homes and freely mixed their bloods, not so much with an aboriginal race as with one another. The result is altogether different from that found in Paraguay. Racially the Paraguayan is different from the Argentine or from any other Latin American. He is different in sentiment, in emotion, in morale, in character. He must be dealt with and met on a different plane.

Paraguay is an inland republic. To the east, west and north she is almost completely cut off from her neighbors by dense swamps and woodlands and by the lack of ways of communication. Her only outlet is through the Argentine Republic to the south. She has, therefore, suffered from the pressure and often oppression brought to bear by the Argentine government, which for sixty years after the liberation of the colonies from Spain sought to force her to join the Argentine Confederation and lose her identity in the larger nation. The result is that while this nation is in many things forced to accept the leadership of her stronger neighbor, yet there are those who advocate a conscious rejection of anything Argentine and seek deliberately to create opposing circumstances.

During the first thirty years of her liberation from Spain Paraguay was completely cut off from the outside world. During the entire reign of the dictator Francia no one was permitted to enter or leave the country without a special permit from the dictator and these permits were seldom given. During this time the country developed and lived upon its own resources. This period of isolation tended to accentuate the peculiar traits of the people and to give them a temperament and character all their own. At the close of the first half century of her freedom from Spanish rule and at the height of her intellectual, social and material development, when she stood as perhaps one of the best known and most influential and powerful nations of the southern continent, she was made the double victim of the ambitions of her own ruler from within and of the envy and jealousy of her neighbors from without, and was thus forced to fight a war to extinction against the combined forces of Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina. In this war the population was reduced from 1,200,000 to 220,000, only 20,000 of whom were males and among them scarcely one able-bodied or strong man. Her wealth, her position, her all was gone. Starting there, she fifty years ago began to rebuild and to regain her place among the nations of the world.

The history of Evangelical Missions in Paraguay is especially interesting. Outside of the Chaco where the Anglican Church has a mission among the wild Indian tribes of that region, the only really serious attempt at missionary work in this republic was undertaken by the Methodist Episcopal Church which for twenty-five years conducted work in Paraguay. At one time the Methodist Church had in Asuncion two well attended schools (one for boys and one for girls) and a church of about 140 members. In 1912 the work was closed and the workers withdrawn. The United Brethren have had two couples in Asuncion for ten years. They have one little service with an average attendance of perhaps 20 and not more than three, or four of them at the most, Paraguayans. The others are Turks or Syrians. The John Hay Mission has been working in Paraguay for some seven or eight years. Various independent missions have been established in Asuncion and the outlying regions during the past several years. Every one of them has within a short time failed and left the field. Today, notwithstanding the fact that the United Brethren and the John Hay Mission still maintain their workers and that the Southern Baptists are sending two men to Asuncion within the near future, I feel that I am well within the truth when I say that Paraguay is, practically speaking, a virgin field and that the biggest effect of the past efforts at work in this country has been to demonstrate beyond a doubt that if Paraguay is to be reached and influenced that it must be undertaken with a broader vision, a further look into the future and with a different program from anything that has ever been undertaken in the past.

In Paraguay today the Disciples of Christ have a peculiar responsibility as well as a unique opportunity. The eyes of all American Christendom are upon us watching the spirit and manner in which we undertake and execute this task. If we fail, we will commit one of the most colossal missionary blunders of the age. If we succeed, we will win a nation for Christ and will set in motion a force which will do much toward bringing all of South America to the feet of the Master of Men.

In the past, Christianity has meant a system of hollow formalism, the priesthood a means of extortion, a profession in which mediocre men have entered and have lived in drunkenness and immorality upon the ignorance and superstition of their fellow beings.

This condition has its direct effect upon Evangelical missions. The fact that these men are disgusted with the Catholic Church does not signify that they are in any sense inclined toward Protestant missions. They are as strongly against us as they are against the Roman religion. To them explanations are of no avail. We may explain until our voices fail. We may tell them that Evangelical Christianity is different from the Roman faith which they have always known. We may dwell upon the purity of the message we bring, the highness of its principles and the divineness of its origin. But they are used to words. They have heard just such claims from the priests. In Latin America the work of Christian missions is more difficult than among a people who have never heard the name of Christ. Here, the people have heard too much and seen too little. The gospel which today takes hold of the hearts and lives of these people, must be preached through the school room, the hospital, the orphanage, the social contact, the daily living of the workers who day by day quietly, inoffensively live the teachings of the Son of God.

The worker who comes to Paraguay should be a more enthusiastic envangelist, a stronger believer in the power of the Gospel of Christ and a more determined worker for the final establishing of His Kingdom than the one who goes to a field where the church is the first institution established and where the preaching of sermons from the pulpit is one of the most conspicuous duties. But the man or the woman who comes to Paraguay must be able to look ten, twenty, fifty years into the future and to work today with his eyes on the days to come. He should have a double endowment of faith, patience and love. He should so teach school that the boy who passes through his classes will some day ask of him, or perhaps his successor when he shall have passed away, to tell him the secret of that man's life and to reveal to him more of the divine power which would make men live as did he. He should so administer assistance to the sick and the needy that the day will come that men seeing the Christlikeness of his life will themselves ask for the church and its fuller activities and duties. He should so lecture on literature, on science, on politics, on art that every lecture will bear a message of health and healing to the hearts and souls of those who hear. In this way the ears of the nation will be opened and its soul touched and quickened.

In view of the above facts and conditions, I would at this time like to recommend:

1. The establishment of a modern high grade Christian school for boys and girls, with the three departments, i. e., Kindergarten, Primary and Secondary Instruction, according to the revised program of the National College.

At least one new modern school building should be ready for occupancy by the beginning of the school year March, 1921. In order to construct this building, plans should be prepared at once and estimates secured in order that work may begin at the earliest moment.

2. The naming of this school, Colegio Internacional. It will be necessary to have a name for the institution from the very beginning.

3. The establishment of a modern agricultural school (at some place near Asuncion to be designated by the Paraguayan government), as early as the proper man can be found to direct it. There is not such an institution in all Paraguay and no other institution is more desired by the Paraguayans or would fill a greater demand or need. The government has promised to give us the land and a small subvention for stocking and maintaining such a school. Several times during the year just closing officials and men of prominence have inquired as to our intentions and plans and have expressed a strong desire for the realization of such a work. Unless we are able to do something along this line within the next two years, I fear the opportunity will be lost. The demand is so great and the need so pressing that unless the government sees that we mean to accept its offer, I fear that it will be placed elsewhere and that not only some one else will gain this advantage in influencing the life of Paraguay, but that the work will be done in a less efficient manner and the influence exerted for the promotion of a less important cause.

4. There is a crying need for medical work in Paraguay. Leprosy, tuberculosis, syphilis and other diseases carry off thousands every year. I will quote extracts from an editorial published in "El Diario," one of the largest and most influential papers of Asuncion. When translated the editorial reads as follows: "With the motive of his recent return from Villa de San Pedro, where he is installing a hospital for the treatment of syphilitic diseases, we have had the opportunity of interviewing Dr. Jose V. Ynsfran and of asking him his impressions of the sanitary conditions in that important district. The above mentioned physician did not hide his alarm and manifested to us that the situation is positively grave and that it is going to require an energetic and persistent treatment. The sanitary problem, he assured us, assumes such proportions in the department of Villa de San Pedro, as well as in the entire republic—proportions so formidable and overshadowing—that if it is not solved within a short time, the entire future of the race will be endangered." "This single instance," the writer continues, "will be sufficient to demonstrate the extent of the problem: More than seventy per cent of the young men drawn for obligatory military service have to be rejected on account of their physical condition. Such a condition would produce fright in any other country, where twenty per cent is considered a proportion alarming."

S. G. Inman Trying to Photograph a Market Woman in Asuncion, Paraguay

According to unofficial statistics (there are no official statistics on this point) the average life in Paraguay is less than 25 years.

According to government statistics, twenty-eight per cent of all deaths is among children of less than one year of age. Forty-five per cent of all deaths is among children of less than five years of age. The infant mortality is indeed alarming.

The government is just now putting forth a strenuous effort to better the conditions, and the more progressive of the people are alive to the danger and the need for quick and decisive action. But the problem is so immense and the means at hand so meager that an internal solution of the problem is not likely to come within the near future. The government has not the funds with which to meet the needs. The number of doctors in the country is not sufficient. The preparation of a great many of the practicing physicians is lacking in many details (in the country districts any person, whether he has ever had medical training or not, can practice medicine). The one government hospital here in Asuncion and the various private sanitoriums are poorly equipped and far below the normal standard.

Several, among them some of the prominent doctors of the capital, have suggested to us the great need and the advisability of our establishing a model hospital here in Asuncion. Outside of this city there are several towns of importance, each with a back territory of thousands of square miles, without even the pretensions of having a hospital and some of them without a trained doctor. There are vast regions in which a consecrated doctor could do a monumental work in his profession and at the same time direct the religious thought and being of thousands of people. Such a doctor could, perhaps after the first year or two, be entirely self-supporting.

I would therefore recommend that the Board begin searching for: 1st. A doctor and two trained nurses for a hospital to be established either in Asuncion or in one of the other towns of the republic (the exact location to be determined upon further investigation); 2nd. For a doctor to go into the interior for general practice. I believe important financial aid for the above work can be secured here on the field. I would further recommend that if at all possible the first doctor be sent out within the next two years.

5. There is not a single orphanage for boys in all of this republic. There is but one such institution for girls and that is conducted in the same buildings and under the same management with the poorhouse and the lunatic asylum. This institution is conducted by the Catholic Sisters aided by a subvention from the government.

Since our school to be opened in Asuncion is to be for boys from the higher class families and since it is impossible to mix the two classes in the same institution, I would recommend that the Board plan to establish, as early as possible and not later than 1924, a Boys' Orphanage and Industrial Training School in either Villa Rica or Concepcion, the second and third largest towns in the republic. I would also recommend that as early afterwards as convenient, or even at the same time or before, if the specially prepared workers and funds can be secured, that a Girls' Orphanage and Domestic Training Institute be established in one or the other of the above mentioned towns. For this work a grant of land and some financial aid can be secured from the government and citizens of each locality.

6. There is great need for social leadership in Paraguay. The social life is putrid with immorality and the mental life is highly impregnated with materialism and vice. Sixty-three per cent of all births in Paraguay are illegitimate. The late president of the republic, one of the most honest executives as well as one of the most respected and loved officials the nation has ever had, was never married to the woman who was the mother of his children. In the same issue of the paper which mentioned that his eldest son marched in the procession to the cemetery, the day's extract from the official registry classified him as a bachelor. Congress voted to pension his minor children, but never a word was mentioned about the poor woman who had borne them. The sanitary conditions are unbelievably bad. The only thing which saves the country from constant epidemics is the scorching brightness of its tropical sun and frequent, drenching rains which wash everything before them. The young manhood is idle and lacking in idealism. In many ways Paraguay is yet in the middle ages. There should be at least one couple in Asuncion with the qualities, training and means for social service leadership. The school should be made a general social and cultural center. In the new buildings there should be a first-class auditorium and an up-to-date gymnasium. There should be a well-planned and ample athletic field and all of these accommodations should be so arranged that at certain times they can be used by and for the entire community. There should be a first-class motion picture machine with a service of educational films. Lecture courses covering the fields of literature, science, morals and religion should be organized and made attractive to the public.

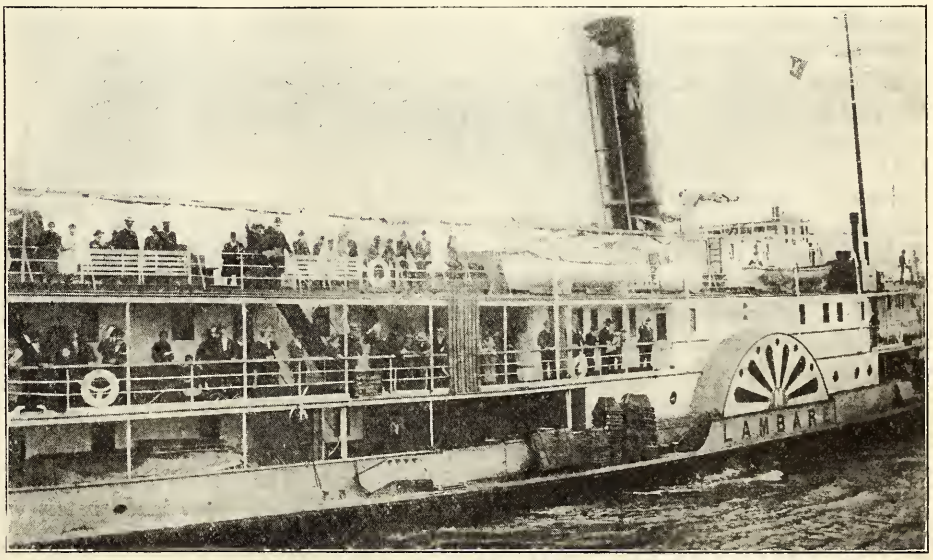
There are also opportunities for social workers, such as director of social activities for the various North American Companies which have established themselves in Paraguay. If the man could be found it is probable that one of the most important of these companies would, at present, put him on their pay-roll and bear all of the expenses of his work, for the sake of having a director for the social and religious life at its plant. Of course, a work of this kind would be, in a way, limited in its scope, yet there are vast opportunities in this field, and it is well, in the search for men, to keep this in mind.

7. I would like, also, to recommend that "mission homes" be erected for all missionaries sent to Paraguay. House rents, as well as all other expenses, are higher in Paraguay than in any other country of the world. From our own experience, we know that all living expenses, including rents, are double what they are in Buenos Aires. Besides this the commodities are far inferior. The average house in Asuncion which rents from $75 to $100 gold per month is both unsanitary and lacking in even the most rudimentary commodities. The house which rents from $50 to $75 gold per month is for the most part unsanitary to the point of being really dangerous. For less than $50 gold per month there are no houses to be found, of any kind, within the radius of the city where a missionary can at all afford to live.

8. Lastly, I would recommend that Paraguay be made the subject of special study and prayer during a part of this incoming year. This is a task as big and as important as the Disciples of Christ have ever undertaken. It is a work which is going to require the outlay of life and means on a large scale. Its opportunities are today at their zenith, tomorrow they will begin to wane if not taken advantage of at once. Human power cannot accomplish the task which we have taken upon ourselves in this nation. Those who come to the field must be backed up by an intelligent interest and by a united campaign of prayer on the part of the constituency at home.

During the five year period between 1924-29 the number of workers should be increased to at least 56 and several new branches of work should be opened, such as combined school and evangelistic work in several of the interior towns, a colony and industrial and agricultural training institute for the Indians of the old Jesuit mission territory, a church in Asuncion and perhaps one or two of the larger towns. Something might also be done among the wild tribes of the Gran Chaco.

Realizing its imperfections, I at the same time take pleasure in submitting the above report for your earnest consideration. I ask for it a patient, critical study and for ourselves as well as for those others who are perhaps at the present time on their way to Paraguay, the interest and prayers of the entire brotherhood.



Paraguay's Principal Means of Communication with the Outside World, 1,100 Miles Away

Is Religion a Necessity?

By F. E. SMITH

THE argument of money carries conviction in all channels of life. It is the statement of a general law to say that people spend their money for what they want. This holds good the same as that people find time for what they want most to do.

Is religion a necessity? Christian minded people give ready and active assent. They think in the realm of faith, many in the realm of conscience. Viewed from the final and practical point is this the real answer?

The amount of money spent for religion is less than for any regular items in our accounts. When we think in terms of necessities we recall food, shelter, clothing and other items. If religion is a necessity it seems that somehow it should be related to this classification in more than theory. If we recount the amounts spent for comforts we do not find any place for religion, the amount spent on it is too small. When one thinks of the luxuries indulged in by the present prodigal spending, it is at once clear that religion, so far as amount spent on it is concerned, has no place here. In a practical consideration where can religion be classified according to the amount it costs? Not with vital necessities, nor with comforts, certainly not with luxuries. It appears then that we have argued to the world in a way that speaks conclusively that we do not consider religion a necessity. We may not like this statement of fact but we have it to face. A church that costs little will be valued little.

The Problem Analyzed

Any problem is unsolved until analyzed. The twelve million dollar Interchurch Budget looks large until analyzed, but after that we feel like apologizing because it is so small. When seen in comparison with our real ability and resources there is no room for boasting, unless we compare with the former days of giving when this grace was even more unpopular than it is now. The Interchurch Budget means an average of two cents and seven mills a day for all our people. This budget and the current expense budget of all our churches are carried by a six-cent daily average. If a half cent more is given, a four hundred dollar increase could be made in the salary of every preacher. It looks like a trivial amount when compared with our other daily expenditures, for example street car fare one way.

Is Christ, the Church and world redemption worth to us as much as the price of our ride to work? It is odd indeed how such a sum is spent without a thought, in the daily round of life, but when claimed by the Master, it assumes the proportions of a real obstacle! When compared with our former standards of giving, six and one-half cents daily looms large. What a program this amount would carry! How can we do less and have any sense of respect for ourselves and our religion? Yet this amount is not to be considered for a moment in the classification of necessities. We will have to move up much farther than this before religion becomes a necessity, from the money consideration.

The Fatal Cost of Parsimony

We are beginning to uncover the shame of the Church. The lack of resources has placed second rate or practically no equipment in the average church. Ministerial support has been on a church starvation basis, our missionaries have been broken and many are needlessly dead because of lack of equipment and overwork due to insufficient workers. Our colleges have been starved until we esteemed them too weak to nourish our own sons and daughters, whom we then sent to tax-supported institutions or those fostered by Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and Episcopalians. All this while the Church has greater resources than any secular institution. No corporation would so equip and support its employes. It would not be good business. We have dwelt on the resources of God while we have not called into service the wealth of the Church and her friends. We ought to quit calling on God to undertake what He has already endowed us to do.

Big Dividends on Minute Investments

The day has come for those who propose to accept the divine mandate to lead the lives of men, to demonstrate in terms that all must accept that religion is a necessity. This done will usher in a new day of revival. Unimagined spiritual resources will be released. The value of a heroic challenge to our giving, if accepted, will be worth to the Church all it costs, without considering the objective for which it is given. If men are right with God on the money question the chances are good that they will be right all around. If they are wrong on this, it is mighty hard to be right in the rest of life. The money test of Jesus is as real today as when first spoken.

There is a call in stewardship that we dare not disregard any longer. There are many good plans for giving, for instance, it is hard to understand how any one can cultivate the grace of liberality and give less than the tithe. But this is a minimum standard. Some argue about tithing, not those who practice it, however. When we come to view our religion as a necessity in our giving, we accept a principle that goes beyond any plan of minimums. It vitally affects the whole life.

The half cent mentioned above that produces a four hundred dollar salary increase for every one of our six thousand ministers, has in it great resources both material and moral for the kingdom. It would place the preacher at the front as a leader and free him from a thousand troubling anxieties. Large numbers of churches could take on a full time ministry and have a real chance to live and serve. Ministers who have been driven out of the pulpit could be called back and those whose time and strength have been divided could be claimed wholly for God. Many dying churches would be revived by such an infusion of new blood. There would be born a new conviction in preaching and a much greater loyalty to the ministry.

We Are Well Able and We Will

Our resources are more than enough for such an unheard of gain. If we understand how such giving will strengthen the church, redeem the world and develop our own souls, it is nothing short of criminal before God and the needs of men to refuse. But even the giving that will produce such results as just seen does not bring the spending for God up to the place occupied by what we spend for our necessities. We will have to multiply our giving many times before we can cease to apologize for it. How woefully lax we have been and how inadequately we have occupied the field God expected us to cultivate! A great new day is yet ahead, to be brought in by loyalty to the scripture in our giving to God.

Unredeemed America

By F. W. BURNHAM

This address by the President of the American Christian Missionary Society in the 70th annual convention of that organization, October, 1919, was one of the outstanding events in a history-making week. The spirit and power, and many of the words of it, have made a profound impression in some of the greatest state conferences of the Interchurch World Movement which were led by Mr. Burnham. On the eve of the Interchurch Financial Campaign, which begins April 25, and culminates May 2, the annual Home Mission day of the Disciples of Christ, we cannot do better than ponder well this message of Christian statesmanship.

CHRISTIAN civilization has not yet arrived. We are still in the age of elementals. The world is slowly emerging from the reign of brute force and savagery, augmented by scientific discovery and national efficiency. But, through the fires of our wrath and the smoke of our torment, there is discernible the assembling in the world of those governing forces of righteousness and justice which augur new eras of history. Swift transitions are possible, while the world is in the re-making, if elemental forces are laid hold of. The war has not made a better world; but it has brought us a new world which may be made better than the old.

Our first task is with our own beloved land. She needs redemption, and today is the day of opportunity. Much surface work has been done and enough beneath the surface to show the strength and quality of her fertile soil. The coming of prohibition has removed obstacles which seemed insurmountable, liberated half the race, and released resources of life and of money incalculable; but all the roots of life have not yet been reached; only a better way has been cleared for reaching them.

For clearness of thought it may be well to consider, in order, some of the phases of our American life which yet need the redemption which only the gospel of Christ can bring.

Social and Industrial

First, our social and industrial life needs redemption. The Cleveland riot of May 1, 1919, the disturbances of like character in a number of other American cities on that day, and the subsequent bomb outrages were the partial result of propaganda for an industrial revolution. The Seattle strike, the Winnipeg strike which tied up the city, entailing great suffering and resulting ultimately in a riot which threatened the stability of the civic government itself; the nation-wide strike of steel workers; the Washington, Chicago, Omaha and Oklahoma race riots; the lynchings in various quarters; these internal disturbances which must make America appear to the rest of the world as bad as Russia seems to us, all show a state of mind in which injustice, intolerance and unrighteousness are rife. No socialistic panaceas nor programs for shifting the hand which holds the lash can cure the ill of which these are the symptoms.

The present high cost of living which seems to result from everyone placing upon everything which he creates or handles all the additional charge which he thinks it will stand, until the price is maddening to the consumer—this on the one hand, and on the other, an extravagance in spending, on the part of rich and poor alike, hitherto unparalleled, indicate a spirit of recklessness and disregard of consequence to others and to the future from which we must save ourselves.

For this insane social and industrial order of things Christianity holds the only cure. Referring to proffered solutions of the industrial situation the New Republic said recently:

> "A sensible person will not be dogmatic about any of them. But he will insist that what lies at the bottom of all of them is a strong sense that in some combination of collective action and consent, with expert finding of facts, lies the hope of industrial regeneration. He will insist too that the basis of civil order depends not upon the application of some particular plan at some particular place, nor even on the application of a principle in a particular crisis; but in a temper of mind capable of convincing the bulk of the community that men are examining the facts and urgently trying to invent methods of dealing with them."

But it is just "the temper of mind", necessary to sane procedure, which almost nowhere now obtains. That "temper of mind" is not induced by much of the material in the New Republic itself; nor by the leaders on either side of the present struggle. It is "temper of mind" with which the gospel deals and it will not be until men have lost the present frenzy and heard again the "still small voice" of the Spirit of God, that they will find the "temper of mind" which is capable of working out and making applicable, measures for industrial peace, justice and democracy.

It is the time for the Church to exert her Christian power of sanity, calmness, and good will and to preach the unity of humanity. It is an hour for the preaching and the practice, of the fundamental Christian virtues.

Sources of Public Thought

Second, the sources of public thought in America need redemption. I do not refer primarily to the public schools, though these fountains must be kept pure; but to those other sources of public information and opinion which, for adult life, more than all else shape the thought and determination of the people, chief of which are the magazines and the daily papers. Most of our people leave the public schools while yet in the teen-age, before much constructive thinking has taken shape. The pulpit and the platform and the printed book wield a considerable influence among the more thoughtful and discerning; but for the vast majority of people the ideas and ideals which find utterance in the daily newspaper give form and substance to their thinking.

Certainly we believe in the freedom of the press and we bring no railing accusation against the better type of journalism with which our land is blessed. But I think there is no gainsaying the fact that there is a considerable portion of American journalism which is yet of the jungle. Its plan is to win by tooth and claw. Party loyalty plays up the news in the interest of party programs. The person or the policy out of favor is given no chance for a fair and impartial hearing. The purpose of such papers would seem to be not to disseminate the news, that is to propagate the truth; but to give forth the news so colored as to advantage party or personal interest. In these days of big business, also, one is sometimes compelled to wonder how much of that which is given out as substantial editorial judgment, on behalf of the public welfare, is really the measured portion administered to the "public patient" because interests higher up think that is what the patient needs.

The menace of a press controlled is at once apparent. It is said that before the coming of the war of 1914 at least a dozen of the greatest metropolitan newspapers of Germany were owned or controlled by the Krupp Gun Works. It was by such a debauchery of the sources of public thought that the German people were led to their ruin.

It is not my purpose to say that the Church should buy up or control the public press; for I am not at all sure that such a course, if it were possible, would be for the public good. Truth compels us to admit that some of the so-called "church papers" are the worst offenders against the innocent. But what I am saying is that, somehow, through home and school and church, the gospel of Jesus must get itself so incorporated into the young life of the nation and into human institutions and organizations that, in the future, these sources of public thought shall be unswervingly dominated by His invincible righteousness.

Organized Religion

Third, organized religion in America needs redemption. It seems strange to make this statement about religion itself; but my emphasis is upon organized religion, and one needs but to read any one of the four Gospels to observe that it was against the organized religion of His day that Jesus waged His unrelenting warfare; and that it was just that issue which brought His tragic death. Organized religion, like organized government, does not like reform in the direction of liberty. It is essentially conservative. It hates reformers and redeemers, and yet, the race must be redeemed from its tyranny; for in that direction lies salvation.

A letter received not long since puts the case concretely. This letter is from a business man in Dexter, Kansas. It is addressed to one Chas. F. Horner, a Chautauqua superintendent of Kansas City, Missouri. By Mr. Horner it was sent to Keith Vawter, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, because Mr. Vawter is one of the managers of the Redpath-Vawter Chautauqua system; and by Mr. Vawter, because he is a member of the Board of Trustees of the American Christian Missionary Society, it was sent to me. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

Our community has a serious religious and social problem to solve and some of our men suggested that you might be able to put us in touch with the right man or people to help us.

We have a town of 500, with a large surrounding territory. We have five church societies, four church buildings, but not a single pastor, resident or otherwise, and not a social organization of any kind in action, if the lodges, such as the Masonic, I. O. O. F., be exeepted.

Church federation has been attempted but the division superintendents and Presbyters eame along to oppose and kill off sueh efforts.

It is believed that $1,500 or more could be raised to support a preacher or social director, and that the school building (we have a very fine high school building) could be used for a religious and social center.

It was suggested that we try to work outside the regular religious organization, and as secretary of two local Chautauqua Associations, I was asked to write you about the matter.

Here is a town, typical in a measure, of perhaps ten thousand others in the United States and Canada, in which organized religion is making religious life and culture impossible. Five church societies divide the community into hostile camps and mutually nullify each others' efforts. Four church buildings, erected by the devotion and the sacrificial gifts of Christian people, stand stark and empty pointing their spires toward Heaven but denying the very Lord in whose name they were built. Meanwhile the young people go to the dances and the moving picture shows, and earnest business men, whose hearts yearn over the situation and who wish to see their children brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, propose to underwrite the salary of a social-religious work director and secure permission to use the high school building in order that their town, bereft of religious instruction and of divine worship because of organized religion, may have in it the teaching and the influence of the Christ who died that the race might be redeemed! Future generations will wonder at the stupidity of such a situation. Somebody is responsible for it now. Jesus said to people who were responsible for conditions scarcely worse in His own day: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! you shut up the Kingdom of God against men; for you neither go in yourselves nor do you permit those who want to go in to enter." (Matt. 23:13.)

If every one of these four church buildings in Dexter, Kansas, could be burned to the ground simultaneously and the town thereby led to a new start with one community church, it would be better off. But how much better still, if one of these buildings were transformed into a public library, another into a gymnasium and the other two put together in one united church with a competent pastor in charge who might shepherd the entire community.

It is to be noted from the letter that what keeps this from being accomplished is some outside influence of organized religion. It seems altogether probable that if this community and thousands of others like it, could be left absolutely free, with the open Bible and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to work out their own religious destiny without any tinkering whatever from the outside by bishop, superintendent, evangelist or editors of church papers, they would get together in their religious work and worship, and their doing so would be pleasing to God and in harmony with His revealed will. The fathers of this Restoration Movement did so in the past. They had neither editors nor secretaries to tell them what they had to believe or practice. They abandoned all such guidance and committed themselves wholly to the Word of God and to the abundance of His grace. If we rejoice in the liberty which they brought to us, why should we deny it to others?

Organized religion needs redemption. Christian unity cannot be forced, but if men will open the floodgates of Christian liberty the incoming tide will lift everything that floats.

During the period of mobilization and of war the inconsistency and futility of our denominational divisions stood out so glaringly that there arose a wave of public sentiment in favor of Christian unity. But with the close of the war and the almost simultaneous gathering of great sums of money by the several leading religious bodies of America there seems to have set in a decided backwash of denominationalism. Unless, now, something is done to maintain and even to increase the clarity of vision which came in the war period, regarding the need for unity, the latter state will be worse than the former. It is the hope that the actual survey of conditions on the fields, at home and abroad, being unitedly carried on under the Interchurch World Movement, revealing conditions in the home land like the one above cited, and making absolutely imperative some endeavor toward solution, will help to stem this backward tide and to turn it again toward unity.

Neglected Areas

Fourth, there are neglected areas in America which need redemption.

(1) Cities

Our great cities are at once the challenge and the rebuke of the churches; for many of them the most densely crowded and needy sections have been practically deserted by the Protestant Church. A survey not long since, in one of our great cities, revealed the fact that while on its principal boulevard there were five churches within a stone's throw of one another, each costing from one hundred thousand to a quarter of a million dollars, in another portion of the city there was an area containing thirty-five thousand people in which there was no Protestant church whatever. The reason is obvious. In our competitive system it paid to build churches among the rich and well-to-do, because there would be self-support and ample contributions to organized agencies, while in the other section, among the poor, the kind of people to whom Jesus Himself belonged, a church would be a liability rather than an asset. But no land can ever be redeemed by such a process. One of the tasks before American Christianity is first the removal of these blind spots from her eyes, by taking knowledge of the conditions, and then courageous, persistent cooperative effort to remove the scandal and to meet the need.

(2) Miners and Loggers

The miners and the woodsmen constitute neglected groups who must be reached if America is to be redeemed. The splendid work which Ray Manley has been doing among the miners of the coke regions of Western Pennsylvania, and similar work by others, is just enough to throw the flashlight upon the possibilities of redemptive service among these sons of toil if the Church would awaken to that task. Dr. Worth M. Tippy has been writing and speaking most searchingly about the results of his visit to the lumber camps of the Northwest. Here he found sixty thousand men practically as devoid of Christian teaching and religious influence as if they lived in the heart of Africa. Among them, he says, he found the most outspoken and daring radicalism anywhere to be found in America. The building of churches in their midst is next to impossible. The ordinary type of religious work is not feasible because the camps are constantly shifting, and yet these men must not longer be neglected by the Church.

That they are amenable to the gospel, when it is taken to them, is demonstrated by the results in the few cases where the effort has been made. More courageous or dramatic witnessing for the power of the gospel could scarcely be found than that shown by converted lumberjacks in some of these camps. Our own brother, C. M. Patelle, now a junior student in Eugene Bible University, Eugene, Oregon, is an illustration of this truth. He himself was a lumberjack from boyhood. He rose from the ranks by efficiency and physical prowess until he held the position of Hook Tenter—the virtual boss of a camp—in the Skagit River region, Washington. This position can be held continuously only by one being able to lick any other man in camp. Mr. Patelle is now preparing himself for the ministry of the gospel with the hope of going back to the men among whom he labored and of bringing to them the light and the peaceableness of the glorious gospel of Christ.

(3) Pioneers

The open prairies and the mountain regions of our frontier states and provinces constitute a neglected area in America. Here dwell the scattered and isolated pioneers, the vanguard of civilization, upon whose lonely labors the course of empire depends. "The pioneer," B. A. Abbott says, "pushes the long, long trail of human progress a little further into the realms of the unknown and untried. He does not need our pity; his life is one of exhilaration; every morning is new, every day a march nearer the desired goal of humanity; he opens up all the new lands, he sees the mountains and the rivers first in their primitive beauty, with the wonder, mystery and glory of the old eternal radiance clinging about them; he leads humanity on; he is the man of the morning; he gives life all its new horizons; he pushes out beyond the commonplace; he keeps the world young and the wonder spirit alive."

Perhaps it is true he does not need our pity; but he does need and he deserves our fellowship in the gospel and he yearns for it. We have seen the tears of joy of some of them, who, for the first time in years, gathered with a little company, in a far provincial convention, to greet those with like precious faith whose comradeship they have missed so much since they left the old home back in the central states and struck out upon the new trail. And as they need us, we need them. We cannot go on toward the fullness of the Kingdom without them. Now that they have broken the trail and made the roads we must send after them the heralds of the gospel, who, by modern means of transportation, will hunt them out and visit their frontier homes, bringing them the consolations of the gospel and binding them together into the fellowship of faith.

Some years ago, when the Canadian Pacific Railroad was first being projected through the region of which Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, is now the center, a frontier Bishop of the Angelican Church, who saw in glowing vision the coming of the pioneers who would people those vast prairies and build villages, towns and cities along the line of the proposed railroad, went back to the mother country, where, in church and in college and in home, he pled for the means of support and for the young men who would come out and join the pioneers and plant the Anglican faith across the province. He secured fifty young men who came on the promise of a salary of $50 per month, a pony, a tent and tent equipment. These young ministers were placed, one by one, across the prairies in the places where the railroad company indicated there would be stations. They had no congregations to preach to; no chapels to preach in; nothing but the interminable prairies, and each his own tent and the pony. But the pioneers were beginning to come and each minister was instructed to pitch his tent, take his pony and ride across the prairies in search of dugouts and of pioneers; to minister to everyone whom he found; to preach the gospel; help the laborer; heal the sick; and invite men to help found the Kingdom of God. They endured untold hardships; one of them froze to death; but they stayed, and today fifty Anglican chapels dot the landscape where winds that railway across the plains.

(4) American Indians

There are more than three hundred thousand American Indians in the United States. It is reported that some sixty thousand of them are as pagan as their ancestors were before the white man came. Toward these first Americans we have a primary obligation. We are the possessors of their land. We took it because we could, on the pretext that we would make better use of it than they. In return we reduced them to a state of dependency and made them wards of the government. If we have attempted education among them it has been the white-man's type and not adapted to their needs. Since we ceased to fear them we have ignored or forgotten them. They are of interest to the tourist as adding a touch of color and of romance to a trip through the Western states. The religious statistics are 28 per cent Roman Catholic adherents, 19 per cent Protestant adherents, 20 per cent children under ten years, neither, and 33 per cent neglected.

The early Christian fathers in this country took seriously the obligation to spread the gospel among the aboriginal tribes. We find this purpose written in the charters of most of the early colonies. The names of many of these missionaries linger attached to towns or rivers or mountains long after their labors have been forgotten. Yet their work was attended with success, in some cases with notable success, such as would now thrill us with elation if recorded of today's efforts on the other side of the globe. But where one missionary had been the westward push of the empire brought hundreds of rapacious adventurers and soldiers of fortune, who, without fear of God or man, broke treaties which had been made by their predecessors and deceived and plundered the Indians. Though the methods have changed the end is not yet. President Lincoln said, "If I live, this accursed system of robbery and shame in our treatment of the Indians shall be reformed."

There are notable missions among the Indians today. In some respects the Arapahoe mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at Wind River, Wyoming, among a fierce and recalcitrant tribe, is the most notable of them all.

The American Church has a duty to the Indians and America will not be redeemed until this obligation has been redeemed also. Wendell Phillips said, "The Indian race is the one with which the people of the United States have most dread to meet at the Judgment Bar of Almighty God." The Disciples of Christ have an opportunity and a definite appeal to help establish among the Indians of the Northwest, in the Yakima Valley, a work similar to that of the Arapahoe mission, in which the Indians themselves will cooperate.

(5) Negroes

The status of the Negroes in the United States today must be a matter to give grave concern to every thoughtful mind. Since their liberation from slavery the Church has done a good bit for them and they have made wonderful progress. But what has been done only makes imperative the doing of more. The Negro race must be redeemed. But the Church has also a serious duty to create among both Negroes and the white population a better understanding and a kindlier spirit on the part of each race toward the other. It remains for Christianity in this good land of ours to demonstrate whether two races can live in the same country without strife which will ultimately lead to the extinction or subjugation of one of them. This is not a political issue, but one involving the supremacy of Christian principles. The recent shifting of large numbers of Negroes from the south into northern states, made necessary by the demand for unskilled labor during the period of the war, has made this issue more acute; while the military training of the Negro young men and their participation in the great war has helped to develop a type of race consciousness which is of menacing aspect. Here is a task which the Church cannot forget nor neglect nor wash her hands of.

(6) Immigrants

The Immigrants in America constitute a vast neglected portion of our population. The nation has suddenly awakened to a realization of their presence. In the strikes and demonstrations and riots in our cities during recent months the majority of those opposing constituted authority were of alien birth or parentage. In the Cleveland riot those who bore the red flags were nearly all immigrants. In the steel strike the charge is brought by the operators and owners that the majority of those who went out and who are causing the present disturbances are foreigners. It has even been suggested that they be sent back to the countries from which they came! We need to remember how it happens that they are here. The truth is we sent for them. The agents of our great industrial organizations were sent to Italy and Austria and Hungary and Poland and Russia and other European countries to find the brawn and muscle needed in our great steel factories. Villages over there were almost depopulated or transferred in toto to industrial centers in America. Glowing inducements accompanied our invitations. The Immigrants were promised good wages and freedom and opportunity and all the rich blessings of this land of light and liberty. And when they came, at the rate of almost a million a year, how were these promises fulfilled? We crowded them like cattle into the worst quarters of our great cities; we put them to work amid blazing furnaces twelve hours a day, with a twenty-four hour shift every two weeks. They were compelled to live in most unsanitary quarters where normal childhood and the development of wholesome family life were impossible. Then we turned loose upon them the most wolfish elements of our civilization, until, maddened by mistreatment, plundered and betrayed, and knowing no other means of redress, when some wild Bolshevist comes among them and advises that they strike and join the revolution to overthrow their masters, they fall in behind the red flag. Then we shoot them down, for incipient rebellion must be quelled, and proceed to maintain civic order by force. But for how long?

And what have we done for the immigrant? The Church has done but little and the state less. In this very building, a year or so ago, the Governor of this State, referring to the fact that the German language had been taught in the public schools while no public money had been used to teach English to the immigrants, used words like these: "Henceforth we shall not spend a dollar of public money to teach German to any man's child, but we are going to spend thousands of dollars to teach the English language to these alien neighbors of ours that there may be one flag and one language in this land." His utterance was cheered heartily by a vast throng. The trouble is we are beginning about a quarter of a century too late.

As a people we have touched but the fringe of this problem. We have talked much and done little. You have not given us the funds with which to do. Even now we are only making the first beginnings toward approaching the task in constructive fashion.

A well selected committee, which had been at work a year, submitted to the Des Moines Convention in 1916 a carefully wrought out, constructive policy for our guidance in this immigrant work. The events which have intervened have shown no need for change in that policy; but rather, have demonstrated its wisdom. We cannot hope to make progress in dealing with the immigrant situation by relying for leadership upon immigrants themselves who have learned a little of the English language. Only by putting every such piece of work under trained American leadership is measurable success possible. Work like that being done by Frank Butchart in Cleveland, by Ray Manley in Western Pennsylvania, and by Miss Bertha Merrill, first in Chicago and now in New York, is of substantial worth. In these workers we have the beginning of the fulfillment of our ideals. Graduated from our own colleges, with post graduate training in the universities under great social leaders, and, in the case of Mr. Manley, residence abroad in the native lands of the people among whom he works here, this type of leaders, then a social-service program shot through with religious spirit and ideals, with the cooperation and assistance of a nucleus of American Christians; all this planted right in the heart of great centers of immigrant population, this is lifting at the task constructively. And it is to be noted that this type of work has this double advantage: that, while it meets the immigrant at the point of his greatest need, it also enlists and brings into contact with him and his family the culture and refinement of our own best Christian lives, and giving to them at first hand a vision of the needs and opportunity for service and the joy of fellowship in worthful human endeavor it lifts at both ends of our social problems.

Conclusion

The redemption of America is a vast far-reaching task. It is a part of God's far greater task of redeeming the world. It cannot be accomplished in a day; but much more can be done than is being done. Our labors can be made cumulative, and they can be multiplied in power and effectiveness if we can secure the harmonious cooperation and unity of effort of the whole Church of Christ in America and then direct that effort into scientifically efficient channels of service. In this war we have seen what a nation can do when all its people and all its resources have been drafted for the accomplishment of a single aim. It yet remains to be seen what the United Church of Christ can accomplish when all her people and all her resources have been definitely concentrated upon the redemption of the world. In his great book on "The Science of Power" Benjamin Kidd has said:

"There is not an existing institution in the world of civilized humanity which cannot be profoundly modified or altered or abolished in a generation. There is no form or order of government or of the dominion of force which cannot be removed out of the world within a generation. There is no ideal in conformity with the principles of civilization dreamed of by any dreamer or idealist which cannot be realized within the lifetime of those around him."

The redemption of America is not impossible. It is not an idle dream. It is the will of God. It can and must be done. Its achievement only awaits the fullness of the Church's sacrificial spirit.

At the Cleveland Conference of the Federal Council one of the French Chaplains, who had served all through the great war and had come to America to speak on behalf of French Protestantism, said that when he was called by his church to undertake this mission, after the armistice had been signed, he asked permission to go back and visit once more the front line trenches. The permission was granted, and he went back to the trenches where, for more than four years he had been with his boys of France. He found all up and down those front lines the little white crosses which marked the graves where had fallen his own French boys and the British boys and the Canadian lads and the American youths—miles upon miles of white crosses—and he said it seemed to him as if the "Good Friday Cross" (that is the way he put it, meaning the Cross of Calvary) had been a tree which had bloomed and borne seed and that some wind, like a breath from Heaven, had scattered those seeds, as the maple seeds are scattered in the springtime, all the way from the mountains to the sea, and that these seeds had sprung up and produced the little white crosses all across his native land. Then said he, "Friends of America, what we need is not the white crosses which mark the graves where lie our sacred dead, but the living Cross of Christ planted in the living hearts of our everliving France."

So I say now, what America needs for her redemption, and for her greater share in the redemption of the world, is the planting deep, and yet deeper, in the hearts of the Church of the sacrificial cross of the crucified, but ever-living Christ.

Prayer is the soul of religion and failure there is not a superficial lack, for the supply of which the spiritual life leisurely can wait. Failure in prayer is the loss of religion itself in the inward and dynamic aspect of fellowship with the eternal.—Harry Emerson Fosdick.

Home Missionary Leadership in Movements Toward Unity

By FINIS L. IDLEMAN

WHAT is the province of the American Society? What functions may it perform for the Disciples? Is it to be a liberating force, or a mechanical automaton?

Whatever the original function the American Society was set to perform, the wisdom of its present administration and the occasion of its just claim upon us for support must rest upon its present adaptation to the needs of the Kingdom. If what it is doing is not changing to meet changing conditions, like all antiquated institutions, it ought to cease and give place to one that will.

Everything that is born of God grows. When it ceases to grow it is no longer serviceable in a divine scheme.

How far we have traveled since 1869! In the meantime religious opinions and practices have been blended and shaded by so many common efforts that the wisdom of religious debate as a means of propaganda has been discarded by all who know the mind of the Spirit. The inevitable results of acquaintance and fellowship have taught us all more of neglected truth, and blended our thinking appreciably. People who have any reason to be known as religious cannot hate their religious neighbors now, for like Charles Lamb, they "cannot hate whom they know." Moreover, we have discovered what was not clear seventy-five years ago, that we can never overtake America's growth in population nor meet her social and spiritual needs by working as separate and disinterested communions. On that program we were losing the battle daily. Encysted wrongs were defiant. The tide of immigrants overwhelmed us, and continental conceptions of the Lord's day, and personal liberty were inundating the whole country. Unless a most vigorous and united Protestantism had begun to grapple with the living issues of unprecedented magnitude the church would have been tragically beaten.

It became the duty, therefore, of the administrators of that sacred trust to advance beyond the original conception and intention of its founders and unite with leaders of other religious bodies similarly entrusted. They were compelled with common zeal to cease the overlapping and overlooking and make an honest attempt to Christianize the total population of the United States, and its possessions. Any other course in the light of modern Christian ethics and strategy would have been suicidal and sinful. It remains a most difficult task even with the utmost cooperation possible. With the present measure of our giving, the Disciples of Christ have a hundredfold more work than they can do if they accept the mere allotment of unoccupied territory mutually agreed upon as their area of responsibility. How unchristian and blunderingly fatal it is for us then to multiply struggling and competing churches in already overoccupied fields.

The American Society, by virtue of its priority among us in organized missionary activity, is set for the mutual interpretation of the movements of the Kingdom to the Disciples. We have no other general agency that can do that essential piece of work. When the American Society fails to do one or both of these services, it leaves us detached from the total body of Christ in America, and most pitifully impoverished. It must interpret us to the total Christian fellowship. That interpretation must be one of passion, not of pride. No Christian body has anything to be proud of in the light of the unevangelized world, and when it does boast it becomes doubly despicable. The passionate yearning for the unity of the church must respect the fact that there is a Christian constituency to be united. The mother society among us may always be correct in pleading for unity, as a true interpretation of the Disciples of Christ. It will always be incorrect if it proceeds to do it dogmatically. That passion must be seen in practice. Wherever the American Society can cooperate with similar societies of other communions, it is bound to do it or misinterpret the people who support it. To preach union and deny it in participation, is to shut the door to any thoughtful hearing.

What if God should take our plea for unity after a hundred years, and give it to a fellowship whom we have called "sectarian"? It is better not to have had the truth than to hold it in lovelessness. The American Society, through its opportunity for fellowship, its unique privilege of cultivating the character of our ministry and through the actual practice of vital unity in the fields to be occupied, stands pre-eminently charged with the solemn obligations to interpret the living truth of the oneness of the church to divided Protestantism in such fashion as to make that truth winsome and compelling.

Likewise this society must interpret the Kingdom to the Disciples. The forward movements that look toward the enlargement and unification of the cause of Christ should find here a ready medium of communication. Its officers should be among the first to sense the movements that enfold possibilities of realizing the prayer of Jesus, and to interpret this to our ministry. It would be most derelict of them if a single conference looking toward the unity of the church, or the Christian conquest of America, were to be held without their participation. Else we shall be led by blind men, and fall into the ditch of doomed sectarianism. Our isolation is always our peril. Few are privileged to have first-hand information about the new heart-throbs of the church universal, and our qualified representatives who may be both free to attend and to disseminate the spirit of such movements are most surely obligated to do it. To have leaders of any other type is spiritual disaster. We do not need parrots but prophets. We have contribution to make to the world, and the agency which may so help, or hinder, that contribution is the American Society. Rather than limit and heckle its leaders in their privilege of widened fellowship and of widening ours, we should pray daily that they may have the visions of seers to see the way God is moving in the midst of His people and the courage to follow after.

Christ is Love,
I often say those words
Of such profound simplicity,
And yet I drift
Tossed by the veering winds of life,
Afraid to rise,
And trust myself to Him.

The City Problem of the Church

By MAXWELL HALL

City Survey Division, Interchurch World Movement

AMERICA is steadily becoming a nation of city people. Once it was a land of country folk. The rural districts were dominant. As the decades have passed, however, the cities have become larger and more numerous. During the first decade of the twentieth century the urban population increased nearly five times as rapidly as the rural population and its influence has increased in proportion. With the growth of the cities there is developing what may be called a city race, which promises to differ physically, mentally, socially and spiritually from the rural race of the present and the past. The question may be asked, what part is the church of Jesus Christ to have in this development.

This movement of the people into the centers of population was marked during the period of the war by an event which occurred so quietly that it was not recorded in the newspapers at all. And yet it was an event of more importance and carried with it a greater significance for the future of America's life, than any other single incident during those eventful days. With each succeeding census it has been evident that the proportion of persons living in urban communities, as compared with the total population, has been increasing. To refer to Chart I, the line representing the urban population has been rising. This means, of course, that the line which represents rural population has been falling. In 1910, it is seen, these lines were approaching one another, from the best estimates that we have been able to secure, it is evident that these lines crossed during the period of the war.

In other words, America has become, once and for all time, a nation with the majority of its population living in the city environment. The country boy who has been carrying the flag through the decades of the past, has handed it to the city boy, who will carry it down through the aeons of the future. This is a fact of the very greatest importance for the future of our national life, and it stands as a challenge to our city churches. If America is to be Christianized, the church must learn how to lead those who live in the city to the Son of God.

The change from the rural to the city environment has had a very decided effect upon social and religious institutions. The great basic institutions of society, as they enter the city life, have been undergoing a change which can be readily seen. The fundamental institution of society is the family, and the effect upon the family of the change to a city environment is very marked. It is a far call from the cottage on the hill to the apartment on the avenue, or from the elegant country home to the mansion on the boulevard. As the family enters the city environment, there is almost a complete change in the family life. The habits are different; the atmosphere changes; the very relations of the members of the family to one another are altered. It is difficult to overestimate the effect upon society of this change in the family.

Next to the family the institution of prime importance to the moral and spiritual life of the race is the church, and the difference between the successful rural church and the successful city church is just as great as the difference between the typical rural family and the typical city family. The connection between the success and failure of the Protestant church on the one hand, and the size of the city, on the other hand, is very significant. The accompanying chart (Chart II) shows very clearly that as the city has grown larger, the proportion of the Protestant membership to the total population has grown smaller. Of course, there is more than one explanation for this fact, but no explanation is sufficient to enable the church to escape the charge that it has failed to keep step with the growth of the city.

The First Ward in the city of Chicago, and Old Boston, are typical illustrations of the effect of the failure of the church to minister effectively to the congested districts of our large cities, and many of our smaller cities can show typical illustrations of the failure of the church to meet its responsibility.

The American city is of recent origin and rapid growth, facts which are graphically set forth on Charts III and IV. In 1800 there were only six cities in the United States with a population of 8,000 and over, and the total population of these cities combined was less than the population of Columbus, Ohio, today. In 1910 there were 778 cities in this country with a population of 8,000 and over and they had a total population of nearly thirty-six million. Their number and size, of course, is steadily increasing.

There are three processes which work together to build up the population of the cities; namely, rural emigration, by which is meant the movement of those who have lived in the rural districts of America into the cities; alien immigration, or the movement of people from other lands into the cities of our own land; and the birth rate.

Corresponding to these three processes, there are three groups which make up the population of the city. First, the rural emigrant; second, the alien immigrant; third, the indigenous city folk. The problem of the city church, as distinguished from the rural church then is not so much a spiritual or a social problem, as a psychological one, for that which differentiates these groups from one another is the fact that their childhood was spent in a different environment. They think in different terms; the landscape of their thought is different landscape.

The Protestant church is largely the property and the product of the rural emigrant. Most of the members of the Protestant churches in our cities have come from rural districts. A show of hands in almost any Protestant church in any city will show that this is true. The proportion of ministers who have come from rural districts is still larger. As a result, the traditions of our city churches are rural traditions. The appeal is to the rural mind. Their message is spoken in the vocabulary of rural America: for this reason it is unintelligible and unattractive to those who have come from other lands and also to those born and reared in the city environment. If you will listen to the average sermon from the majority of our city pulpits, you will notice that most of the illustrations are from rural life. The language is that of the rural community. The viewpoint is one familiar chiefly to the rural mind. Such a sermon, of course, is interesting to most of the officers of the church and the members, because it takes them back to their childhood, but it does not appeal to the young men and women whose childhood has been spent almost exclusively in the city environment.

The alien immigrant presents to the city church a magnificent evangelistic opportunity, but if the church expects to attract him it must keep in mind the background of his thought. His traditions, his customs, his standards and ideals have not only been very different from our own, but are just as decidedly different from most of his fellow immigrants.

The conduct of the church toward the stranger in our midst has been very curious indeed. Instead of looking upon his presence as an opportunity, and approaching him with sympathy, the city church has been disposed to look upon him as a menace and to flee from his presence as from a pestilence. All over this country we have imposing monuments to the stupidity of the church in this direction, large empty buildings which once housed active churches, but which now stand with windows broken and doors boarded up, bearing witness to the fact that these churches were unwilling to undertake seriously to make disciples of all nations, when these nations were brought to their very doors. In New York City alone sixty-eight Protestant churches have been abandoned within the last twenty years, while only twenty-four churches have been built, sixteen of which were for Negro congregations. This policy of the church toward the alien immigrant must change, or its effect upon the growth and prosperity of Protestant Christianity in America will be disastrous. Fortunately it has changed and is changing in some places, but there is still much to be done.

There is a third group which differs decidedly from the other two and which we may call the indigenous city folk, those who have spent their childhood in the city environment. This difference may not appear at once, for many of them are the children of the first and second generations of those who have come from the rural districts of America or from other lands. But the difference is a real one. To demonstrate this let parents who spent their childhood in rural districts, but whose children have spent their childhood in the city environment, compare their own attitude and viewpoint toward life in general when they were children with the attitude and viewpoint of their own children today, and the difference will appear at once.

These indigenous city folks are destined to be the dominant group in our city life and, consequently, the dominant group in the life of the nation. It is of the very utmost importance that the church shall reach and shape the lives of these people. A rural church, with a rural message and rural methods, will never reach them, but they can be reached, even though it may not be as easy as it was in the open country.

The environment of the city is not so conducive to religion. The country boy and his sister live in the midst of an environment which irresistibly declares the glory of God. The meadows and the woodland, the songbirds and the wild flowers, the grain from the field and the fruit from the orchard, are constantly reminding them that God is the Creator of all things and that he loves His children and provides for all their needs. But what does the child of the city street see to remind him of God's presence in this world? His environment is the handiwork of men. The wonders of the city are marvels of engineering and finance. About all that he sees of nature is in the sky above, but the clouds and the stars are so far away, and the tall buildings so close at hand that he does not see the picture for the frame. No wonder we have Sunday schools of atheism on the lower East Side of New York. The church must take the Bible, which has largely a rural setting, and so interpret its message, that the city child will learn to see that the principles of Christianity which the Bible brings to him will help him more than anything else to solve the problems which confront him day by day.

There are a number of conditions peculiar to the city which conspire to make the distinctive tasks of the city church exceptionally difficult. The family life is changed. Church members who move into the city have a tendency to break away from the traditions of the past as they enter the city life. The individual is submerged. The alien who is present in large numbers is wholly unfamiliar with the method and the viewpoint of the Protestant church. There are congested areas and segregated districts. Industry creates class distinction. The well-to-do people who are able to finance the large churches are often far removed from the more densely populated sections where the church is greatly needed, and the downtown church, while surrounded by large business enterprises is often quite a distance from the homes of most of the people of all classes. Such conditions as these, and others like them, make the problem which confronts the church in the city peculiarly acute and makes it absolutely necessary for the church to adapt its work to meet the conditions which it has to face.

In every large city there are different types of churches, depending on the location and the character of the people to be ministered unto. There is the downtown church,—the Polyglot church,—the suburban church, the industrial church. No two churches are exactly alike. No two should have precisely the same program, because no two communities are identical, and no two groups of people should have exactly the same type of ministry.

It is imperative that the church should adapt its methods and message to its environment. Otherwise it will become extinct, just as prehistoric animals like the Dodo bird became extinct when they were unable to adapt themselves to their surroundings. This may seem to be a very difficult task, but the hopeful thing about it all is that a goodly number of churches have shown not only the disposition, but the ability to minister effectively to the community in which they are situated. Such churches become great unifying forces uniting people in the spirit of brotherhood, which goes far toward solving their most serious problems.

It is essential that the local churches shall make this adaptation; that they shall construct buildings and provide equipment adapted to service, not merely to services; that they shall proclaim the gospel message in the language of the city and employ methods which are suitable to the needs of those to whom they minister. It is also necessary that the religious body as a whole shall be disposed to adapt its program to meet the city conditions instead of forcing the city churches to conform to the program which is suitable only to the rural congregations, which in most communions are in the majority. It must not only give to the city church a large measure of freedom, but it must help its churches in any given city, to construct a program which will enable them to render the service that is needed.

It is becoming increasingly evident that if the Protestant churches are to continue as a vital force in the city life, they must learn the lesson of cooperation rather than competition. They must present a united front to the forces which are opposed to the principles and the life for which the church stands, and combine their efforts to build on earth cities of our God.

There are three things which a successful city church must do. It must study its environment to find out what sort of conditions exist and what kind of people live in the community in which it is located. It must re-examine its methods in order to determine to what extent they are suited to meet the existing conditions and the people whom it is to serve, and then it must adapt its ministry, remembering that it is not the business of the church to build itself up out of the community, but to build up the community out of its own life.

The Interchurch World Movement through the City Survey proposes to assist the churches to do these three essential things. The block survey when completed will enable each church in the city by a glance at the maps, to see in just what sort of a community it is situated. The household survey among other things will reveal in detail the relation of each person in the community to the church. The church survey will provide a method for the church to make an exhaustive self-examination and help it to see to what extent it is fulfilling its mission. As results are published, it will reveal how various churches are dealing with the city problem. This will be of incalculable value for there are few problems which any church confronts that some church has not dealt with successfully. Other special surveys will set forth in graphic form social and industrial conditions that the churches may more fully know their task both individually and collectively.

If the Church of Christ will only follow the example of its Lord, who adapted both His message and His methods to suit the needs of those to whom he ministered, whether in Galilee or Jerusalem, it will discover that the gospel is the power of God unto the salvation of the city no less than of the town or country.

As Jesus sat on the brow of Olivet and looked out through His tears over the metropolis of His nation, He voiced His passionate interest in the city problem of His day and when He sent His apostles forth as witnesses He bade them begin in Jerusalem. We cannot doubt that His interest in the city is just as great today as it was then, and that He will bless abundantly the church that undertakes with vigor and determination the task of bringing the city into subjection to His will.

The Call of the City

By EDGAR DeWITT JONES

"Faint and far, like a thing of dreams,
With palace and mart and spire,
With the tread of a million hurrying feet,
With hope and regret and desire—
The city lies and it calls with a voice
That touches men's souls with fire."

ALL the world is the field for Christian conquest, and in order to show the dire need of one area for the gospel, it is not necessary to ignore or belittle any other. Country and city, island and continent, village and metropolis are on an equal footing in the sense that wherever man is, there also is the necessity for his spiritual rebirth. Yet withal, some sections of the world-field are by the very nature of the case more pivotal and more pressing in importance than other sections. Thus the twentieth century city is at once the most baffling and inviting, the most complex and strategic—in truth the most challenging of objectives for the propagation and triumph of the Christian order.

The call of the city is the call of "much people." The multitudes, the masses, the crowds, the throngs are there in seething, tumultuous tides. It was the sight of the multitude that touched the heart of Jesus and moved Him with compassion, and nowhere else is the spectacle of shepherdless sheep on so colossal a scale or the appeal so poignant to the shepherd heart as in the populous centers. "Much people" may weary us exceedingly and life in a city apartment may be "flat" enough, but it was for the people and not for trees, flowers, murmuring brooks and lovely meadows that Jesus suffered and died. The people, rich and poor, good and bad, weak and strong, noble and depraved, young and old—the people in vast numbers are in the great cities of the land and they continue to move cityward in ceaseless swollen streams, coming from village, from farm, from everywhere, to win or lose in the battle for life and love amid the roar of traffic, the smoke and the grime.

The mighty currents of commerce and industry flow turgidly through the great cities. All roads lead to the metropolis. The influence of the great city for right or wrong is proverbial. As goes Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, so is Pennsylvania likely to go; as Chicago thinks so is the entire state of Illinois influenced in thought. First century Christianity rightfully gauged the city as the place pivotal and the greatest missionary of the Apostolic group boldly laid siege to Corinth, Antioch, Athens and Ephesus. There is something contagious in the fervor of his vibrant words, "I must see Rome." It is idle to speculate what might have happened had Alexander Campbell planted Bethany College in the heart of New York City instead of in the glorious hill country of West Virginia, but one may be permitted to indulge the fancy that could he have done so the position of the Disciples of Christ, as well as their program, would be more widely understood and accepted, not only throughout the east today, but throughout the country as a whole. It is not quite accurate or fair to call the Disciples of Christ a rural people, but it is a stubborn fact that as a body they have not, save in a few notable cases, made their presence felt appreciably in the large centers. What has been accomplished outstandingly in Kansas City and only a little less so in Des Moines, Louisville and Cleveland, is due to far-seeing, prophetic leadership and superb staying qualities.

The Americanization of the great cities is halted and hindered by the lack of an intelligent, united and aggressive policy on the part of the Christian forces. The foreigner is at our door; the alien at our elbow. In Detroit the non-English-speaking population is very large, numbering: Polish, 120,000; German, 150,000; Belgian, 15,000; Finnish, 2,000; Swedish, 10,000; Hungarian, 28,000; Greek, 8,000; Jewish, 40,000; Armenian, 6,000; Italian, 40,000; Russian, 15,000; Lithuanian, 6,000; Danish, 4,500; Croatian, 3,000; Czecho-Slovak, 15,000. To teach these people English is good, but it is not enough. These peoples have been so often exploited, so cruelly misunderstood that they need an indirect and kindly approach as individuals rather than as "classes" to be closely scrutinized and experimented upon. Justice and mercy as filtered through Christian conduct come more nearly being a panacea for humanity's hurts than anything else.

To be sure the smaller city offers a more delightful field than the congested centers to the Christian layman or minister, but since when has it become the duty of Christian teachers to settle down for life in delightful fields and amidst comfortable surroundings when the call comes to go where there is less comfort but greater need? Finis Idleman's leaving Des Moines and faring forth to New York City to spend the rest of his life ministry was almost as foolhardy as William Carey's going to India, or Dr. Susie Rijnhart's invasion of Tibet. Colonel Roosevelt, in a characteristic letter to his son Archie, with reference to his playing football, advised him not to get smashed in a practice game, if possible, but to be perfectly willing to be smashed completely whenever the real thing was on and the victory of his college team justified it. That is good advice for every worker, every servant of God and humanity. The cities of America challenge leadership in every worthful career to risk being smashed utterly in order to plant the Great Hereafter in the Now.

Over the town;
Censers are swinging,
Look overhead!
Censers are swinging,
Heaven comes down;
City, dead city,
Awake from the dead!"

The Healing of Africa

By DR. ERNEST B. PEARSON

THE heroes and heroines of many tales are people of superb physique. The purest of blood courses through their veins, making it impossible for a disease germ to find habitation there. They excel in feats of physical strength or win their way by the charm of a beautiful personality.

Here in Congo-land one sees frequently specimens of manhood which might well grace the front page of physical culture magazines; strong men, beneath whose dark, glossy skins the supplest of muscles play; women, erect and perfectly modeled, who, in grace of carriage and ease of movement, might successfully vie with their fairer sisters. It is not of such, however, that I would write, but rather of those whose bodies harbor festive microbes which feast upon the lifeblood until these bodies are broken or wasted or disfigured, and the game of life, without help, becomes a losing one.

One of the Many Children who Suffer from the Yaws. Ten Days After He was Treated at the Dispensary He was so Well That He Was Able to Dodge the Camera.

Not all the sick of Congo, by any means, come to our hospital dispensaries, but we do see victims of numerous diseases in various stages of their maladies. Quite a number of those who come to us for treatment come with such common ailments as you in the homeland care for without the help of the doctor. Even for their lesser aches and pains some are glad to get away from the nauseating concoctions of the Witch Doctor, or if they happen to be mission workmen, to have a try at getting out of work for a day or two; but the majority prefer to take "mixed treatment." It is no uncommon thing to give some patient a dose of medicine at the dispensary and a little later, if one happens past his hut, to see the "place where the misery's at" smeared with clay or other native medicine and, if possible, tied off from the rest of the body by string or grass. For a severe headache they tie something tight around the neck; for pain in the foot a constriction is placed round the ankle or just below the knee; for trouble in the hand the wrist and the elbow may be tied-off in the same manner. Generally such methods hinder rather than help in the cure, but in rare instances, as when a man is bitten on the foot by a snake, constriction above the ankle may help some. Even for such injury, however, they may hardly be expected to stop at the ankle, but tie-off also at knee, wrist, ankle and neck.

In the native mind most all abdominal disturbances are due to the onslaughts of Nsembe, or intestinal parasites, that childhood complaint for which our good grandmothers used to give us vermifuge every so often. Their diagnoses are correct, too, in no small percentage of cases and we find santonin and calomel one of our best sellers. The native usually desires quick and visible results from his medicines, which can be gotten, unfortunately, in only a few complaints such as this. Dysentery occurs constantly, for the native is ignorant of its cause and does not take the necessary means for its prevention. Foreigners, if they are wise, take the precaution to boil all their drinking water and to wash all raw foods in boiled water. To those who have become infected by its causative organisms, intramuscular injections of emetin usually give immediate relief to its distressing symptoms.

Malaria we have with us always. Foreigners, as a rule, fortify against its invasion by daily or periodic doses of quinine. The native responds quickly to the same remedy when an attack comes on.

Sudden changes in temperature always result in respiratory troubles for many of the natives. They continually come to us complaining of pain in the chest. Inadequately protected by clothing and depending in a large measure upon their fires for warmth they are ready subjects for bronchitis and pneumonia. Treatment in all these afflictions is rendered more difficult by the limited variety of suitable foodstuffs which are available. Green plantains (bananas) boiled and afterward pounded out into cakes, cassava (manioc) soaked in the river and then made into a thick, leathery dough, greens of various sorts, palm nuts and oil, fish for those who live near the rivers—these are the principal foods of our natives. And they are not adaptable to a sick diet. Few domestic animals, save a few chickens and a goat or two, are raised, so milk is not used. Eggs the native cares for only as they will buy him something else which he wants from the white man. Fruits in splendid variety flourish with a little care, but the native would rather do without most of them than give this care. The little sugar cane that is raised is only munched a stick at a time,—the African's candy. Rarely is provision made for a rainy day, so when sickness comes and the appetite flags there is little to tempt it back again. When the sick man refuses such foods as his wife or his friends prepare for him they are apt to let him go without. During the influenza epidemic it was no uncommon thing to find some poor sufferer all alone in his little grass hut, his body burning up with fever, left by his friends without even a gourd of water to quench his thirst. I am afraid that even a white man would not be very optimistic under such circumstances. Whenever a protracted illness lays hold of a native he is very apt to conclude that he is due to depart to a better land and only with difficulty can he be persuaded to make a fight for life and health.

Sleeping sickness still continues to claim its victims although it evidently is not so destructive as it once was. No specific remedy has as yet been found for it and it is difficult, if not impossible outside a stockaded hospital, to get these patients to stay for such help as we can give them. The same may be said of leprosy, which, while not so common as in some other lands, does exist, the victims going about freely wherever their desires may take them. One of the most pitiable afflictions which we see is yaws, for little children are the most frequent sufferers. They come to us with their little bodies covered from head to foot with foul-smelling, crusted sores. Until recently, yaw sufferers were doomed to endure their disease for a long time, many of them being hampered for life because of this, but with the production of Salvarsan (606) as now made possible by our home government we have placed within our reach a sovereign remedy. One injection of this medicine suffices, as a rule, and in from ten to fourteen days the ugly sores have all dried up and the skin soon becomes soft and glossy. Little bodies which were thin and wasted become plump again and smiles come into the sad little faces. The action of this wonderful medicine is little short of a miracle to the native, and seldom does a day pass but that we have people asking for bote wan tunga (medicine of the needle), for they hope to find in it a panacea for all their ills. Unfortunately there are many diseases which respond very, very slowly to our treatment. Ulcers upon the feet and legs are as common as they are intractable and try the patience and ingenuity of the doctor. We have not made even a beginning at solving the venereal disease problem, which in its various ramifications confronts us at every turn. Skin diseases run the whole textbook category and call for barrels of ointments as well as other remedies.

Surgery appeals to the Congo native and he submits to it readily. We have never been able because of lack of equipment and trained assistance to give all the help needed in the way of surgery. In the past, tumors and hernias have been about the extent of our efforts. With the exception of emergencies, the rest have gone away unaided. Men have come to us burdened by large elephantiasis tumors weighing from ten to as much as seventy pounds and have gone away walking as unencumbered as any of their fellowmen. One of our doctors records the removal of one such tumor which weighed more than did the patient after its removal. It is rather somewhat of a strain, however, for one doctor to be compelled to carry through such an operation with lay helpers of very little experience. We are looking forward to the day when adequate staffs of both nurses and doctors will make this unnecessary.

With such a galaxy of diseases to contend with, you may wonder how these folks live at all. We see some individuals, just as you do at home, who are never sick, and not everyone suffers from all these diseases at one time, by any means. We rarely have smallpox; cholera and plague, typhoid and typhus and yellow fever are not on our list; tuberculosis is rare and diphtheria rarer. And there are many other ailments which you home folks have whose very names we have almost forgotten.

We are scarcely ever uncomfortable because of the heat here on the equator, certainly not so much as we have sometimes been in Michigan and Illinois, and there are times when we wish for an open fireplace with a good wood fire to help take the chill off the air. The climate of Central Africa has been greatly maligned. Even today it is the common practice with many Europeans to speak of it with a shrug of the shoulders and a decidedly skeptical tone of voice. It is not energizing, but neither is it as devitalizing as has often been pictured. With a better knowledge of the causes of her diseases has come increased means for their prevention and their treatment. An increasing white population brings added conveniences, so that while this may never become a white man's country it is fast becoming a land in which with reasonable care they may live and work in health and comfort. Those who come determined to live fast and loose soon find cause for complaint against the climate. For those who come with help for her native peoples in their unequal game of life, establishing here their homes and obeying nature's laws as scrupulously and as cheerfully as they do in the homeland, there is not only normal physical health, but also spiritual joy and blessing.

The Christian at the Primaries

CHRISTIANITY has always played an important part in determining the political ideals of the citizens of this Republic. Christianity was the determining factor in securing our liberties, in the overthrow of slavery, and in the abolition of the liquor traffic. During the war we made tremendous strides in the direction of social betterment. Chief among our achievements was the overthrow of the liquor traffic.

Since the war the forces of reaction have been trying to undo what we accomplished during the war. They see the necessity of re-establishing some form of liquor drinking before the public has had time to see the benefits which are to be derived by sobriety. Just now this liquor constituency is trying to select nominees for President who are silent on the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. Governor Edwards of New Jersey gives the temperance forces no anxiety because he is playing in the open. Regardless of what we may think of the merits of Governor Edwards' contention, if we were permitted to choose our opponent we would gladly choose one who fights in the open. The Christian forces in America must be prepared to hold what we have gained.

While I believe that the Eighteenth Amendment was written into the Constitution as the Constitution provides it shall be amended, yet the regularity of this procedure is not the position of greatest vantage for Christians. Lawful procedure is a matter for our supreme courts to determine, and while they are determining this and after they have determined it, let Christian citizens speak of the merits of prohibition, and use their influence and votes to secure public officials who will treat our prohibition laws as expressive of the will of the people. As Christian citizens we should repeatedly emphasize the results and cite the facts concerning prohibition during the time that this law has been in effect. Recently a speaker at the annual meeting of the Illinois Chamber of Commerce, convening in Peoria, said that $10,000,000 had been deposited in the savings banks of Chicago during the first six months of prohibition under the war prohibition measure. The danger lies therein that we take prohibition as a settled issue and cease to bring facts to bear upon the minds of those with whom we have to do. In the coming primaries men should declare themselves with reference to the enforcement of prohibition legislation. We feel that William Jennings Bryan's attitude on this matter is right. No man seeking the highest office of this nation, the presidency, should expect the support of Christian voters while he remains silent on the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. These candidates are not remaining silent on other matters. They are discussing the issues pertaining to the League of Nations, to our army and navy, and to our country's budget, and yet they are in the main as silent as the Sphinx of Egypt as to their attitude to the enforcement of prohibition. When asked concerning His disciples and His doctrine, Jesus replied to the high priest, "I have spoken openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogues, and in the temple, where all the Jews come together; and in secret spake I nothing. Why askest thou me? Ask them that have heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, these know the things which I said." John 18:19, 21. This attitude toward the public which characterized Jesus is essential to the winning of the multitudes to a cause of righteousness. Jesus asked men to come out into the open and declare themselves. Why temporize? It is hard for the public to believe sometimes that there is not an overzealousness for leadership and a lack of emphasis on the cause.

If a cause as righteous as prohibition cannot win in the open in America and cannot hold the field against all forces of reaction, then let us know it now, so that the altar fires may be kindled anew. This silence is a display of weakness and an evidence of our lack of faith both in God and man.

So long as secret stills thrive and smugglers wax rich, and men look upon their warehouse holdings as rich assets, and prohibition is being used as a jest, we must herald the blessings of prohibition until men seeking political preferment will be ashamed to attempt to win prestige by being silent on that cause which has set at liberty those that were bruised.

Education and Democracy

By H. O. PRITCHARD

"WHATEVER you would put into the state you must first put into the school." Thus declared the celebrated German scientist, Humboldt. The truth of that statement has been demonstrated by recent history. For thirty years Germany sowed militarism and autocracy in its schools and the harvest was a world war. The meaning of this strange perversion of education is now perfectly clear. It has been borne in upon us impressively that the most efficient training of the intellect carries with it a danger greater even than does utter ignorance, if there go with it a twist of the moral vision and a torsion of the moral will.

"How is it possible that society should escape destruction, if the moral tie be not strengthened in proportion as the political tie is relaxed?" These words of De Tocqueville, the great French philosopher and statesman, are far more pertinent at this hour than when he wrote them nearly a century ago. The problems of the world are more and more seen to be moral problems—problems whose central element is neither economic nor financial, but moral—and because this is true the leaders who, for the most part, will guide in their solution tomorrow must be found among those who have had the right sort of training in our schools.

Not only is education itself essential to democracy—indeed it is the corollary of democracy—but the right kind of education is absolutely necessary if democracy is to survive the forces of selfishness and moral decadence which always attack it from within. We rejoice that this principle was so clearly seen by those intrepid forefathers who laid broad and deep the foundations of this republic and who built our first schools and colleges. Those were Christian institutions. There are no Christian colleges in Germany. There never have been any. How different in America.

For more than two hundred years Christian schools and colleges have leavened American democracy with moral ideals and supplied it with religious leadership. The spirit of our fathers is evidenced in an old motto carved on a gateway of Harvard University:

After God had carried us safe to New England and we had builded our homes, provided necessaries for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship and settled the civil government; one of the next things we longed for and looked after was to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity, dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches when our present ministers shall be in the dust.

Our fathers were true to that spirit. Of the first 119 colleges founded east of the Mississippi River, 104 were Christian institutions. It would be difficult to measure the influence of these colleges on the life of America and ultimately upon the whole world. More than half the signers of the Declaration of Independence were college graduates. And these men were themselves believers in education. Benjamin Franklin founded the University of Pennsylvania. George Washington was chancellor of William and Mary College. The leading trustee of Hampden-Sidney was Patrick Henry. Thomas Jefferson founded the University of Virginia. And those who came after them carried their spirit. Daniel Webster stirred the Supreme Court of the United States as it has seldom been stirred in his famous plea for Dartmouth College. Before the Civil War, Stonewall Jackson was the head of a school and after the war Robert E. Lee could conceive of no greater service to render his beloved Southland than to accept the presidency of a college. In 1862 Abraham Lincoln, though not a college man, signed the land grant bill which virtually created 52 colleges in the west.

To an even greater degree our colleges have furnished the religious leadership of America. In the early part of our history the Christian colleges supplied all the trained leaders. Even now they are furnishing a very large percentage. The figures for the various religious bodies range from 80 to 90 per cent. From the days of the haystack prayer meeting at Williams College, when a little group of consecrated students started the whole tremendous foreign missions movement, down to the present hour, the Christian colleges have supplied the personnel for this movement. One college recently gave to the church 24 missionaries in five years. A study last year of the educational equipment of the missionaries of a single religious body, shows that out of 288 that have gone out to active service in the past eight years, 90 per cent were trained in church colleges and only 4 per cent had failed to receive a college education.

What the colleges have done through the rank and file of their graduates in making America Christian cannot be computed. The promotion of these institutions by the Church is an investment in the life of the nation and the world which has and will multiply itself many fold. But the responsibility of the Church must go beyond its own colleges, if America is to remain Christian and be made more Christian. There are approximately 200,000 students in state universities, colleges and normal schools. More than 70 per cent of these students came from distinctly Protestant homes. They are taking courses in law, medicine, engineering, pharmacy, dentistry, agriculture and scores of other specialized curricula not offered in the church college. To secure these they are compelled for the most part to attend institutions not under church control and which are prevented by law from offering religious instruction.

These great tax-supported and independent institutions are turning out leaders by the thousand each year. What kind of leaders are they going to be, so far as moral and religious force are concerned? This is the question the Church must answer. Too long already has the Church neglected this field which President Bryan of Indiana University declares "Is the greatest mission field in America. The danger of our time is that this supremely important task will fall between Church and State and be neglected by both. Today the Church is spending less than one dollar for the religious care and instruction of the students at these institutions to every three hundred dollars which the State pays for their secular instruction!

The Disciples of Christ have their part to play in the redemption of America and the world. The colleges founded by them have done a magnificent work. But they have been and are handicapped by the lack of resources as are the colleges of no other great religious body in America. Of all the great churches in America the Disciples have done least for the cause of education. No other church has so shamefully neglected its institutions of learning. But a new day is at hand and now we are going to make amends for past neglects. We are patriots. We are lovers of truth. We are followers of Christ and we will not fail America, the world and God in this strategic hour.

The Ideal Patriot

By GEORGE W. KNEPPER

FOR two thousand years men have retold the story of the Macedonian vision. Seeing it from the standpoint of Paul, they have declared it a call to foreign service; and so it was. But there is another side, for this Macedonian visitant was surely the home missionary par excellence and the ideal patriot.

There were gross wrongs in Macedonia and he both knew and cared. Looking over his native land he beheld the exploitation of the weak, personal selfishness, greed, lust, sin. Piety was there, but it was untutored and without power to change. The old condition was unbearable, the Jewish leaven was ineffectual, a way out there must be, and that way must be found.

A realization of actual conditions is the first step to something better. When the prodigal came to himself he was not satisfied till he came to his father. Are we Americans as wise; do we realize the desperate social and religious conditions of our own land; have we discovered that the dominant philosophy of our day is pessimism; do we know that big men freely declare that our schools, our churches, our civilization have failed?

Is there no hope? Yes, it is the gospel of the Living God, and to the church has been committed its propagation. The church holds the answer to every problem of society. Will it be wise enough to see the need and recognize that desperate need as a challenge to new spiritual conquests?

No American who travels, reads, interviews, and investigates will long remain ignorant of the fact that certain great classes, as a whole, have remained untouched by the richness and fullness of the gospel of God. And there is no Disciple of Christ but must be ashamed of his own communion's neglect, in particular, when he knows the facts. That religious force that should have done the most, has, in reality, contributed the least, when we consider its evangel, its power, its opportunities.

What about the foreigner? God brought him here to this great western land in order that he might enjoy the God-given rights which cruel systems denied him in the homeland. Have we Americanized him, civilized him, Christianized him? Let Trotzky answer for millions; he took his post-graduate course in a New York slum. The alien came with a hungry heart, an outstretched hand, a proffered friendship. Alas, to millions America became the land of lost ideals. What have we done? We have insulted his manhood by calling him "sheeney," "chink," "dago," "bohunk," "wop," "guiney," "greaser," "nigger." We have robbed him, exploited him. We have denied him our homes, our churches. We have wrapped our Pharisaic garments about us lest we touch and be unclean. And you disciple, is it nothing to you? No, for you have done less than the least.

The wit said of our Puritan fathers that "they first fell on their knees, then upon the aborigines." Truly, and their posterity are still there. The one shameful blot of American history, indelible as Lady Macbeth's blood spot, is our treatment of the American Indian. To this day we deny him the rights of men, in the land our fathers stole from his fathers. What has the greatest church of American origin done for the original American? Nothing, less than nothing. Today he is asking a man's chance and even the church is silent.

"To the Jew first," said the Son of God. What has the church done for the Jew without stint but to damn him? And yet the fiat of God was, "Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee." Are we reaping our reward of neglect? We declare the fearful menace to religion today is a sport-filled Lord's day. The Sunday show is the enemy of God and society. Yet the theater, movie and baseball are absolutely controlled by the Jew. The exceptions are too few to notice. Or again, is society menaced by revolution? What is its source; Jews, who lost the God of their fathers and hate your Christ. Call the roll, Gompers, Bergman, Goldman, Eisner, Bela Kun, Liebkneckt, Rosa Luxemborg, Karl Marx, Trotzky, there you are! Eighty-five per cent of soviet Russia is Jewish. Disciples of Christ, where are your Jewish trophies?

What more than maudlin sympathy has been given to the real toiler—the slave of the mill, mine, farm or forest? What has been provided to meet his every need? Is it any wonder the church has been deserted by those whom the church deserted? The breach was not intentional on either side. Labor has become dynamic, the church has remained static, and naturally they grew apart. How far apart this little story of a western lumber camp will show.

A camp welfare worker tried long and hard to get the confidence of the men. At last, thinking he had succeeded, he asked if he might preach. The workers withdrew from his presence to consult about the matter and and at last came with this ultimatum, "You may preach and the whole camp will be there to hear, providing you agree to talk only on the theme we assign you." "Very well," answered the preacher, "name your text." "It's this," replied the spokesman, "To hell with the church." There is not a recognized industrial missionary supported by a church of the Disciples in America.

There were rich men in our Lord's day who became His disciples, but they needed a lot of cleansing first. Who will preach the gospel to the rich—to the country club bunch? God knows, they need it. At a fashionable wedding near Philadelphia, the bridesmaid carried the bride's little Pomeranian pup and a bouquet of orchids which the paper reported were "yellow to match the color of the dog." There they march to the altar of high God on the most solemn mission on earth, except to confess our Lord as Redeemer! Through the ages there have been missions to the poor. God send us a mission to the rich!

There is even a sadder condition in America. Her children are growing up pagan. And the so-called Christian home is furnishing as large a share as the slum. The modern child is blase, pert, lost in pleasure because it is a la mode, and ignoring such old-fashioned things as Bible school and church. A man, brought up in a Christian home himself, and by his achievements and interests, not far from the most conspicuous citizen of his city, confessed the other day that he had four daughters, the eldest twelve years of age, who had never been inside of a Bible school. Church! We need a new children's crusade. Not to rescue the tomb of a crucified Lord, but to find the living Christ!

Thus in brief words we have called attention to some classes. The roll is not complete. Here, however, is a suggestion of great, teeming, strategic fields that the church has scarcely touched. And when we, as Disciples of Christ, face the need of our Macedonia and our record in the light of the facts, we have only cause for shame. God grant it may be the godly sorrow which leads to repentance.

Alongside these needy classes we should consider several conditions. Many others might be named. All society is astir. There is a universal unrest, and a widespread belief that things are not right. Passing over the many social, industrial and political problems for which the church alone can offer the solution, may we think of but two conditions, and remember they are no more serious than a score of others.

The neglected fields rise up to condemn the church's lethargy. It's appalling to think that after two thousand years two-thirds of the race has never heard that Christ died to make men free. More condemning still it is to know that in Christian (?) America there should be those who have never heard the story. In Washington, Oregon and Idaho there are 2,900 organized school districts, with boards, teachers and schoolhouses, in which there is absolutely no religious service. This is not in India, but in America! And our eastern cities are as neglected as our western states. Or think of divorce. One county, and that not the worst in its commonwealth, last year issued 1,377 marriage licenses and had 516 suits for divorce filed in in its courts. One American state allows divorce for nine causes, and the ninth is this, "Any cause that the judge deems worthy." Truly Sodom will have to look to her record!

This Macedonian knew the gospel was the last and only hope for the evils of his land. It was a great realization. What was true for his land is equally true for our own. Christ is the only redeemer of nations as he is of men. An appeal to history proves that Christ is the only solution to the whole problem. On history's page is written the attempt of morality, science, philosophy, legislation, humanitarianism, beauty, utilitarianism—and their failure as well. These things are good, have been helpful, but never solved the problem nor ever will.

All problems are but phases of that master problem, Sin. And the only remedy earth or heaven knows for sin is the cross of Calvary. But even at this, it will take a complete gospel to win the world; a gospel that keeps as well as saves; a gospel that rejoices instead of wails; a gospel that eventuates in sacrificial, altruistic service.

In facing this whole problem of the evangelization of our homeland, the Disciples of Christ have a peculiar interest. Of all the great evangelical churches, we alone have had an American origin. Surely the call has a greater compulsion for us. But there is another thing: to us has been given a unique glimpse of Christianity, for when the ultimate church comes, we will have less to give up than any other religious people. Our birthright demands that we be second to none in the full redemption of America.

Now these facts being true, the natural query is, why have we Disciples failed in our duty so lamentably? The reasons are apparent. We have restored the form of apostolic Christianity but have missed its spirit of passionate devotion. Then, we have never thought in large terms; we have had the narrow vision of a rural folk. Again we have never preached a full gospel. We are experts on getting men into the kingdom, but we largely fail to get the kingdom into men. Sanctification, the personal second coming of our Lord, stewardship of money and life, divine healing, intercession, these are tabooed subjects to most Disciple prophets.

Probably our most serious failure has been in teamwork. We have never exerted all our strength or resources on any one great objective.

Lastly, one can readily read another lesson in this story, for surely the Macedonian's words imply he recognized the necessity of cooperation. Cooperation is the modern word. It's the secret of large and successful business. It's the dominant idea for future government. Shall all the world be wise and the church alone be foolish? Unity will come as surely as the Son of God prayed for it. But cooperation will be the first step to its consummation. It was cooperation that brought the palsied man to the feet of Jesus, and it is cooperation that will yet bring the world there for healing. When the church moves as a unit the Kingdom of God will come in a day. When any communion acts as a whole on any program it will leaven the world.

The American Christian Missionary Society is a cooperation. It exists only to give a chance for a common task backed by a united folk. Its record is not to be despised, but it might have achieved the impossible had it had the support of all Disciples. This is no day for pettiness, for personal aggrandizement, for childish disputes and for unbrotherly suspicions. This is the day supreme for fellowship with man and God in the great task of establishing the Kingdom of our God. Big tasks break little men; they challenge big souls. What is our caliber as a people? Are we in this supreme hour of the world, in this day of overwhelming opportunity, unitedly going to measure up to the divine summons, or shall we, like the carping spies of Israel, put our opinions against the will of God and thereby lose our heritage?

God is on the march! We march with Him or we will be trampled by His cohorts as they move. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord!" "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand."

"He hath sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat;
Oh! be swift, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilant, my feet;
Our God is marching on!"

How Division Undermines the Church

By H. C. ARMSTRONG

THE sin of division and the weakness of denominationalism becomes more emphatically obvious with every advance in the study of the missionary problems of the Church. On the foreign field unity is the outstanding, imperative, practical necessity. On the home field division is the one evil that renders the program of the Church ineffectual. Yet, strange to say, it is at home, where its evils are most obvious and most acute, that division has its stoutest, and indeed about its only, defenders. We are so accustomed to our divisions that we are not troubled by them. We read of India's divisions and we are appalled. But when a prominent Hindu lecturer tells us that denominationalism in America functions in the same general social direction as caste in India we are highly offended. We may or may not be willing to admit the sin of division, but the facts being brought to light by the Interchurch World Survey are compelling us to acknowledge the weakness and inefficiency of the present divided order. These facts are telling us why "a divided Church cannot evangelize the world," or even the part of the world in which we live.

None who attended the great World Survey Conference of the Interchurch World Movement at Atlantic City and saw that long, long list of Church divisions run out on the screen can ever forget the impression made upon that audience as the scandal of the present situation was flung out before our eyes. Two hundred and one divisions in the Church in America! Some of them as small as thirty-five members! No wonder the great English journalist and author of "The Church We Forget" shudders. "Let us take up the New Testament and read for ourselves the Acts of the Apostles and then record our first and immediate impression. Does it not strike you at once that if these early Christians revisited us today they would need a dictionary? It seems to me they would be puzzled by our sectarian labels—I hardly dare think what Paul would have said about the schisms which now cleave asunder the Body of Christ."

Ministerial Supply and Support

"The pastor is the keystone of success" for the entire program of the Church. The minister is the indispensable man. "Ministers are the officers of the army of the Lord. The nation that loses its officers loses its army; and if the army is lost the nation is lost; and if the nation be lost, all is lost. It is so with the Church. If we lose the ministers we lose the Church; and to lose the Church is to lose all." There is the crisis. The Survey reports show that we are losing the ministers. It is said that there are at least 50,000 vacant pulpits in the United States. The Survey reports that last year in one communion 3,388 congregations did not have regular pastoral care. In another there were 994 fewer ministers than in 1914. In the one section of the country 35 per cent of the congregations of one communion were without regular ministers in 1915. Another communion needs 1,000 new ministers a year to fill the gaps.

Division is directly at the bottom of this alarming condition. By dividing the resources of the community denominationalism makes adequate salaries impossible. "Inadequate salaries make widening gaps in the ministerial ranks by compelling efficient men to seek other means of supporting their families and by preventing the recruiting of the ablest and best young men." Moreover, and vastly more vital, denominationalism does not challenge the young manhood of the community. Studies of religious conditions in the armies of both America and Great Britain show that our young men are not even interested in the churches. The ministry as a profession never enters their minds. In one of these studies it is reported "The religious work in the army showed clearly how little interest the men of our country have in any form of denominationalism." It can no longer be doubted that division is the supreme problem in the program of the Church and its ministry.

The Church and the Community

Division is not only depleting the ministry; it is estranging the people, young and old, from the Church. The Interchurch Survey reports that there are in the United States 58,000,000 unchurched people. More than half the population are not in any church of any kind. There are 26,000,000 children and youth under 25 years not in any Sunday school or institution of religious training. Denominationalism has not succeeded and is not succeeding in winning America to Christ. The Interchurch Chart shows that in no state are half the people in the Church, and in some states as much as three-fourths and seven-eighths of the population is out of the Church. Division is definitely at the base of this tragic situation. The surveys made in some of the states show that in the sections where there are the most churches most people are outside the Church, and conditions of health and morality are worst. The reasons are not far to seek. Division means overchurching in some sections and neglect in others. Both overchurching and underchurching mean inadequate church facilities and programs. Both result in part-time preaching in many places, with little or no pastoral care. In short, division means that a constructive church program is impossible. For example, one town in Texas with a population of 1,050 has seven churches, one to every 150 inhabitants. The smallest church has forty members and the largest 350. What chance has that town for any adequate religious program for its salvation? Just the same chance that thousands of other towns like it in America have—no chance at all. There is one supreme, imperative home missionary necessity. It is the union of the Christian forces of America.

Moreover, as with our young men, so with the people generally, denominationalism does not challenge their lives. Dr. James I. Vance has well said, "The world has become too enlightened for a sectarian church to flourish much longer. People have gone too far in the practice of the Golden Rule to be stirred by sectarian appeals. The church that thinks only of itself in this century is doomed. A church that prefers to walk alone will soon discover that its solitude is that of the city of the dead. "The church faces a task which is staggering, but which is sublime. The war has released forces in human society which will wreck the world if allowed to run wild, but which will usher in the Kingdom if brought under control of the law of love."

There is a day of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night—
And grief may bide an evening guest,
But joy shall come with early light.

The Old Soldier's Last Battle

By E. S. MUCKLEY

THE deepening shadows of the dying day were a symbol of the gathering gloom that had been settling down with increasing weight upon the heart of the old soldier. This evening, as he had done many evenings before, he sat upon the porch of the humble three-room cottage fighting the hardest battle of his life.

Sometimes during these evenings there was a far-away look in his eyes and you knew he was dreaming the old man's dream as he was projecting himself in swift flight back through the years and traveling again the long way he had come. The varying experiences through which he had lived were reflected in the changing expressions of his face while the dream went on—now placid, now perturbed; now bright with joy, now clouded with sorrow; now the glow of victory, now the gloom of defeat.

Sometimes the dream would change to a vision, for not only dreams of the past may haunt or cheer an old man, but visions of the future as well. In the case of our old man it was not a vision of the far-off future, but the immediate future which he saw this particular evening. And it haunted him. Somehow the far-off future did not seem to worry him. In his faith, that was secure enough, but the nearby future—what of that? And a great fear came into his eyes as if his soul quailed before some menacing form ready to strike a blow he was not prepared to parry.

This particular evening the battle between faith and doubt, hope and despair, had been more fiercely waged than ever before. His soul was travailing through most exquisite suffering. Nor was his suffering self-centered. Another was involved—the one who had cheerily traveled the long trail with him and had kept him happy even through disappointment and loss; victorious in spirit even when facing defeat.

But now it was different. The strength of manhood was gradually leaving him—in fact was almost gone—and thought of the brave little woman who had so cheerfully faced her trials and sorrows, and had been such a comfort all the long years, coming to want and possibly starvation, almost paralyzed him with fear. That was the picture he saw. Even his faith could see no other just now.

So fierce was the conflict that in his preoccupation he had not heard the gentle rattle of the dishes as they were being washed in the kitchen—music it had come to be to his ears. He had not even heard his wife slip out on the porch and into the other old weatherbeaten rocker.

She had been sitting there for some time waiting for him to sense her presence. At last, unable to wait longer, she said:

"Henry, you're worrying again. Don't do it."

The old soldier was startled, and turning quickly, looked at his wife, the love-light in his eyes gradually dispelling the fear and doubt that had been lurking there. And his soul was quieted as he looked into her beautiful face above which rested her crown of waving silver hair.

"When did you come out Mary? I didn't hear you come."

"I must have been here five minutes before I spoke."

"I didn't hear you washing the dishes, either, or I would have heard you come out," he said, half apologetically.

They were silent for a few minutes, then:

"Henry, I've been watching you for several days. You're worrying about something and I can't stand it any longer, dear. It hurts me to see you troubled this way and not know what's the matter so I can help you. Tell me what's the matter; you always did."

"I know I always did. But this is different. It would only trouble you. You can't help. Nobody can."

"Yes I could help," she said bravely. "I could help you bear your burden if I couldn't do anything else."

He looked at her a moment, then said:

"Move your chair over here, dear, I haven't the heart even to get up and move a chair."

She obeyed. He took her hand in his and thus they sat in tender silence for several minutes. She felt he would speak when he could and waited.

"I think I have the courage to tell you now, dear. Do you think you have the courage to hear it?"

"I must know," she said calmly.

"We are getting pretty old, you know," he began. "I am eighty and you are seventy-nine. We can't work much longer. The garden patch was pretty burdensome this summer. I think I could go through another summer's work like this if the winter is not too hard on me, but not many more. What will we do then?"

She saw the despair written in his face, heard it in his voice, felt it in the relaxed pressure of his hand on hers. But she did not lose her courage, and said:

"But you have your pension."

"Yes, but even with the help of the garden it is barely enough to keep us with the prices so much higher than ever before. If you should get sick, or I, what would we do?"

"There would be a way provided," her faith insisted.

"Yes, by death," he said in desperation.

"But you know, Henry, you can go to the old soldiers' home any time you need to. Somebody would provide for me. The church wouldn't let me suffer."

"Yes, I know I can. I talked with the superintendent yesterday. They could take me in the main building, but they won't take you. And there are no cottages vacant and the waiting list will take years to accommodate."

He paused. Then with voice almost breaking, he said: "Mother, I won't go and live anywhere without you. I'd starve first."

"And I would starve with you, father," she replied as she pressed his limp old hand in both of hers. And they were silent awhile, each thinking of him who had come to be their hope in old age, but of whom neither had the courage to speak at first, for when his name was mentioned the old pain would come back. The little woman spoke first:

"If only Willie had lived he would have cared for us." She could not keep the sadness out of her voice, though she did succeed in keeping the tears from her eyes.

"Yes, Willie was a good boy. And every time I think of him—and I have thought of him so often lately—I recall how anxious he was to get well so he could buy back our home for us. If I had only been younger I could have laid up another sum for our rainy day."

And the old soldier recalled those former days when he had the resiliency both of body and mind to jump up again and fight when he had been thrown down by misfortune. And he almost wept.

Possibly no condition of life is more pathetic than childless old age, especially when caused by the death of children. A daughter had died in her teens. In later life a son was born. As he grew to manhood he became an increasing comfort. He never married because he saw the growing dependence of his parents upon him and felt he owed them his whole life in their declining days.

The father and son together had acquired a small farm. When the work of the farm had grown burdensome to his parents, the son suggested that they sell it and invest part of the proceeds in business and the balance in a home in town where they could take life easier. They gave their consent.

But the unforeseen happened. A scheming partner planned a swindling game that was carried on for several years. A crash finally came that not only wiped out the assets of the business, but took their home as well. And as so often happens, almost immediately following this crash, a worse calamity befell the old couple in the death of the son after a long illness, during which he struggled bravely but in vain for life. This all happened only three years before the opening of this story. Thus the old soldier and his wife were left stranded at the end of life. They rented a three-room cottage with a good-sized garden patch and settled down to make their last fight for life under the double handicap of waning strength and rapidly increasing prices.

We cannot wonder at the old soldier for letting this menacing cloud of gloom obscure his vision, for he did not know the mysterious movements of Providence. So absorbed were they both in the sorrow that had intruded again its heavy weight upon their souls that they were startled when out of the quiet of the evening hour came a voice:

"What is it that seems to be troubling you both?"

The voice had in it both sympathy and good cheer, for it was the voice of their pastor, who had greatly cheered and comforted them through their sorrow. Before they could recover, he continued:

"Do you feel as if all your friends had forsaken you?"

"I guess we did feel a bit that way. I have often felt that way since Willie died," the old soldier said with trembling voice.

"Well, they haven't."

"No, we know you haven't."

"Nor has the church. I've got good news for you, Brother Hardin."

The faces of both began to brighten. Could it be that a ray of hope was going to break through this heavy black cloud?

"I just received word that there is now a place for you in our Home for the Aged where you can spend your last days together without being worried and wearied with cares and problems."

"Mother, why are you weeping that way? I never saw you cry so except when Willie died," said the old soldier, greatly perturbed at his wife's sudden expression of grief. The old saint had covered her face with her apron and was shaking convulsively.

"Don't, mother, don't cry so," he said tenderly, as he put his arm across her shoulders and tried to comfort her. But it was not comfort she needed, for it was a fountain of joy, not a fountain of grief that had broken loose. Presently she regained control of herself. When she could speak she looked up at her pastor and said:

"I knew, I just knew the Lord would answer my prayers. I didn't know how, but I knew He would."

The fountain broke loose again, but in a moment she could ask:

"How did you find this out, Brother Miller? I thought of the home and wanted to write, but father said there was no use, because they had such a large waiting list and we would just die in disappointment waiting."

"I had written to the home eighteen months ago," the pastor replied, "because I thought you would need its shelter some time. I didn't tell you because I didn't want to give you hope for fear you might be disappointed, for they could not take you until some one died in the home. The waiting list ahead of you dwindled away one by one because some died while waiting and others could wait no longer and trudged their weary way over the hills to the poorhouse. Now there is a vacancy for you when you can arrange to go."

The pastor was a busy man, and after conveying this joyful news he departed. They hardly knew when he had gone. For a long time they sat in silence, their hands clasped. It was difficult for them to give expression to their gratitude for this new-found happiness. Mother spoke first:

"Father, the Lord has provided a way for us by letting some old soul pass on into the larger life. Sometime He will make room for others by letting us go over to see Willie."

The thought brought a smile of contentment to the sweet old face.

Missions and Patriotism United

AMERICA spent $20,000,000,000 the last year of the war and called millions of men to arms to carry out the exact purposes that underly the missionary conquest of the world for Christ. We must not be deceived in our thinking by the fact that one has emphasized the religious motive, while the other added the patriotic thrill. Beneath all this, the world war and world missions are close relatives. Patriotic loyalty and Christian devotion have always been brothers. Now they are indistinguishable twins.

Darkness and Light

JOHN OXENHAM

There is darkness still, gross darkness, Lord,
On this fair earth of Thine,
There are prisoners still in the prison house,
Where never a light doth shine.
There are doors still bolted against Thee,
There are faces set like a wall;
And over them all the Shadow of Death
Hangs like a pall.

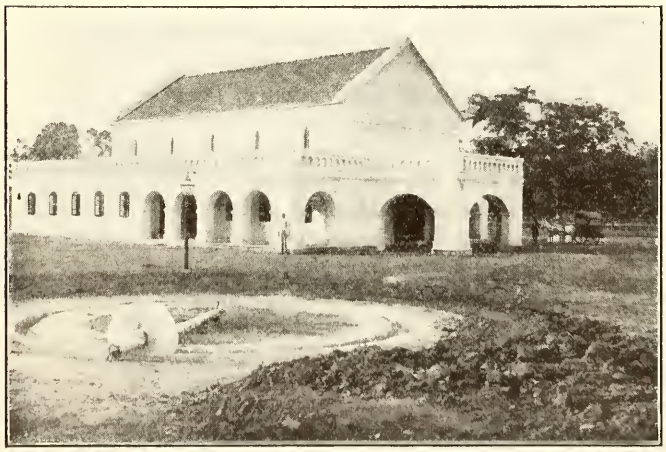
Do you hear the voices calling,
Out there in the black of night?
Do you hear the sobs of the women,
Who are barred from the blessed light?
And the children—the little children—
Do you hear their pitiful cry?
O brothers (sisters), we must seek them,
Or there in the dark they die!

Calling Sinners to Repentance

By MISS JOSEPHA FRANKLIN

SOME twenty-five or thirty years ago, before I came to India, I saw a picture which typified the then common idea of mission work in foreign fields. A white preacher in his long black coat and a huge sun hat stood under a tree holding out the Bible to a crowd of naked black heathen. The heathen were reaching out their hands in joy and gratitude and tumbling all over themselves in their eagerness to grasp the Book. I trust the present generation knows more about the manners, customs, religions and history of races and particularly more of human nature than the past generation did; still a little information now and then as to what a foreign missionary is up against in a non-Christian country will probably benefit all, even at the present time. Some others better informed may say you can find such conditions in your native town any day you look for them. This is also probably true, but all the more shame to you and your native town that you permit such conditions to exist. If they had not existed the indescribable war of all ages would never have taken place.

Some years ago a woman in a loathsome stage of syphilis entered Dr. McGavran's hospital for treatment. She had contracted the disease from her husband. When she became helpless her husband drove her from their home. She remained in the hospital for months and learned much of Christianity. She would not, however, go to any mission home for women and it was impossible for her to become a Christian and remain among her people or even to live alone and lead a moral life from the Christian standpoint. She grew fairly well and strong after a certain time. A castefellow saw her and asked her to live with him as a concubine, and she consented. The man had a legal wife. The zenana missionary and Bible woman visited the section of the town in which the pair lived. The concubine was a hard worker and good manager. In a short time her master's business began to improve and he became comparatively well to do owing chiefly to the energy and devotion of the concubine. I began visiting this section about a year ago. I found that the concubine opened up her house every Sunday for a Sunday school and when my Bible women and I came to teach them she always collected a crowd of women to hear us. A few months ago her ungrateful master fell in love with a young woman of his caste and decided to drive away the old concubine and keep the new one. The caste-people had a meeting and decided he must keep the old concubine. The man then most opportunely was seized with a demoniacal possession and sickness. He foamed at his mouth and had violent fits. They smeared him with hot ashes, blew into his ears, swept him up and down with brooms and went through other incantations to drive out the evil spirit. The man recovered. He said the Chut (evil spirit) of the dead husband of his new concubine had seized him for turning the woman out. The castefellows received something more substantial than the revelation and decided that the old concubine must go. When my Bible women and I were last at the place the new concubine called us in, gave us seats, and called the women in the neighborhood to hear us. The old concubine was living alone in another house near and called us to her place later. She was making her living by going daily to the great grain depots and cleaning the floors. She received the grain that was left when the bags were filled. She told her own story and at the end said: "Why should I remain in his house when he loves the other woman? I would make trouble for both and also be unhappy myself. I do not want the evil spirit of the other woman's dead husband to persecute him. It is better for me to go out and make my own living and let them be happy." Oh, the unutterable pathos of it! However, the injustice, the hardness, the cruelty, the monstrosity and the chaos of non-Christian social systems are not what discourage the missionary, but it is the fact that all of these things are so born and bred in the people that they are accepted as a matter of course, and they bow down to them as to the fiat of Fate.



The Mission Church, Damoh, C. P., India

There is, however, a little plant that grows under the huge boulder of heathenism, and slowly but surely displaces it. The plant is growing from the seed, which is the Word of God. A few years ago all of the members of a certain caste in another district waited upon the missionary in a body. Their spokesman made this remarkable statement: "In our caste our women have to submit themselves to the priests whenever they come about. We know this custom is degrading and revolting, not only to the women, but to our whole caste. We hear that no such thing is demanded in the Christian religion. If it is true our whole caste will consider becoming Christians." In this case the boulder of heathenism had been loosened. May it not be in Damoh as well?

In a certain village where my Bible women and I work we have entrance into two of the wealthiest houses of the place. Two weeks ago, while teaching the Bible in one, a woman entered weeping. She was the second wife in the other house. She and the first wife had a violent quarrel and the husband thrust her out of the house because he loved the first woman better.

We not only have to deal with wickedness and superstition among non-Christians, but among so-called Christians as well. Recently during her husband's long absence from the country a wife became unfaithful to him. In spite of all rebukes and warnings from missionaries and old Christians the guilty pair continued their illicit relations. No actual proof of their conduct could be produced, but when the husband returned he found the proof, and himself brought the matter before the church. During the investigation it was proved that the pair had resorted to practices as ignorant, senseless and degraded as those of the lowest animists. When they had heard that the husband was returning home they went to a witch doctor to get a prescription for a "love potion" to keep the husband from exposing their guilt. Fellowship was withdrawn from both and it is hoped they have lost faith in the efficacy of the potion. The surprising thing is not that a few people in the Indian Church revert to heathenism (or possibly never emerged from it), but that so many Christians remain true to Christianity and go on growing in their spiritual life.

Some very good people at home think that as soon as idol worshippers become Christians they are immediately transformed from ignorant, degraded beasts to highly intellectual and spiritual worshippers of the one great God. Such people should carefully study the parables of the wheat and the tares, the net in which all kinds of fish were caught and Paul's teaching on the Milk of the Word and the Strong Meat of the Word. The Great Teacher gave us the parable of a sower, seed, ground, growth and fruit, not a parable of a professor, a laboratory, an experiment and an instantaneous chemical change. Whatever methods may be employed to raise a people—philanthropical, educational, medical, social and industrial—the great and fundamental purpose underlying all of these must be to bring the people to Christ. When this is done evil practices will disappear as slavery and polygamy have disappeared among the more enlightened nations.

Where the Churches Are Lacking

WHY are less than half the people of the United States actively connected with organized religion? An analysis of early results of the Interchurch World Movement survey gives the following as important elements in the situation:

1. The churches are not holding their own people—their natural adherents. A great mass of people who in childhood and youth lived in Protestant homes and were connected with church and Sunday school are now not actively related. A household survey of a certain suburb revealed as many unchurched people who preferred a certain church as there were members of the church in the community.

2. Protestant propaganda is making little or no headway with the foreign-born residents who have forsaken their old-country churches or with the recent immigrants whose families never have been Christian.

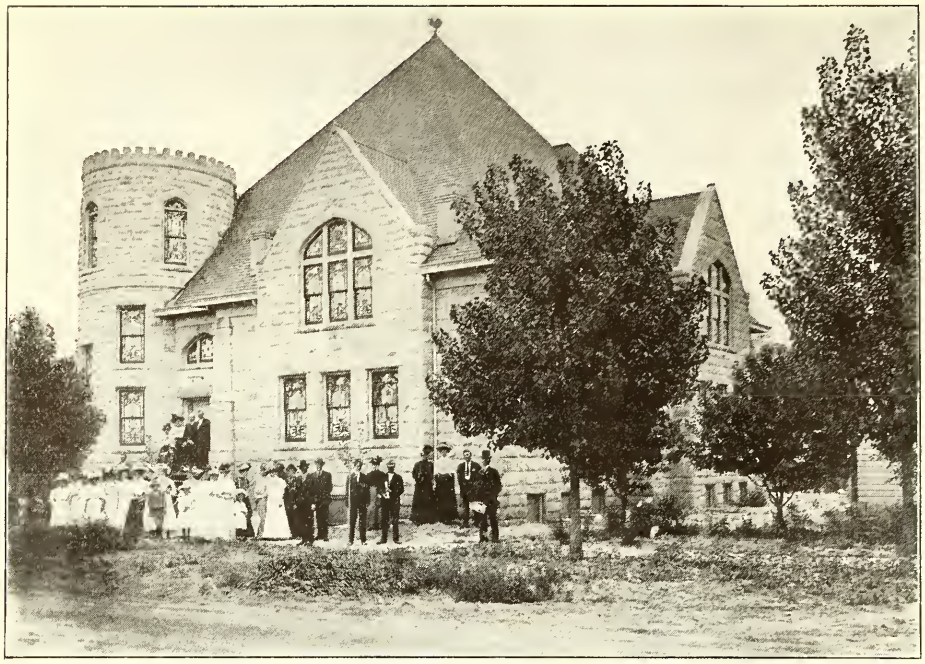
3. The movement from the country to the city, which has been a marked feature of American life in recent decades, means a great loss in church membership. Only a small proportion of church members who move to the city ally themselves to the churches there.

4. Due largely to lack of interdenominational cooperation, there are stretches of territory in every part of the United States, enormous in the aggregate, where population is scattered but numerous enough to support regular schools, but where no church whatsoever is at work. This revelation of "overlooked" territory is perhaps the most surprising result of the Interchurch survey.

5. Duplicating of the churches in communities unable to support all of those present on an adequate basis. This leads to the "absentee ministry," which cannot build up the spiritual life of the people.

6. The church has failed to adapt itself to the city so as to make an appreciable impression on the unchurched groups or nonsocial conditions of city life.

"A disease known is half cured." It is safe to predict that the tide will be turned the other way within this decade. The very cooperation of the churches in the Interchurch World Movement which has revealed these facts promises much toward their correction.



The Church at Paonia, Colorado

Present-Day Frontier Experiences

By Charles G. Stout

I HAVE felt that I was doing the right thing here, in this community work, and believed in it enough to risk everything for it; but I have not felt before that I had the moral support of the brotherhood to the extent that the case merits.

I made it plain and emphatic upon accepting the pastorate of the Community Church, that I would yield no point of doctrine or interpretation of what I understood to be the doctrines and interpretations of the Disciples of Christ, neither would I sacrifice any principle of conscientious conviction, but that I would be broad enough and kind enough to allow to every other one who believed himself to be a true servant of Jesus Christ to have his conscientious conviction of truth and righteousness, without purposely hurting his feelings or belittling any doctrine or interpretation or practice which he might deem sacred.

Upon this clear statement I was unanimously elected and, spontaneously, there came from the audience a motion to allow me the same freedom in the pulpit and in the homes of the people which I should feel if I were serving my own religious body only. That was unanimous and hearty and there has been no retraction, but there has been a spirit of freedom and brotherly love and loyalty as true as I have ever known in my own work as a pastor, or in the work of my brethren in the ministry, many of whom I know most intimately and for whom I have the highest appreciation.

Members of all churches represented call me for counsel in trouble or sorrow or sickness or death. They confide to me their secrets and share with me their joys. My acquaintance has grown to rather large proportions considering the fact that this is a new country and religious work is a pioneer enterprise throughout this great inland empire.

There is a strip of country here which is indescribable for beauty and natural resources and possibilities for the future. There is estimated to be enough coal cropping out along the slopes of this valley to supply the navies of the world for a thousand years; enough water power to run all the mills and factories of the United States forever. The valleys can produce enough fruit to supply all the markets of the country if we could secure the people to cultivate them. There is government reserve land approaching within three miles of our town where there is pasture for 100,000 head of cattle and horses.

The climate is unsurpassed for health and exhilaration. We have had only three sunless days since the first of December. We have several beet sugar factories scattered around over the mountain districts and two more to be built this season within a few miles of here.

I am not a real estate agent or an agent for anything else. I have never had a commission either for buying or selling a home or locating a settler, but if I could be relieved in the "battle for bread" sufficiently to be free to develop a strong Christian sentiment along with the material development of this country, I think my life would count for far more than it is counting now. Please take a map of Uncle Samuel's country and look at the three gateways to the Rockies, Denver, Colorado Springs and Pueblo, then look westward to Salt Lake City. Take that distance as the width of a strip reaching from Mexico to Canada, and then look up on your map of churches or the map of other religious bodies, or study the reports of the Home Missions Conferences, and see how many churches there are with settled pastors, or how many centers of religious influence there are, you may be appalled. (Only ten per cent of the population members of Protestant churches.—Editor.)

Traveling men tell me that the church here, of which I am the minister, comes the nearest to being a source of religious influence of any in the Rocky Mountain region. If this is true there is something to be done religiously for the people of the Rocky Mountains.

I went to one of our nearby mining camps (eleven miles from here) and preached a few sermons. No one had ever preached a sermon in the town excepting Mormon elders or missionaries. It is a town of twelve hundred people. I held my first meeting above the saloon, the next in the schoolhouse. I preached two sermons, organized a Sunday school with sixty-seven members, had seven confessions, and, at the close of the meeting, a man arose and made a motion that they organize themselves into a class and ask the Christian Church at Paonia to accept them as a Mission station and give them regular spiritual guidance. It was duly considered and carried unanimously. Every one voted. There is another mining town of about five or six hundred people six miles from here, where not a single sermon has ever been preached, even by the Mormons, and there are a few families there with whom I am quite well acquainted and where we could enter more easily than anyone else. One summer my wife and the children insisted upon my going to the hills for an outing and rest, so I took the two little boys and started up the river. We went past the last mining camp and the end of the railroad and followed the trail for thirteen miles up the stream where we pitched camp and started in for a season of hunting and fishing. Now there is sport! Everything from the wily trout to the elk and grizzly bear. With a bed on the spruce boughs and with the splashing of mountain streams and all the beauty and solitude of the glorious out-of-doors, one really soon begins to feel carefree. On my second day after locating camp I was out for a walk and a climb of the hills when I came upon a log cabin in which I found a woman and five children. All except the older one had been born there and even the older one could not remember ever having been out of that valley, as they had lived there for twelve years. The woman, I learned, was a native of the State of Missouri and had been brought up in a Christian church home. When she learned that I was a Christian minister she was overjoyed and insisted upon extending the hospitality of the humble home. The boys and I took dinner with them and learned the life story. She was married while very young and went to the mountains with her husband, who was determined to pursue the life of a miner. In the mining camps there were such conditions of immorality that she insisted upon finding a country home, to which he consented, provided she would file and live upon a homestead. This she did, and they had been living there for twelve years. She was the homemaker and the teacher of the children and all they knew of religion was what she had been able to teach them.

The church and the Bible and the Lord were the subjects of our conversation and the young girl expressed a desire to obey the Lord and the mother also proposed obedience. She stated that she would like to be baptized and that she would like to have the neighbors come to witness the baptism. Then she thought that she had no shoes and that it would hardly look right to go barefooted to the baptism, whereupon Hilda, the daughter, said, "Mamma, I will go to Somerset tomorrow and get you a pair of shoes and will go by Adamses and tell them, so they can come." Mrs. Adams was their nearest neighbor, eight miles distant. Somerset was the mining camp, thirteen miles away. It would have been a walk of twenty-six miles for a pair of shoes for her mother to wear to be baptized in. My little boy, twelve years of age, said, "No, you will not walk to town and back. You could not do it in one day." She said, "I have walked the distance many a day and have carried most of our provisions that way for several years." The shoes were provided and the neighbors invited, and everyone within twelve miles was there. On a Sunday afternoon where the clear water gushes out of a deep cañon and flows as clear as the blue sky the little boys and I had a real revival. It was a sacredly beautiful service as we mingled our voices with the sound of rushing water and in the presence of a number of people, none of whom had ever witnessed such a service, the mother and daughter were buried in the typical grave. They were received into our congregation upon my statement, and after two years came down to our town, found their way to the church and received the hand of fellowship.

These are just a few experiences which the good Lord has seen fit to allow me to enjoy. I could tell of scores of other experiences which are just as thrilling and real and personal. If my dear wife had not broken down I would never have thought of taking missionary help, but that has disqualified me for going back into the States, where our people are numerous and where they are able and willing to pay. I have had splendid pay for my work in Iowa and Missouri and my last visit there (one month) paid me almost as much as the people here paid me for a whole year, even last year, and that was more than twice what I had received in previous years. Our board is certain that it would add greatly to the help of the cause of Christ in this community if I could give my full time to the work and I could do it now, so far as home duties are concerned, if we were supported from the work or had support provided.

I took the privilege of consulting a friend of mine who is not a member of either of the cooperating churches. He is a royal fellow. A man of clean life, well born, of a good New York family, and Harvard education. I have worked with him in matters of community interest. He is our representative in the state legislature, and being of the kind and character he is, I wanted him to write you a few words and tell you his version of our place in the community. My reason for doing this was to allow you to have a little more data as to the probability of my mixing with the people of a different type from the miner and homesteader. We have all kinds. One night I looked carefully over my audience here and counted graduates from thirteen of the big colleges of America and Europe. They were so to my personal knowledge. Of course that was an exception and not the general rule, but there are about fifty college graduates who live in or near our town and I picked out Mr. Rockwell as a representative of the highest type of man.

If you do or do not succeed in securing the help of which I wrote, please remember that there is a fellow out here still doing his best with no plan to strike or turn "red."

In conclusion let me say to you what a poor old man said to me as, in his lonely cabin, he looked up from his bed of suffering and in his loneliness and heart hunger asked, "When you talk to God again won't you have me in it just a little?"

Alfred O. Kuhn

Rocky Mountain Bible School Superintendent

ALFRED O. KUHN, Albuquerque, New Mexico, has been appointed by the Bible School Department of the American Society, superintendent of Bible school work for the Rocky Mountain District. W. F. Turner says of Mr. Kuhn: "I have known him for over ten years. He is pure in life, spiritual in temperament, cultured and optimistic. He has succeeded splendidly in the ministry, specializing in the work of the Bible school. He is still growing. He will make good."

Summer Conferences on Missions

THIS summer the Interchurch World Movement will conduct eight Missionary Education Conferences under the direction of its Missionary Education Department. These are the conferences formerly conducted by the Missionary Education Movement, which in 1919 became the Missionary Education Department of the Interchurch World Movement.

The location and dates of these conferences are as follows:

Winter Park, Florida, June 3 to 10; Blue Ridge, North Carolina, June 25 to July 5; Silver Bay, New York, July 9 to 19; Estes Park, Colorado, July 9 to 19; Asilomar, California, July 13 to 23; Ocean Park, Maine, July 20 to 30; Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, July 23 to August 2; Seabeck, Washington, July 28 to August 7.

Blue Ridge, Estes Park, Asilomar, Lake Geneva and Seabeck are most accessible to Disciples of Christ and special attention will be given to our representation both on the programs and in the attendance at these conferences.

Complete information may be secured from the Missionary Education Department, 45 West 18th street, New York City.

News from Home

WE were very happy to receive several letters from India, which has been our "home" since 1902.

Miss Clarke, superintendent of the Industrial Home in Kulpahar, our last home town in India, tells of the marriages of seven of our young women from the "Training Home." After several years in this "Department of Home Economics" we feel sure they will make good wives and that each new home will present to the heathen community a new idea of womanhood and the place of woman in her home. Among the brides is Tijiya, who was my assistant in the embroidery department when I left India a year ago. How we shall miss her bright, sparkling face, and her helpfulness. She marries an evangelist in Bina.

Miss Burgess also writes from Kulpahar. She tells of the repairs needed on houses in the institution, where walls were injured by the very excessive rainfall of last year. Her account of the vegetable garden (where the women and girls do all the work) sounds very inviting to us in our winter cold; of green peas, tomatoes, cabbage, cauliflower and lima beans, all growing nicely. "Turnips are almost as good as apples."

Mrs. Springer is looking well and strong and has moved to her new work at Maudha.

Mrs. Rice says the Damoh Orphanage is crowded to overflowing and they have to turn away children who should be taken in. She is becoming quite a hunter, as she shot a deer while out in the camp at Christmas time.

Dr. Thomson is enthusiastic about the work in Mahoba. "At the beginning of 1920, I think we have the greatest hopes for a fruitful year in the evangelistic work that we've ever had since coming to Mahoba." We are centering on the low castes all over the district. At our outstation of Kabrai fifty families of weavers seem about ready to come over to Christianity. I have been treating the head-man, who has been very ill with malarial fever. When he fully recovers we shall expect results. We rejoice to know that there have been thirty-four baptisms at Maudha during 1919, from several castes. In Mahoba the basket weavers and other low castes are very favorable; we expect to bring many of them across in 1920. There are ten wards of the city occupied by these castes and we have the leading men of each ward in the Cooperative Credit Society. It is wonderful how much these societies have broken down prejudice and have delivered the people from their bondage to the money lender. (These Shylocks in India often take from 75 to 100 per cent of interest.) Formerly the bankers would say, "You don't dare listen to those Christians or we will cut you off, and how will you get grain for food?" The Society charges 12 per cent interest and the people are very grateful to Mr. Thomson when they come up to pay it. We have a young man, Christian of second generation, in training in a government school, who will come to Mahoba in February to take charge of this cooperative work. With him in charge we hope to make it an evangelistic agency also. We are organizing a Temperance Union of Hindus, Mohammedans and Christians, working together. Next will be a union for women with meetings on child welfare, etc. I am taking charge of the boys' school now, as Dr. Dill has the medical work in her care."

Our New Community and Religious Education Plant for St. Charles Ave. Church, New Orleans

AT a special meeting of the Board of Church Extension on March 16, it was decided to advance the gift of $25,000 granted by the Cincinnati Convention last October for the purpose of erecting the first unit of the new building for St. Charles Avenue Christian Church, New Orleans, where W. H. Allen has been preaching for the last five years.

Our Board felt very keenly the possibility of other religious bodies taking our vision and running away with our opportunities. The various evangelical denominations are pouring money into New Orleans for the purpose of subsidizing congregations very much more wealthy than our faithful band of Disciples on St. Charles Avenue.

The Board felt that our brotherhood would justify us in beginning the erection of the first unit of the $100,000 plant, which is the rear portion of the building shown in the picture of the new building at the head of this article. The present building will be moved to the front of the lot and will be used for worship. The first unit of the building will be used for community work and the Sunday school.

With the advance of this $25,000 gift, the church will raise $15,000 and erect a $40,000 building. In another year it is expected that the entire plant will be completed, as shown in the picture. The building is expected to be ready for use in the course of three or four months. No happier people could be found anywhere than Mr. Allen and his congregation, who have worked so faithfully to this end. The Disciples should rejoice everywhere throughout the land that in this city of dominant Roman Catholic influences the plea of the Disciples for unity is now to have a sure foundation, and should give accordingly to the Interchurch World Budget of which this splendid building is to be one of the objectives.

Last spring the church raised $34,000 for this new project on the basis of the Board of Church Extension giving $25,000 and loaning $25,000 out of the Interchurch receipts.

All of us are aware that this is the day when the Interchurch World Movement and the Christian Unity programs build largely. But while we rejoice in all that, the Disciples are still decidedly of the opinion, and some of us affirm it dogmatically, that there is great need of the plea we have to present in that city of Catholic crosses, splendid cathedrals and crowded parochial schools. Such is the thought of the minister and his congregation. Mr. Allen says, "I am of the Old Order, if you will, in believing that the Union for which Christ prayed will come about, certainly on spiritual life, and no less certainly on the biblical basis, and I firmly believe that the Disciples of Christ not only are correct in the basis they propose, but are largely responsible for the great impetus given to the sentiments that now urge the churches of America to closer fellowship and cooperation."

James L. Wright, a member of the Board of Managers of the United Christian Missionary Society and chairman of the board of St. Charles Avenue Church, urged that our Board make this gift now so that their overcrowded Sunday school might have enlarged facilities for the division of the school into classes during the class period. At present the church auditorium is the only place for the classes to assemble and they are sitting as close together as people do in a congregational assembly for worship. He felt that the fact of commencing work on the proposition would result in new pledges and would enable the church to go to business men and secure money for the work. Other people in the church are just as deeply interested and the Ladies' Aid Society alone has pledged $6,000, while working girls and stenographers have pledged as much as $60 apiece for the new building. With the erection of this plant they will have a property of $55,000 with no indebtedness but a loan of $14,000 from the Board of Church Extension, which is covered by pledges.

It is certainly true that a religious people can be judged by the churches which they build, and the congregation of St. Charles Avenue, one of the most beautiful in the world, want to see a temple erected in honor of Jesus Christ which will testify to the unifying message of the Disciples of Christ in no uncertain way. G. W. MUCKLEY.

Progress in Porto Rico

THE annual convention of our churches in Porto Rico was held in Upper Dajaos, January 27-29. The attendance was good, and the convention was pronounced the best ever held in spiritual uplift and in plans for greater service. The question of self-support received marked attention and plans for it took definite shape. The Dajaos church has already attained to self-support aside from the attention yet given by Mr. Carpenter. Not only do they support the pastor, Augusto Cotto Reyes, but propose also to carry on their services part time without him so that he may conduct the services in the mission points of Buena Vista and Santa Alaya. The Dajaos church has also led in starting a Tithers' League, and the representatives of other churches caught the spirit. It was voted that the committee on self-support continue its work of teaching on the subject of stewardship, and that the Tithers' League be extended to all the churches. The churches of the mission will cooperate in securing a building for the new work in Vega Alta.

The Book Shelf

Two New Mission Study Books

THE foreign mission textbook, published by the Central Committee on the United Study of Foreign Missions, is entitled, "The Bible and Missions." Its author is Helen Barrett Montgomery, the writer of three of the study books previously issued by the Committee. The book is divided into two parts. Part I deals with the Bible as itself the great Mission Study Textbook. In chapter one the missionary message of the Old Testament is outlined; in chapter two, that of the New Testament. In both chapters it is shown that the Bible offers itself as a book for mankind, as a message of salvation from the God of the whole earth.

The remaining four chapters of the book deal with various phases of the Bible's contribution to the missionary enterprise. Chapter three deals with the story of the great translators, whose work has made it possible for the Bible to be read in their own tongue by almost all races of men. Chapter four tells the story and describes the work of the great Bible Societies, through whom the Bible has been printed and distributed to every part of the world. The fifth chapter discusses the effect which the Bible has had upon the law, government and literature in all lands to which it has come. The last chapter shows that the introduction of the Bible into a country inevitably produces a demand for Christian literature. The need of the great non-Christian lands for Christian literature is described, and the efforts now being made to meet this need are indicated.

The mission study book for children is "Lamp Lighters Across the Sea," by Margaret T. Applegarth. All who know Miss Applegarth's charming style will long to put this book in the hands of all children. It is not only a book for study in Junior Mission Societies, it should be in every Sunday school in the land. If this generation of children could be taught in the Word of God we might hope to reconstruct this land of ours which has, in some respects, so sadly wandered from the ideal of its founders.

The various chapters bear the following interesting and suggestive titles: Handing Down the Big Little Library, The Book the Cobbler Made, Behind Closed Windows, The Book Fished Out of the Water, Answering the Giant Question Mark, and Speaking Their Language.

These books may be ordered through the literature department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

Books Worth While

Six Thousand Country Churches—By Charles Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot, New York. The Macmillan Company.

Mr. Gill has been for many years secretary of the Commission on Rural Churches for the Federal Council of Churches in North America. He made the first scientific survey in three counties of New England and New York several years ago and published the results in collaboration with Gifford Pinchot who generously supported the work. This volume is the results of the great Ohio state-wide rural church survey. It is the most thorough and widest study ever made and is made authoritative in its interpretations as well as in its figures through Mr. Gill's expert knowledge of the field as a rural pastor and as the leading investigator of the country. The great Interchurch rural and town church survey will carry the work done in Ohio into every state of the nation.

We will not forestall interest in the book itself with any general account of its findings. Suffice it to say they are more than interesting—they are startling in their revelation of the duplication of churches and the weakness and inefficiency of the rural church as compared with its city sister. This weakness is due to duplication making small congregations in rural communities with the consequent small support. The most striking revelation is that of a large group of counties in Southeastern Ohio where churches are largest in numbers, have held the largest number of revival meetings in the past decade or two and have the smallest number of resident pastors. Notwithstanding the great number of churches in this group of counties the record for criminality, pauperism, defectives and tuberculosis is the greatest of any counties in the state.

Such a record of church duplication in consequent religious weakness is put over against striking situations of community success where there is a strong church. It is a powerful document for advocates of Christian union. A. W. T.

(The first edition of this book has been taken over by the Federal Council of Churches. All orders should therefore be sent to that organization at 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York, N. Y.)

A National System of Education. By Walter Scott Athearn. New York. George H. Doran Company.

Professor Athearn sets forth in this highly suggestive volume a thoroughly developed and practical solution of many of the great problems of American education.

He discusses in turn "Present Tendencies in American Education," "The Evolution of a National System of Public Schools," "Problems in the Administration of a National System of Education" and "A National System of Religious Education." In the statesmanlike program evolved by The National Education Association and embodied in the Smith-Towner bill now pending before Congress, Professor Athearn sees a challenge to the educational leadership of the Church to produce a plan that will be equally scientific, equally democratic and equally prophetic. Such a program he has presented in the inspiring chapters of this timely and vital book. The chapters of this volume were delivered as The Merrick Lectures for 1919.

Professor Walter S. Athearn is director of the Department of Religious Education and Social Service of the Boston University, and also director of the Religious Education of the Survey Department of the Interchurch World Movement.

The Use of the Story in Religious Education. By Margaret W. Eggleston. New York. George H. Doran Company.

The author says in her Foreword: "Because I have longed to help teachers and workers with boys and girls in religious education work, I have written this book. It is for those who are eager to know how. I have given lists of stories and have divided the book in such a way that it can be used in classes in story telling work in our community schools and colleges where the demand is growing for such classes."

Sunday school teachers, recreational leaders. Camp Fire guardians. Scout masters, mothers and elder sisters will each find chapters devoted to the type of stories they need for all the varying occasions. This book, by a recognized expert in the art of story telling, will be found an indispensable help in the selection and preparation of the right story for the right time and place.

Margaret W. Eggleston is instructor in story telling in the School of Religious Education and Social Service of the Boston University.

The Relation of Woman's Organized Missionary Work to the World Movement of Disciples of Christ

THE Church in the present hour is confronted by absolutely new and appalling conditions throughout the whole world. Never have the nations been so unsteady, confused, and chaotic. Never have the peoples of many nations been so distressed and despairing. Never has there been so compellent realization of the failure of every system and agency aside from Christianity to bring peace and right conditions among men. Never before have the united voices of great leaders in every secular field called to the Church as the only hope for the solution of the world's problems. Never has there been manifested such heartache and hunger for salvation from the wreck and confusion into which a materialistic civilization has plunged the peoples of the world. The Church possesses the only olive branch that can sweeten the bitter waters of human woe.

World Movement of Disciples of Christ

All Protestant Christians are feeling the new call of the world and are responding either through the Interchurch World Movement or through great forward movements within their own communions.

Disciples of Christ generally are cooperating in the sweeping plans of the Interchurch World Movement, though certain state organizations, and congregations here and there, prefer to move forward independently.

To bear a worthy part in meeting the demands of the hour a great forward movement among Disciples of Christ is imperative. Our organized missionary and educational agencies have given much time to formulating plans for the far-reaching advances demanded at this time. The intensive campaign launched jointly by the United Christian Missionary Society and the Board of Education has for its goal the stimulating of every church in America to cooperate in meeting present world emergencies. This work will be promoted under the World Movement of Disciples of Christ.

Under this movement all societies auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and becoming auxiliary to the United Christian Missionary Society, will have a very definite program. The Interchurch World Movement has stimulated Churches of Christ to undertake undreamed-of aims for 1920-1921. The last year of the Five-Year Campaign of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is almost coincident with the first year of the World Movement of Disciples of Christ; the former begins July 1, 1920, the latter May 1, 1920.

Goals fixed for the close of the Five-Year Campaign are as follows:

Organizations—10,000.

Woman's Missionary Societies	4,500
Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs	1,500
Boys' and Girls' Societies	4,000

Membership—250,000.

Woman's Missionary Societies	175,000
Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs	25,000
Boys' and Girls' Societies	50,000

Subscriptions—125,000.

WORLD CALL	100,000
King's Builders	25,000

Financial—$1,000,000.

Woman's Missionary Societies	$900,000
Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs	60,000
Boys' and Girls' Societies	40,000

The Financial Campaign

With the launching of the financial campaign for the World Movement of Disciples of Christ, the Executive Committee of the United Christian Missionary Society voted to fix the dates for the first year, coinciding with those of the Interchurch Movement, to run from May 1, 1920, to April 30, 1921. Since missionary societies report by quarters, and blanks for all auxiliary societies are made for quarterly reports, it is necessary to continue the quarterly plan already mapped out.

Reporting the Current Year

Where the state or provincial year closes later than June it may not be possible to attain aims for 1919-20 in full by the close of the June quarter. Certainly the proportionate part of the year's aims for the months up to June 30 should be secured in full by that date.

Attaining Aims for 1920-21

In apportioning the $1,000,000 to states and provinces great care has been given to making the quotas equitable and in proportion to the possibilities of undeveloped resources.

The following receipts will be credited on the aims adopted by state and provincial organizations:

1. All funds from Woman's Missionary Societies sent to the headquarters treasury including dues, proportionate monthly offerings, special offerings, life memberships, etc.

2. All funds sent to the headquarters treasury from Young Woman's Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs.

3. All funds sent to the headquarters treasury by Boys' and Girls' Organizations.

4. Amounts sent to the headquarters treasury by Negro societies and churches are also to be included in the general state aim.

5. Individual gifts designated for credit on Christian Woman's Board of Missions aim of $1,000,000 will of course be credited on the state or provincial aim. Such individual gifts will also be credited to local societies, but large gifts shall in no case release the society from raising an equitable aim from the entire membership.

6. All field receipts sent to the headquarters treasury will be credited on the state or provincial aim.

7. State and provincial development funds remitted to the headquarters treasury will be credited on the state quota.

Note: Money sent in for literature or subscriptions, of course, cannot be credited on aims for auxiliary societies.

Note: Total amounts raised by auxiliary societies will in all cases be credited on the apportionment of the local church.

State and provincial quotas of the $1,000,000 aim will be apportioned by state and provincial executive committees to local societies.

It should be constantly announced that all aims for auxiliary organizations will be attained through the regular plans and methods of work in use among the societies.

Money But an Expression

Offerings and gifts for missionary work are a significant expression of vision and zeal, but they are only an indication of Christian devotion. The deeper aims of all development work are the cultivating of a missionary spirit, disseminating missionary intelligence, winning cooperation in missionary activities, and deepening spiritual life.

We cannot meet together to study the world fields, lift our voices to Him in prayer, give of our means for advancement of missionary enterprise, or go out to interest and enlist others for the Christian conquest of the world without receiving great blessing and enrichment in our own lives, and at the same time bringing enriched vision, capacities, and blessings to others.

Repeatedly it is stated that the most zeal-awakening and spiritualizing influences among the membership of the local church, emanate from the missionary society. Immeasurable resources of power, service, and money await the development which can come only through the consecrated efforts of missionary societies.

Phases of Development Work

The cooperation of every member of every society is needed to carry forward the comprehensive plans for development and extension work. The following phases should be noted:

1. Enriching the vision, deepening the spiritual life and increasing the service of each individual member of the local society.

To this end the use of missionary literature and devotional books, especially the Scriptures, should be increased. WORLD CALL subscriptions should be urged. Enrollment in the League of Intercessors, and service through prayer should be extended. Every member of the society should be actively engaged in personally influencing other women, going out after them, selecting missionary articles to interest them, helping to strengthen the programs of the society, and assisting in every phase of the work. Division leaders have limitless possibilities of service in bringing their women into full and enthusiastic activity, along their lines of service.

2. The missionary education of the church and the community.

Every congregation and community possess rich, undeveloped resources for the work of God. Information only is needed to bring them into the full realization of the onsweeping program of God. Executive committees and literature secretaries have a great and effectual door opened before them for the missionary education of the church and community. Mission study classes wisely planned will bring realization and awaken zeal. A missionary school should be held in every society at least once each year. WORLD CALL subscriptions should be placed in every home, and old copies collected for samples, and for sending to schools and institutions where they will be read. In every church the Woman's Missionary Society should encourage and assist in the holding of the "Church School of Missions" once each year.

3. Increasing Efficiency in the Local Society.

Making most effective the work of the local society is a sacred trust to the officers elected. Each officer should be provided with the leaflet outline for duties of her office, and should seek to carry forward the work according to adopted plans to the fullest extent of her ability.

Regular Executive Committee meetings are essential for planning and carrying forward the work of the society. Where such meetings are not held there can be no great efficiency in the work of the society, and the whole cause languishes. Plans for Executive Committee work and meetings are outlined in a special leaflet which should be in the hands of all officers.

No society of more than twenty members can do its best work under any other than the Division Plan. The committee plan will do for small societies, but even with two divisions of five or six members each, much more effective work is possible. A special leaflet on the Division Plan is provided. Every society should be fully informed on this plan as recommended. Where the division plan has not been successful it is usually because it has not really been worked out as outlined. Every Division Leader should have the leaflet on the Division Plan together with the Division Leader's Booklet.

4. The Enlistment Campaign.

Every woman and young woman in the church should be enlisted. As yet approximately but one woman in six has been enlisted. We must win the other five. Every woman is eligible and can cooperate in some way.

The Continuous Calling Plan should be used as fast and as far as practicable. Let us really put it to the test as outlined, unless better plans are assured for winning the unenlisted.

5. Extension Work.

According to latest reports there are approximately 9,000 congregations of Disciples of Christ in America. There are missionary societies in but 3,200 of them. Five thousand churches have no missionary societies and in large measure they are visionless and inert. The fires of missionary zeal must be kindled in all these churches! This is extension work.

Throughout the states the work of district and county organization is thoroughly planned, and is being systematically developed.

Between October, 1919, and July, 1921, we must organize 1,300 new Woman's Missionary Societies, 435 Missionary Circles and Triangle Clubs, and 2,100 Boys' and Girls' Societies if our aims are attained. These gains are apportioned among the states and provinces according to their strength and undeveloped resources. State and provincial executive committees assign to the various districts and counties their quotas.

To visualize the work, all state, district and county secretaries should have in hand Extension Maps locating all churches within their respective fields.

A regular series of state, district and county conferences is planned annually for intensive study of the churches within the given area, and assignments are made for visitation, organization and fostering.

This great army of development workers includes approximately fifty regional, state and provincial secretaries, about 700 district secretaries and probably not fewer than 1,800 county secretaries. This force of 2,500 field workers, well trained, working unitedly according to systematic and carefully formulated plans to reach definitely fixed objectives, equipped with literature, material, and methods for making the work effective, empowered through prayer and spiritual enduement, certainly should be able to achieve the heretofore impossible in bringing the womanhood of Churches of Christ throughout America into full and active cooperation for the Christian conquest of the world.

All Churches Must Work Together

AT the China-For-Christ Conference recently held in Shanghai, where more than a hundred missionaries and Chinese Christians gathered from all over China launched the China-For-Christ Movement, Dr. Cheng Ching-yi, secretary of the China Continuation Committee, who was later selected as general secretary of the China-For-Christ Movement, struck the keynote in a great speech in which the following were striking sentences:

To neglect the divine call is a sin, and to shrink from such a great responsibility is unpatriotic on the part of subjects of the Kingdom of God.

This is the time of times; this is the day of the Lord; and the doors of opportunity are clearly marked with the word "Push."

The Christian Church is facing a great crisis today, and it is our duty to take advantage of this unusual opportunity, which, great as it is, may be only a passing one.

Man after man who used to despise Christianity and would not even glance at its printed pages is now coming to regard it as the hope of China.

Even men who are its strongest opponents recognize that Christianity is a force in the world today.

The Chinese Christians have never been so willing and ready to take part in the divine task of serving their fellow men and of extending the Kingdom of God on earth.

Men and women are ready for service, although they may not always know what to do and how to proceed.

While the Church is in such a plastic and formative stage it is a matter of life and death importance to help to keep it in the straight and narrow way, especially when it is becoming restlessly active and craving for initiative and responsibility.

Foreign missions in China are the scaffolding and the Church the permanent building. All our policy and work shall be Church-centric rather than mission-centric.

Inpressed Irish Visitor

WILLIAM CORKEY, pastor of the Townsend Street Presbyterian Church, Belfast, Ireland, one of the delegation of Ulster clergymen which has just concluded a speaking tour in the United States, was much impressed with the practical workings of Church Federation in the American cities which he visited.

At a reception tendered the delegation at the New York headquarters of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, Dr. Corkey said:

"I am glad to bear witness to the effectiveness of your federated church work in many of the cities where we have spoken. The manifest spirit of cooperation among the churches and the instant response to the suggestions of their central officers greatly facilitated our approach and gave our message a larger hearing than might otherwise have been possible. I shall certainly commend the federation idea to our Irish churches upon our return."

How Hymns Have Changed

BISHOP Theodore S. Henderson, general superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Detroit Area, who has become associated with the Interchurch World Movement, said at a recent conference that ten years ago one of the favorite hymns was "When the Roll Is Called Up Yonder I'll Be There." Now that hymn has been displaced by "The Son of God Goes Forth to War."

"In other words," said the bishop, "the young people of the present day are singing songs of service. Many of them who are still singing the old song should change it to express the idea that 'When the job of saving the world is on, I'll be here.'"

To Aid Starving Preachers in Hungary

THAT most of the Protestant clergy of Hungary are in dire need of the necessities of life was the statement of John Pelenyi, delegate from the evangelical churches of Hungary, to the Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America at a meeting of that body.

To meet the most urgent needs of many Protestant ministers who have been without salary for a year or more, the Commission voted the immediate forwarding of $25,000, and will send a deputation to Hungary at the earliest possible moment to investigate conditions there.

Mr. Pelenyi reports that there are 4,000,000 Protestants in Hungary, mostly Presbyterians and Lutherans. Their chief strength is in the Transylvania, where their churches have existed from the time of Luther and Calvin.

FIELDS WHITE UNTO THE HARVEST

John 4:35-38

THIS fourth chapter of John's Gospel records Jesus' first conversation with a woman. He was returning to Galilee from Jerusalem shortly after the beginning of His public ministry, realizing that if He stayed in Judea the hatred of the Pharisees would not allow Him to live long enough to give to men the truth He had left His Father's glory to bring to earth for their redemption.

On His way, John tells us, Jesus did not take the road usually traversed by the Jews, but "He must needs pass through Samaria." At noontime He and His disciples came to Jacob's well and, utterly wearied, He sat down to rest while His companions went on into the city of Sychar to buy food.

The noontide sun was burning in its heat and the dust of the roadside had made more wearisome the hard journey and caused an intense thirst. But this physical suffering was as nothing compared to the thoughts that were crowding through the mind of the Master; thoughts of "His Father's House," where it had seemed most fitting that He should begin His public ministry, and which He had found "a place of merchandise and a den of thieves"; thoughts of the Pharisees with their hatred and hypocrisy, and the great, suffering multitudes of the people, scattered as sheep, having no shepherd; thoughts, too, of Nicodemus, whose open allegiance would have meant much to Jesus, but who came to Him "only by night." While the Master sat thus by the well He saw a woman coming down from the city to draw water. He immediately asked her for a drink, and she, recognizing Him as a Jew, questioned why He should ask water from her, a Samaritan woman. Then followed in quick succession, through question and answer, one of the greatest of all the conversations of the Gospels, giving the lesson of the Water of Life, from the greatest of all teachers straight to the mind and heart of a poor, sinful woman. And what was the result, first to the pupil? She was a woman of keen mind, although a sinner, and accepted as truth the word of Jesus that He was the long-expected Messiah and His gift to her of the true Water of Life. So she forgot her water pot and ran back to the city to tell the people, "Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did: can this be the Christ?" One drink of the Water of Life had transformed the sinful woman into a messenger, a missionary for Jesus Christ.

And what was the result to the Teacher? When the disciples returned with bread from the city they marveled that their Master was speaking with a woman, for one of the six things forbidden to a rabbi in that day was that he should speak to one so inferior. But they asked Him no question, only urged Him to eat and were surprised when He said to them, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." They understood Him literally and thought someone had brought Him something to eat, not realizing that Jesus had forgotten His hunger and thirst in the joy of giving a drink of the Water of Life to a woman whose life had been seared and burned with sin.

Then His eyes looked out over the harvest fields shining white with ripened grain and He saw still other great white fields of the souls of the world, waiting for the laborers of the Lord of the harvest. They have waited so long, those whitened fields, while the reapers have tarried. They are waiting today, in India, China, Africa, South America, truly the great harvest fields of the world are overripe.

Jesus asked the woman at the well for a drink of water. We are sure that our hands would have hastened without question to draw for Him the cooling drink! But He is thirsting today, not for the water from the historic well, but for the souls of men.

He has no hands to draw with today excepting human hands and the well is deep. He has no hands with which to reap the white harvest fields but human hands.

Must He be kept waiting, waiting?

Facts for the Busy Woman

Somebody, not without reason, has called Africa "the dark, sobbing continent." Over its nearly ten million square miles, in which the areas of Europe, India, China and Mexico could easily be engulfed, somewhere between 130 and 150 millions of people are scattered.

It is a topsy-turvy mental world in which the native African lives. He explains natural phenomena in terms of the miraculous. His mental processes are simple but irrational.

The great war brought over a million Africans into touch with the Western world. Each one who returns is a messenger either of weal or of woe to his people.

Africa is awakening to the realization of its commercial value. Western nations are linking its peoples and vast resources with their civilizations. The Orient is likewise at work. Islam is especially active and offers a debasing religion, with a measure of civilizing power, to credulous peoples. Christianity—the only religion which really civilizes—is doing far too little to fulfill its mission. If it delays much longer, Islam and materialism will divide Africa between them.

Africa needs the gospel of Jesus Christ to avert this catastrophe. This alone can transform the African's moral nature; set his feet upon the impregnable rock of truth, and order his goings along the path of spiritual achievement.

In the mental labyrinth in which the African still lives we shall probably find the clew to the African himself and come to know him, mind and heart, a little better. Benighted as it is, Africa is not the "Darkest Africa" of the days of Moffatt, Livingstone or even Stanley. Many thousand miles of railroads have been thrust into its interior from every port, and thousands more are being woven together into a network of communication which, spreading over the entire continent, will unite the vast area, bringing its people into a homogeneity undreamed of a half century ago.

Africa has been stirred industrially, politically, socially and to some extent religiously by the world war. A million sons of Africa served as soldiers, laborers and carriers in the great conflict, and this cannot fail to effect some transformation in the lives of the millions untouched by the war.

As a result the Dark Continent is being permeated with knowledge as to the rest of the world. A new consciousness of values, of social relations, of desires and possibilities has been awakened in the native breast. In many ways Islam has seized upon this fact and improved the opportunities offered by the war for an active propaganda. Meanwhile Christianity has done little or nothing.

The Mohammedan religion is for the invader, but not for the invalid. Having once embraced Islam, whatever happens is God's will.

The paramount issue in Central Africa is Islam or Christ. Another crucial problem is whether a material civilization and exploitation of Africa, while the church lags far in the rear, shall be realized, or a Christian development of Africa shall take place, with the church everywhere adequately cooperating with government and commerce.

Modern industry and luxury have created large demands for the raw products of Central Africa. Ivory and forest rubber, for years the leading articles of export, are giving place to plantation rubber, to cocoa, to oil-bearing seeds, to copper, tin, diamonds and gold as articles of export.

Africa has been the great unclothed. Two cat skins or a bit of beaten bark, or a grass-woven apron, seem not so insufficient a covering in the primitive forest-enveloped village. But when emerging into the multiplying "civilized" settlements and joining the swelling industrial army of modern commercialism in Central Africa, the raw pagan himself feels the need of different and more adequate clothing, and Eve's daughter gladly changes the nature of her covering from literal fig or other leaves to the most elaborate outfit the trader's store furnishes. Sad to relate, her body is too often the price she pays for the gay attire.

The "Darkest Africa" of Livingstone's day has been penetrated by steam routes, both rail and water. Wireless messages pass over forest and swamp. The pilot of the aeroplane wings his way over cannibal feasts.

But the Sun of Righteousness has yet to find an entrance for his light into all but a pitifully few hearts.

A greater missionary force for a given unit of numbers of people, is more needed in Africa than in most mission fields. This arises from the backwardness and childhood of the race. While the latent, inherent ability of the people is good and able leaders have arisen among them, yet it will be generations before any appreciable number of dependable leaders such as China enjoys is available in Africa.

Most, and first of all, the African needs relating to God, his Father, the great, good Spirit, who he admits made the world, but who he thinks has withdrawn himself far away and has no further or present contact with or concern for the people on the earth. Only by coming to accept God, creator, and ruler of the world, as one who is mightier than all the evil spirits in which he believes, can the animistic African be freed from the terrors of the world of malignant spirits which have hemmed his life in on every side.

Mr. Hedges wrote from the Congo mission November 3: "The translations of the four Gospels and Acts are now complete, and the committee meets again the first of the year, hoping to finish the rest of the New Testament at that sitting. We are asking for 2,000 copies of the Gospels and Acts to be printed at once for school use and 10,000 copies of the New Testament complete."

The welcome announcement has been received that the long-desired sawmill will be shipped to Africa next week. This was the gift of the church at Ionia, Michigan, and will greatly help our building operations in the Congo mission.

Heroes of the Sudan. Who Are They?

GRAHAM WILMOT BROOKE

TRAVELERS have crossed the Sudan in all directions. They have gone at the risk of their lives. Many of them, like Mungo Park, have died while exploring it. They have left their tracks and traces all over it; but the missionary of the cross has never entered its kingdoms. The Arab has gone there. He has conquered and killed, and boasted of Allah and Mahomet, and multiplied houses and wives and slaves; but the messengers of the cross have shunned the region. Only a handful has dared to enter it. Merchants have gone there; gold seekers have gone; hundreds of each are gathering the riches of the land. There are scores of steamers in the Niger. The Royal Niger Company alone made two hundred treaties with the Niger chiefs and potentates, but the missionary of a Higher Power and a nobler enterprise has not yet won those lands for Jesus Christ. There is just a handful of missionaries on the Lower Congo, but in the Central Sudan, along the Upper Benue, around the vast overflowing waters of Lake Chad, in the mountains of Adamawa, in the plains of Wadai, in the rugged ranges of Darfur, in the deserts of Kordofan, among the teeming millions of the Sudan proper, no missionary is found, no gospel is proclaimed, no Bibles are scattered, no voice is raised to cry, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

The men of the world are the heroes of the Sudan. Travelers have been heroic. Distance has been no bar to them. Disease and death have proved unable to affright them. Neither love of friends nor fear of foes has been able to dissuade them from their fixed resolve to open it to the knowledge of the world, and bring its people into contact with the civilization of surrounding lands. But the heralds of salvation have almost wholly forgotten this mighty heritage, a host of heathen nations. They have left them all these ages to the reign of unmixed darkness and unmitigated depravity.

We plead for the neglected millions of the Sudan. We say to the church of Jesus Christ, "Behold them! They are our brothers and sisters in a common humanity. They are one with us in sin and ruin. Let them be one with us in the knowledge of salvation. Awake, O selfish, sleeping, and forgetful church; arouse thee to thy neglected duties; fulfill thy solemn mission; bear thy testimony and send forth thy sons; proclaim thy glorious message; gird thyself and give thyself, in the name of Jesus Christ, to the tremendous task of evangelizing at last this greatest and most populous of all the wholly neglected and benighted regions on the surface of the globe.

Our Hope Is in the Children

WHAT a familiar phrase! So familiar that it requires a new or unusual setting to grip the hearer. It "gripped" recently when H. A. Baker of Tibet told of the beginnings of a Sunday school in an outstation of Batang.

The avenues through which any conception of God must travel to reach the mature mind of the heathen Tibetan are almost as impassable as the winding, perilous trails of that wild country itself.

"While we reach some of the grown men and women by constant and untiring effort, it is very difficult to discover in their experiences of life a point of contact by which we can reveal to them the love of God. But our hope is in the children. They enjoy the Bible stories just like any other child. They are eager for them. When we win the children we will win Tibet."

The application is obvious. Spend not less time with men and women, but spend more with the children.

Our hope in grappling with the stupendous issues confronting the church lies in the children and not in the adult life of the church except as it assumes the responsibility of training the young for the task.

"I consider it a great privilege to lead the children in their mission studies," writes many a superintendent. To such the "hope of the church" lies in the children.

Is the program of missionary education for the children of your church as complete as it can be made? A six-months' study of China is provided in the material issued for the Sunday schools by the Joint Committee on Missionary Education. The King's Builders, the only missionary magazine of the Disciples of Christ published for the children, is giving until July 1 a definite study of "Our Church in China." The last half of the year will be devoted to studies of work in America.

The Park Christian Church, New Albany, Indiana

THE Park Christian Church was organized May 19, 1835, by forty-three persons, who had withdrawn from the Baptist Church. Thomas J. Murdock was licensed to preach, and D. G. Stewart was chosen as minister for a time. T. J. Wilson is the present pastor.

A brick building was erected in 1836, which with the lot cost $6,000. This building was torn down in 1868, and a more commodious building erected, bringing the value of the property up to approximately $15,000. It was this building which was constructed in 1917, at a cost of $11,200, making the building modern throughout, and one of the best in the city of New Albany, with an estimated valuation of $30,000.

This congregation has passed through many trying experiences, which were sufficient to have discouraged many churches to the point of dissolution, but their faith was such, that a few struggling disciples held on, and now their labors have been rewarded, and their dreams made real. One of the most trying experiences was at the time when the Central Church was formed, the occasion of which in part was the heavy indebtedness upon the church property. A part of the membership were in favor of surrendering the property to the mortgagee, and moving up town and building anew, which they did, but a few members were unwilling to make this move. Following the lead of J. M. Gaston, now of Long Run, Kentucky, those that remained, though weakened numerically and financially, assumed all responsibility of the congregation, and continued to hold services of worship in the mother church. I have been informed that there were those in the membership who mortgaged their homes, and made many other sacrifices to save the church property to the cause of Christ. Their memory should be held sacred to every Disciple. "They have received their reward," "We have entered into their labors," and "Their works do follow them." Mr. Gaston was present on the day of the dedication of the new building (Dec. 23, 1917), his face was radiant with joy, and his words an inspiration and a treasure to all who heard him recite the joys and disappointments of former years.

Three years ago last September we came to this pastorate; at that time there were sixty-three paying members; since that time there has been added to the membership one hundred and eighty-four new members, and the entire church revived. The present membership is four hundred ninety-five. All departments show a vigorous, healthy growth, and are well organized throughout, using the most up-to-date methods. Conversions are frequent, and enduring. The year just closed was the most successful from every standpoint of consideration, of any previous year of the church's history. The average attendance of the Bible school last year was one hundred sixty-eight, and the average offering $7.12. For incidental, benevolent, missionary and other purposes, the congregation raised a little less than $4,000, and this, in spite of the fact that the church has added heavy financial responsibility. The pastor's salary has twice been increased by the voluntary act of the Official Board, one time $200, and at another time $300. Shortly after the new building was dedicated, application was made to the Board of Church Extension for a loan of $7,000, which was readily granted, but before the papers were drawn up, the indebtedness had been reduced to $6,500, so we asked to have the loan reduced to that amount, and when the final papers were returned to the treasurer of the board, $300 accompanied them, reducing the actual indebtedness to $6,200, and I am told that the treasurer of our Board of Trustees is embarrassed again, having something like $100 in hand at the present time. Perhaps the force of these statements will be better understood by making known the fact that the loan was closed about the middle of January this year. It should also be borne in mind that this is an industrial congregation, and that not more than fifteen per cent of the members are the owners of their places of residence.

It will be noticed that the church's largest growth and development has come since the Board of Church Extension consented to indorse the work of the church by a loan sufficient to clear the indebtedness incurred in enlarging, reconstructing and beautifying the church building. I frankly admit that from the beginning, I believed, that when the proper moment had arrived in the success of our work, that the Board of Church Extension would play the role of the big brother. Had I not believed this, and if the Board of Church Extension had not been in existence as an organization making such belief possible, the effort would not have been undertaken by the writer. This of course presents the idea, that our organizations make possible the preachers' best work in the local field, which I believe is absolutely true. Not one, but many churches have been built as a result of this relationship. As Paul said, "How shall they hear without a preacher?" we might say, How shall they meet without a place of meeting? It is true a congregation can meet most enywhere for a time, on the bridge in dry weather, and under it in wet, if necessary, but if they are to continue to exist and develop great redemptive power in the ministrations of the Gospel, they must have a home compatible with the dignity of the cause represented. The Board of Church Extension stands ready to help a worthy church do its best work for the Master. This being true no church of the Disciples of Christ should fail to remember in a large substantial way our beloved Board of Church Extension.

T. J. WILSON.

New Year Afar

DEAR WORLD CALL:

What a gracious service you render. You arrived in your November dress December 29. We were rejoiced! All mails seem astonishingly late. Holiday mails within Japan are so very heavy, perhaps the foreign mail has to wait. Six thousand postals passed through the post office here in one day lately. The New Year cards are used very extensively. Among those received the following may interest you:

"Dear Mrs. Garst! Our Mamma san (Please excuse me thus call):

"I thanks many, many for your kindness. Our church is very small. But we want to see you our work. Please come to us next early spring.

"Merry, Merry Xtmas,
"Happy, Happy Xtmas,
"Yours sincerely,
"_____ _____."

I think you will agree that we started the year 1920 vigorously when I tell you we had three earthquakes January 3. We do not like earthquakes.

We have thought and prayed for the United Board meeting scheduled for December 30, also for the Student Volunteer Conference, probably adjourned last night in Des Moines.

We are with you in the Week of Prayer. God bless you.

LAURA DE LANY GARST.

An Appeal to the Medical Women of America

DR. JOSEPHINE LAWNEY, who left the Pittsburgh Tuberculosis Hospital last fall to devote her life to medicine in China, has sent home the following message "to the Medical Women of America."

"Two months in China, and yet, so much do I feel a part of this great empire with all its new tides and ancient problems that I have no desire to return to America.

"How I wish I might make you feel it all! Some artist with the pen might make you see it, but I would that somehow the needs of the women and girls of China might grip you so that scores of you would turn your footsteps toward the East.

"Some of you are interested in public health work. Perhaps you have already tried to 'break into' some municipal department in America, and perhaps you have been told that if your political friends are of the right sort and you pass a certain set of examinations and get your name on the list of applicants you may hear from the department in the course of a few years. China offers you a virgin field. There is an opening at present for a woman physician with public health training, and the scope of the work would be greater than that covered by the combined departments of public health in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Boston.

"China needs everything that America needs, only more so. Some of you who are students and are undecided as to your specialty and have a leaning toward surgery, will you not take up orthopedic surgery and come out to China just as soon as you are ready? If you could see the little kiddies as I see them day after day, their little bodies horribly distorted with tuberculosis of the spine, you would not need any further appeal. The Chinese apparently have a relatively high resistance to staphylococcic and streptococcic infections, but a very low resistance to tuberculous infections. I have yet to learn of a single orthopedic surgeon in China, and yet the women's hospitals draw the largest number of children as patients. It would not be at all a wild conjecture to assure our pioneer in this field that she would have cases brought from all over a large province and even neighboring provinces.

"The need of general surgeon is no less great. The efficiency of many a woman's hospital is diminished because the doctor in charge has not had sufficient surgical experience before coming out to undertake single handed the work of a general hospital. I hope the day is not far distant when two doctors at least may be sent to every mission hospital—one for surgery and one for general medical work.

"The needs come tumbling over each other in mind! That heart of the hospital, the laboratory, has been sadly underdeveloped in mission work because of the lack of workers. Women trained in pathology and bacteriology and serology are needed so much that I do not know how to express the need. We must have specialists in these lines, else our medical work will continue to go around in circles. I can count on the fingers of one hand the hospitals in China that are doing Wassermann reactions. Those of you who have a penchant for research work have all the opportunity in the world to have a micro-organism or a parasite named after you as the discoverer.

"Many a hospital has received or has been offered a special gift of an X-ray outfit—but you know it is about as useful as a fifth wheel without a roentgenologist. One such thoroughly trained worker in each of the large cities would take care of the needs of a group of hospitals and further the advance of medical science in China perhaps more than any other one agency.

"There is a fine new medical school for Chinese women which will be ready for a complete staff very soon. It will be the most attractive teaching opportunity for medical women in the entire Orient. Many in America are already looking forward to this opportunity. Only the best prepared people for the various departments will be chosen. Perhaps you are one of them.

"I know why some of you are not coming, because I have so recently been up against the same reasons. My! But they look insignificant now. Professor Palmer once wrote that Harvard College paid him for doing what he would gladly pay it for allowing him to do. That describes very well the compensation of the missionary, measured by the inner outgo and not by the external income.

"Many of you feel that you haven't the courage to face the years away from your home friends. One forgets in looking ahead that there are always fine, strong comrades going the same way, and if this is true anywhere it is true in the mission field. I've resolved not to preach, but to give you the facts, and ask you to picture to yourself the need, and then decide as to your share in the work."

Tin Cans Their China

A BIT of ingenuity often goes a long way in satisfying a need, as the people of Montenegro have discovered. With their chinaware destroyed or carried away during the war, a popular substitute has been found in the American jam tins saved from the Red Cross food distribution. The ragged edges of these little cans are pounded smooth, and a handle of wire or tin is attached. Thus an indestructible cup is made.

Twentieth Century Feudalism

A BREATH of the Middle Ages has reached Poland. There was no transaction of money in those early days, and in the twentieth century, the same idea has been reverted to. Today payment is made in potatoes. In certain remote agricultural parts of Poland, potatoes are now being used as the standard currency. They are the staple article of food, and their value fluctuates far less than any of the various types of paper money which are in circulation.

For example, in the vicinity about Grodno, when the war ended, and the financial status of Poland was at a crisis, hundreds of people flocked to the American Red Cross centers, begging for work or food. There was no money for payments, but there were many bushels of potatoes held in the possession of a few wealthy landowners. These the Red Cross bought, and in turn paid, as a weekly wage, to the laborers employed in warehousing or in the activities of the field units. About twenty pounds of potatoes are regarded as a fair weekly wage for an ordinary laborer.

The story of one of Grodno's largest landowners has a very sharp flavor of a medieval business transaction with a twentieth century setting. His manor house was wrecked during the war, and later the mansion was entirely refurnished with articles purchased solely with potato-money. This involved a series of purchases from local merchants, the most important being a complete set of drawing room furniture which cost 12,000 potatoes. The landowner, a count and head of one of the oldest families of the Polish nobility, harvested the greater part of his potato crop with his own hands.

A Plea for Common Honesty

THE other day in one of the state conferences of our people with regard to the Interchurch World Movement, a woman from a small town came to one of the secretaries and handed him a check for $50 for foreign missions, given personally by her and her husband. She remarked, "I do not wish you to credit this to the church, but to us direct. I am discouraged with our church. The treasurer announced that $250 was raised for missions by the congregation last year and in the Year Book only $30 appears as having been sent in for all missionary purposes. Money in our church is being deflected to other purposes, and my gifts have not been sent to the causes for which I have given them. It has caused me to lose confidence in the missionary program and leadership of our local congregation."

Every now and then something like this occurs, indicating that some church treasurers are not handling the missionary money of the congregation as they should. There is no more sacred trust in the local congregation than that reposed in the treasurer who receives the money dedicated to certain purposes. It should go to the causes for which it was given without a single variation, and the treasurer who does not keep faith with the church members in this regard is not only losing the confidence of the people who give, but is striking a death blow at the missionary and spiritual interest of the congregation. The majority of people who discover that something has gone wrong do not do as this good lady did, send in their money direct, but they lose interest in the missionary causes and straightway refuse to give for these sacred interests.

Building Up the Bible School Attendance

By Hazel A. Lewis

HOW many of the 41,470 pupils lost from our Bible schools last year are in your neighborhood? It is impossible to evade this matter, because the reports are gathered in such a manner that the distribution of the loss can be plainly seen. The greatest value of the total figures in any table of statistics is often lost, because when we begin to look at things in this large way, we at once think that the conditions are somewhere else.

And then we can always explain things so glibly! The loss last year was even greater than this, and of course we could lay that to the epidemic. What would we ever have done without the epidemic to blame for everything that happened? The plain fact of the matter is, that this total loss in Bible school membership is made up of hundreds of cases of community indifference, poor school administration and individual carelessness on the part of Bible school teachers and officers.

Miles and miles of Bible school records have been kept, but very little use has ever been made of them. Meaningless reports are read each Sunday, they accumulate in the desk or office of the secretary, and that is about as far as the matter ever goes. It is true that some schools have definite plans for looking after absentees, but these are very often too mechanical. A printed card that needs only the address and postage stamp, is better than no effort at all to locate absent pupils, but as an indication of the temperature of the school, it certainly would not register more than lukewarm.

We must get down to cases. Where is James W——? He was in our school at least part of the time last year. And what has become of those two girls who used to come from away over on K—— street? We heard that they were going to another Bible school. And there was that class of nine boys that was promoted out of the junior department!

MISS FLORENCE CARMICHAEL
New Elementary Superintendent for the Central District

Where in the world are they? Only three or four are ever present and these are not the same ones each Sunday. One of them caddies at the Golf Club and another runs errands for a florist so late on Saturday night that his mother can't get him up the next morning. And so it goes. There ought to be an encyclopedia of Bible school explanations, carefully indexed for easy reference!

We must care, and that intensely. We can work out theories and plans of organization when we are dealing with things in the mass, but we do not really care in a deep personal sense until we are dealing with individuals. Back of the whole matter is the general attitude of the group of workers in any local Bible school. It is all very well to have a system by which the enrollment of the school is kept clear, by dropping from the active list those who have not been present for two months, provided that school has a conscience that is in full and active operation and makes the dropping of any name the result of careful investigation and the cause of real grief.

Look around in any community on any Sunday morning and see the groups of children that are not in Bible school. One church that has a real community conscience, sent out a committee from its Bible school on several Sunday mornings for a half hour before the Bible school session and on the first Sunday they found twenty boys and girls who did not go to any Bible school, but who did not have any real reason for not doing so. We of course can talk about the responsibility of the home, and the adults who set a bad example and many other similar explanations. But if for the space of one year we would never once indulge in the comforting but dangerous business of explaining things, and would start in to deal with individual cases of irregular attendance and with the problems of non-attendance, we would greatly increase the active enrollment of our Bible schools.

A Bible school noted for its high educational and spiritual ideals, has for many years followed the plan by which the teacher gets in personal touch with the home the first Sunday the pupil is absent; the department superintendent calls if the pupil is absent two Sundays, a general officer of the school or the pastor calls after an absence of three Sundays. If these do not get results, the case is brought before the next meeting of the Workers' Conference and an effort is made to find in the counsel of many minds a solution to the difficulty. Of course, if the first effort of the teacher reveals the fact that the pupil is ill, perhaps with a contagious disease, and will probably be absent for a certain number of weeks, arrangements are made to send the Bible school papers into the home and a record is made of the probable date of the pupil's return, thus making it unnecessary for the other officers to follow up the visit. Our greatest mistake is in not following up individual cases of absence quickly enough and in failing to keep the contact between pupil and school sufficiently vital.

Remember that the 41,470 are made up of individual losses and that your school has had its share in this.

American Mayflower Council, Headed by Wilson and Taft Plans Nation-Wide Celebration

PLANS for the celebration in this country of the tercentenary of the landing of the Mayflower has just been announced by the American Mayflower Council, and include seventy mass meetings in seventy cities, the observance of Mayflower week November 21-29 (Thanksgiving week), with Mayflower Sunday November 21, concluding with a national mass meeting in Madison Square Garden, New York, on Monday, November 28, to which representative citizens from all over the country and from abroad will be invited.

The object of the Mayflower Council's program is to make known to the whole nation the story of the Pilgrims and the deeper meanings of the movement of which they were a part: to emphasize the spiritual significance of their coming to the new world and to interpret their ideals in terms of democracy, thus making the spirit of the Pilgrims the basis of an appeal to heroism and consecration in meeting the problems of today.

The American Mayflower Council, which it is hoped may co-ordinate the programs and proposals of the various committees and commissions that are planning celebrations, has been set up by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, but is broadly representative of all the constructive elements in American life. The Council will endeavor to secure the cooperation of Boards of Education, directors of schools and colleges and of patriotic organizations in the staging of pageants and programs.

President Woodrow Wilson and Hon. William H. Taft are the honorary chairmen of the Council; Dr. Henry van Dyke is honorary secretary. The chairman is President Henry Churchill King of Oberlin College. Vice-Presidents have been chosen representing all sections of the United States and Canada.

Four New Bible School Field Workers

IT is a pleasure to introduce four new Bible school field workers. Two of them have been in field service in other important positions for the brotherhood, but two of them are entirely new to us. All four are now at work and are being heartily received by the Bible schools they seek to serve.

John D. Zimmerman succeeds David H. Owen as Bible School Superintendent in Kansas. He is a native of Kansas and announces that when work calls him out of the state, he always hurries back. For the past two years he has served as the Secretary of the National Board of Christian Endeavor.

John Stuart Mill becomes the Missouri Regional Bible School Superintendent. For several years he has served as Superintendent of the Second District in Missouri. During this time he has been called upon frequently by the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society to special work outside the state. The past two summers were spent in Canada in this way. Mr. Mill is a native of Australia but has been so long in Missouri that he has become thoroughly identified with the interests in this, our strongest Bible school state.

George T. Simons becomes Associate Superintendent in Kentucky. He will serve with Lin D. Cartwright, who has made such commendable progress in the Bible school affairs of Kentucky during the past two years. Roy K. Roadruck, who formerly served as Associate Superintendent in Kentucky, discovered Mr. Simons in Twin Falls, Idaho, where he was doing a most commendable work with W. A. Moore. Mr. Roadruck says "Mr. Simons was held in the highest esteem not only by our own church people, but by the community in general. Kentucky is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of this fine man."

Miss Florence Carmichael becomes Elementary Superintendent for the Central District serving with Garry L. Cook and Roy N. Cloyd. She will also give some time for special field service outside of her district work. J. Boyd Jones of Bloomington, Indiana, says, "For eight years she has been the superintendent of the Primary Department of our Bible School. She has gathered about her a corps of workers until today she has one of the most efficient departments I have ever seen. Our loss will mean a large gain to the Bible schools of the brotherhood."

We are sure the Bible school forces everywhere will rejoice in the addition of these fine workers to our staff in their respective fields.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS,
Cincinnati, Ohio. Bible School Secretary.

G. P. Rossman, recently located in Alexandria, Louisiana, writes thus of the situation there: "It is going to take a great deal of hard work to build this church up to fill the place it should occupy in the community. But we are determined to win through concentrating on a strong evangelistic campaign. I have organized a workers' conference, that meets every week in the parsonage. The "Each One Win One" campaign is gathering momentum and there are numbers of additions in sight. Influenza is here now and greatly cuts down our attendance. But we are bound for success. Better reports to follow."

Echoes from the Rockies

By CHARLES LEMUEL DEAN

THERE are in this large territory of the Rocky Mountain District one hundred and twenty-seven churches; not as many as there are in some state districts in the east. A membership of 15,361. When we remember that it covers Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico-West Texas, Utah, and Nevada, we are able to realize that the field is limitless. It is only that we might have the men, means and consecration to occupy the land!

Many counties are asking for county pastors. This means that a new type of worker must be developed to cover the whole country, with headquarters in the county seat. Our rural fields are hungering for development. For illustrations of what can be done in this work, one only needs to look at Clifton, where Clark Bower has been for nine years, easily the leader in his district, and the outstanding man in our brotherhood on rural work. Also the fine church at Severance, led by Gilbert C. Counts.

Religious education has always been the work of C. W. Dean in this district, and now, as he has laid down the work, let me say a word of appreciation for his fine service in the field. No church can be a true church without having a well-developed department of religious education. Here is one of the strategic points that must ever be given more and more attention in the life of our childhood.

We need to learn anew the command of our Lord, "Make disciples." Could we in each of our present churches have this as our supreme goal we could take our place and do our part in this region. In all our churches we are hoping that this will be done with a zeal that will reach a goal set by our "Win One Campaign."

Beside the common battles that the faithful must fight in every land we have the Mormon on the West, the Roman Catholic on the South, the pioneer on the North, and denominationalism in the East. But a new day is here and the 500 pastors in attendance at the Interchurch Conference will see to it that the church of our Christ has a chance in this state. Thirty-two of our forty pastors were in attendance.

Another piece of work we are going to do is to enlarge our Colorado Christian Home, the only home for the orphan among Protestants in Denver. We will be in the field with the Interchurch Financial Campaign for $100,000 for this home. We had to refuse admission to nearly 200 children last year.

We look with faith and hope toward the future, the new day, praying God to show us His will, and for strength and vision to enter the open door and bring His will to a glorious realization.

Broadway Church, Denver, Colorado.

Our Ann Arbor Bible Chair

THE Upper Room Bible Class held its anniversary meeting last night, marking the sixth year of its existence. It has gone its way quietly, gradually but surely extending its wholesome influence, till at present its members number nearly five hundred students; the evidence of its growth, and the students' receptivity can be seen in the fact that it has outgrown its old quarters, and will soon be housed in a new building. The time has come when it is a factor to be reckoned with in University life; yet it began six years ago with only thirty-six members.

What it has accomplished it owes to the generous efforts of its founder, Dr. Thomas M. Iden. And the thanks due him from the students of the University can best be expressed on this occasion, marking as it does a result of which he can be justly proud. The spirit of helpful comradeship, which he has extended to the members of his class has successfully combated the unreasonable prejudice which deprives so many of its valuable inspiration.

Chas. W. Ross, Winnipeg, Manitoba, is encouraged over the bright prospects in that field. He says, "We are in the midst of a campaign of personal evangelism which will culminate in the Easter week of prayer. We are planning to have services every evening of the week preceding Easter Sunday. Through the Interchurch survey I have gotten in touch with the names of several new families of Disciples of Christ."

The Immediacy of the Russian Task

By Karl Borders

WE have been so ardently and frequently assured that because of the war the world can never be the same old world again that there is grave danger that with a sublime, blind faith we shall supinely wait for the metamorphosis, firm in the expectation that one fine morning we shall awake to find a smiling, contented Christian world. It is true that the world will never be the same again. The processes of eternal change have been accelerated and latent forces loosed which like an avalanche are sweeping across the world. But these movements are advancing by no miraculous dynamic. The same age-old principles are working with freer hand among men who live and work and think in essential likeness to their fathers.

And if these new manifestations of democracy and liberation are to be made Christian; if, whatever political shape man's relations take, we are to have them formed in the spirit of Christ, then this too must come about not by a miracle, but by work, service, the impact of life upon life and ideal upon ideal. Americanism cannot be legislated upon men, nor can Christianity come by fiat of great councils. Both must be translated into life through life.

In no field is the need of this approach more evident than in our work among foreigners in our land. The organizations which have most notably succeeded in interpreting American ideals to these groups have been not agencies of the government as such, but those institutions of religious and social purposes which have been built in the foreign neighborhoods and have there sent their workers to live among the people that they might know and understand and, therefore, love them. It is significant to note in this connection that almost without exception the directors and workers of settlements and foreign work of all kinds, in short, those who know the situation best, have deeply deplored the recent actions of the government in its dealings with the so-called Reds and radicals. And deplored it not because of a lack of patriotism, but because they had acquired an informed and sympathetic Americanism as contrasted with the blatant, flag-waving type.

There is but one institution which, with no ulterior motives, can take the whole of America's best to the newcomers within our gates, and that is the Church. The director of the largest institutional church in Chicago when asked about their plan of Americanization replied that if the people were Christianized, Americanization would take care of itself. Surely any process of Americanization which fails to contribute, as fundamental, the principles of America's free Christianity, will fall far short of producing the ideal citizen for a country born of such principles.

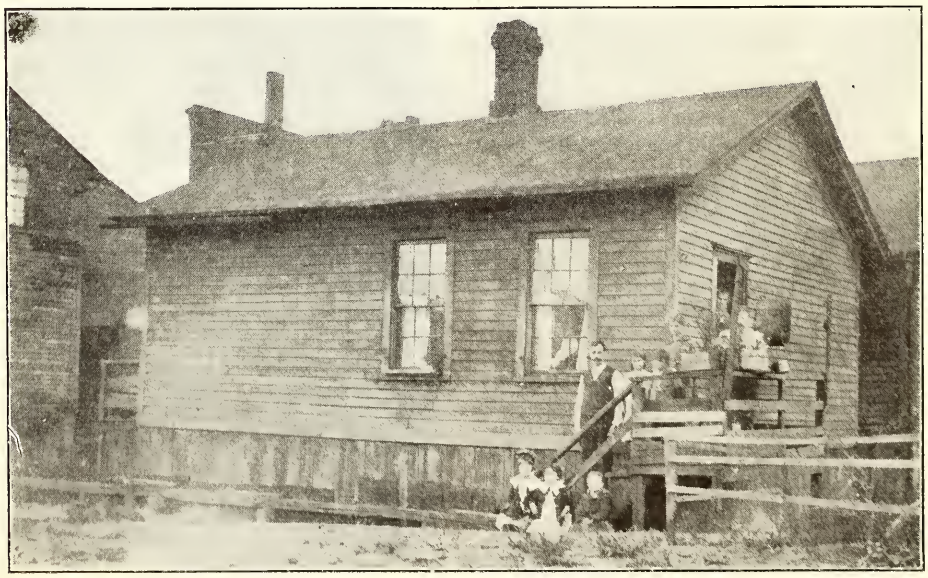
This problem of Christian Americanization has ever been with us, but the immediacy of its needs have never been greater than conditions growing out of the recent convulsions of war have made it. And perhaps there is no group in more urgent need that true Americanism be interpreted to them than the Russians whom we have undertaken to serve. Just prior to the war Russia was beginning to furnish the largest percentage of our immigration. Now it is rare to find one of them who does not express a determination to return to that new land emerging, through blood, to a new birth of liberty. The reasons for this are more than one, but one to be reckoned with is a disappointment in America, as her spirit has been revealed in a misguided patriotism. When men are arrested without warrant, torn from their families and sent to jail, when the stigma of meaningless names is fastened upon a whole group, and in free Americea men must be careful of their speech, there is little wonder that the name of America should cease to be synonymous with all it has stood for in the hearts of those who in faith came to us.

I sat for an hour and a half in a little restaurant on Halsted Street not long ago and talked with a young Russian Jew and a young lady who accompanied him. "You do not know," he said, "what it means to one coming from Russia to America. You do not appreciate liberty because you have always had it. When I first saw and heard men freely speaking from their hearts on the street corners of New York," he continued, "I almost jumped for joy at knowing that I was in a free country. But now—."

It is against the reaction resulting from such conditions that we are called to work. A feeling of suspicion and resentment has been aroused which will require years of devoted sympathetic ministry to allay. And yet there is a certainty in the minds of the observant Russians that such treatment as that to which they have been subjected is not representative of the best nor the most of America. For where there have been heartless laws to tear men from their families there have been tender ministering agents of the people outside the machinery of government to care for the bereaved families, and those Americans who have known them best and in whom they have trusted have staunchly befriended them in their trials.

To make this interpretative ministry still more effective, more institutions should be established where sympathetic contacts may be made. At the end of the conversation in the restaurant the young lady who had said little, but listened most intelligently, said to me, "This conversation has meant much to us, for it is not often that we find an American who will talk to us as you have done." But what I had done was no more than any Christian American should be willing to do—speak earnestly his own convictions, listen respectfully and open-mindedly to their ideals and through it all seek to be brotherly. And no greater advance toward understanding can be made than through institutions which shall stand as incarnate witness of our willingness to do just this thing.

We invite the foreigner to our shores with all the allurements of liberty, prosperity, and happiness for which our fame has gone forth. And when he comes we compel him to live in the meanest, dirtiest part of our great cities, surrounded with every form of vice imaginable and are shocked, outraged and ready to do violence when he has not grown to the stature of full American manhood.



This Two-Room House Is Occupied by Two Russian Families that Number Ten People

Boys' Social Center, Russian District, Chicago

The shame and sin is upon us that we have closed our eyes to things as they are and have weltered in a sentimental slough of satisfied patriotism gleaned from our common school histories and the oratorical flights of our aspirants for office.

The first duty of the Christian and the citizen is to know, and the second, without which the first is sin, is to act.

In Chicago alone there are thirty thousand Russians for whose welfare our people have assumed responsibility. Of that number it is safe to say that not more than one-sixth are vitally affiliated with any church whatever. Their faith in the old forms of Christian experience is gone. Their faith in America in thousands of cases is shattered. Far too many live in houses unfit for human beings to occupy. The majority of them are adult men, homeless and often unable to even read in their own language. Even the saloon with its warmth and doubtful companionship is gone or going and there are few decent places left for them to go for an evening.

Our brother, John Johnson, who has come recently from New York to Chicago, ministers to the only organized evangelical group among these Russians in the city. We are negotiating for a beautiful and adequate place of worship for them. They have caught the spirit of true Americanism. But what of these other thousands whose only religion is radicalism, whose most present idea of America is repression.

Perhaps no greater contribution could be made to the welfare of this great body of men than a clubhouse where they might find decent recreation, night classes and lectures in their own language, under the supervision of both American and Russian men, with sympathy, understanding and helpfulness.

Whatever is done must be done quickly. Thousands may soon return to the homeland, and in them lie the potentialities of apostles or apostates in that new Russia. And those who remain will in a few years be loyal, enlightened citizens or remain a suspicious, sullen group who stay because they cannot leave or for the sake of gain only. The answer in a large and responsible measure lies with us and it must be made at once. A year or two years hence will be too late. The tide in the affairs of the Russians is at its flood.

Appeal for Food Relief to Europe Renewed by Federal Council

IN a telegram to Joseph W. Fordney, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, Charles S. McFarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, renewed the appeal for the immediate passing of the measure appropriating $50,000,000 for the relief of the starving population of various European countries.

The text of the telegram was as follows:

"The imminent death by starvation of tens of thousands in Europe constitutes as great a challenge to America as the war itself. We cannot refuse their call for aid without stultifying ourselves before European nations already impatient over our long delay in acting upon the Peace Treaty. The permanent policy of aiding rehabilitation in devastated countries of Europe through regular commercial undertakings will be in no way affected by granting credit for purposes of immediate relief to starving people. Pursuant to the action of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, I urge that favorable action be taken on the bill now before your committee appropriating fifty million dollars from funds remaining with the Grain Corporation to be used as recommended by Mr. Hoover for European relief."

In commenting on this action, Dr. Macfarland stated that he had seldom seen such unanimity of sentiment in regard to any public measure as American church leaders are showing in backing up the recent appeal of the Federal Council on behalf of this relief appropriation.

"The Gospel According to the Telephone Book"

IN an idle moment, some day, pick up your telephone book and turn to the classified supplement at the back. With paper and pencil make note of the number of men physicians listed, of women physicians, of dentists, of nurses, of hospitals, of free clinics, of drug stores. Then compare your home town with the entire non-Christian world, and ask yourself if we have not been unbusinesslike in our Christianity, when one city, like New York, has more doctors than all the Orient, as these figures show:

New York City has 8,241 doctors.

The United States and Canada have sent 1,011 doctors to mission fields.

New York City has 8,021 graduate nurses.

The United States and Canada have sent 130 graduate nurses to mission fields.

For 100,000,000 women in India who dare not consult a man physician—159 women doctors.

For 200,000,000 women in China—93 women doctors.

For 50,000,000 women in Africa—15 women doctors.

"We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." (Romans 15:1.)

A Missionary Imperative

By George W. Brewster

"CALIFORNIA" is a name possessing an irresistible lure. With magic power it draws men from the remotest sections of the world. "There's a reason." Here is a land into which Nature has poured her rarest treasures with bewildering prodigality.

The mighty Pacific dashes against a thousand miles of coast line, across which the imagination leaps to the distant Orient, where the most complex problems of world civilization and evangelization must be wrought out within the next swift-flying decade. Turning from this one beholds the high Sierras, whose towering summit peaks are crowned with eternal snows. From the secret recesses of these incomparable mountains vast wealth in precious metals is being extracted, while their melting snows, impounded in giant, man-made lakes, make the valleys to blossom like the rose, while they provide the energy to drive the throbbing motors of ever-increasing industrial centers, and then turn night into day by transforming streets of city and hamlet into pathways of gold.

But one thing is needful to make it a veritable paradise—and that is the gospel of our risen Lord. Before its possibilities can be truly realized it must be evangelized. The dross of materialism must be transformed into spiritual gold. Here in this land that overflows with milk and honey there is being waged a ceaseless battle with forces which threaten to eat up the inhabitants thereof. With their simple, direct and forceful interpretation of the simplicities of New Testament Christianity, the Disciples of Christ, are pre-eminently qualified to lead out in this life-and-death struggle for the supremacy of Christ and His Church. The situation presents a tremendous challenge and an incomparable opportunity.

California is divided into 59 counties; 49 of them are found in California North, with two-thirds of the state's population. Twenty of these counties have no church voicing our historic plea for the unity of Christ's people. There are a hundred towns and cities with a population of one thousand and more, where we have no representation. During the past fifteen years people have flocked into our section in great numbers, but our churches have diminished from ninety to seventy-five, and our membership from 15,000 to 11,000. These figures are startling. What is the explanation?

It must be remembered that this is a frontier state, therefore of necessity advancing much faster along material lines of growth than spiritual. The state has a foreign population of from 35 per cent to 50 per cent; in some sections the foreign birth rate greatly exceeding the American. The Catholic church is strongly fortified and wields a mighty influence in educational and governmental affairs. In San Francisco it is estimated that but 3 per cent of the population is identified with the Protestant churches, while 30 per cent are with the Catholic church. While the city has doubled in population in the past twenty years the Protestant churches have virtually stood still. In San Francisco we have two churches with about one in every 1,700 people identified with our cause, and in the East-Bay section about one in 500. The Metropolitan area of San Francisco, covering what is known as the Bay District, contains a population of about 1,250,000, and in this area we have around 1,700 members, or one in 700 connected with our people. This condition has come to pass because of lack of organization among our churches of California North and the further fact that our great brotherhood did not come to our assistance with the outstretched helping hand. The struggle was too great and many of our churches had to die.

Now a brighter day has dawned. Our California North brotherhood is organized with a determination and unity such as it has never had before, and with the vital assistance of the American Christian Missionary Society, is aggressively facing the situation. Financial assistance has been given during the past six months to 35 per cent of our churches. One field abandoned nine years ago has been re-entered and a church with 100 members organized, three new churches being organized during the year. In the San Francisco Bay District, out of eleven churches, six are receiving missionary help—the First, San Francisco, Alameda, Elmhurst (Greater Oakland), South Berkeley, Brentwood and Vallejo. The American Christian Missionary Society has assumed the responsibility for this District, with an inspiring five-year program of stabilization and expansion. They should be given unstinted help for the furtherance of their plans. These churches are all putting forth heroic efforts.

The First Church, San Francisco, W. P. Bently, minister, is gaining in both number and vision, with a completeness of organization, program and vision, unexcelled anywhere. The First Church in Alameda, with W. B. Higgins as leader, is laying big plans for the future. Wm. C. Jones just completed a most successful pastorate with this church, during which its Bible school trebled in attendance, its church audience quadrupled, its financial strength doubled and its membership largely increased. This church has the distinction of working in an industrial city, increasing with astonishing rapidity, and in a section of that city where there are 25,000 people and no other church. In Oakland, at Elmhurst, a group of our people, with J. A. Shoptaugh as leader, under the joint direction of the First Christian Church of Oakland and the State Board, are forming our third church in Greater Oakland, a city with a population of 225,000 and showing a net gain of 100,000 people in ten years. Our South Berkeley church, Cedric Price, minister, is ministering to a city that shelters the largest college in the world. The church feels keenly its responsibility and is making remarkable strides toward reaching the entire city of Berkeley, as a church loyal to the principles of our brotherhood and built upon New Testament Christianity. A recent letter from one pastor contains this statement: "This all-important work would long ago have gone into decay and the doors of our edifice have been closed and our brotherhood would be unrepresented in this great field had it not been for the help this congregation has received in the past and is now receiving from our Missionary Boards."

May our big-hearted, wide-visioned and loyal brotherhood heed this "missionary imperative!" Now is the day of opportunity in California North—tomorrow will be everlastingly too late!

Wanderland—Wonderland

The Snuggest Cradle of All

By HAZEL A. LEWIS

THERE are all kinds of cradles all over the world! Mothers everywhere find snug little places for the baby, and there is none that is any cozier than the basket that the little Indian papoose sleeps in—and stays awake in, too. It is long and round and warm, like the nest that old mother caterpillar spins for herself when she is ready to go to sleep for the winter, and fastens her cocoon on the side of a tree or under a bush. But the Indian basket is much more beautiful than this. Sometimes it is made of soft deerskin and is lined with the fur of little animals. Often there are beautiful beads woven into the outside of it and it is hard to tell which is brighter, the colors on the outside, or the shining eyes in the little brown face that is peeping from the inside.

The back or bottom of this strange cradle is a board. My! Someone will surely say that it is cruel to fasten a little baby to a board. But this is a great deal better for a baby than to sit all humped over, or to be carried all day until its poor little back is tired. Perhaps the board in the little papoose's cradle is the reason why nearly all Indians are so straight. Sometimes the basket is woven so that there is a top part, like a hood, that shades the baby's eyes.

But cradles are supposed to rock, and this one does not look as though it could. It does sometimes, though. When the little papoose's mother takes him with her when she goes to gather roots and herbs, or to look after the growing corn, she fastens this snug little cradle basket on a wild grapevine or the strong limb of a tree and soon it is rocking gently in the soft wind that blows through the forest. This motion sets the beads to dancing in front of his bright eyes. There are many wonderful things to be seen, but the sun is warm and the wind is crooning a lullaby. Before long the dark eyes have closed, and the little papoose is fast asleep.

The United States Government has set aside places that are called "Reservations," and in these the different Indian tribes make their homes. Many of them live in houses and some of them are good farmers. A few of them become very rich, and in the towns near the great Indian reservations of the northwest, you may sometimes see a whole Indian family in an automobile. One day a man from the east stopped at the side of a street as he saw a great big touring car come nearby, having in it an Indian family. "Well," he said, "that is a long way from blanket days!" But when the car came near enough that he could see the people who were in the back seat, there was the mother with a beautiful Indian blanket about her shoulders and a bright-eyed papoose in his little basket cradle! The Indian likes the ways that are new, but he is wise enough to keep the old ways that are comfortable and best, especially for the baby.

Of all the cradles in the world there is none that would seem quite so good to the little brown papoose, as his own little basket with a board in the back of it.

All Things to All People

By Bertha Merrill

To be all things to all people is the task of the Community Worker in our large cosmopolitan cities.

A stranger, a young Italian, dropped into our Community House to hear our night program because a countryman was to sing. After the program was over the people were escorted through the building to see the facilities for the work and to be impressed that it was theirs. The stranger, quite curious to know the aim or purpose of the house, asked the Italian singer to tell him. The latter, realizing keenly the Italian nature, replied: "It is to teach the girls how to sew and cook and to be better homemakers, and to bring the boys in from the street and teach them something useful. We work so hard and are so busy we have no time to teach our children what they ought to know. Here they take the time to do so."

We cannot realize the temptations of these boys. There are dangers from the gangs that infest the streets. With fruit and candy displayed everywhere, and only cigar boxes serving as cash drawers, the street itself is full of temptations.

Three of the boys went with us to church one Sunday morning to see what the church was like. One of the teachers thought that it would be better to take them into the children's meeting downstairs rather than the preaching services upstairs. They were having a stereopticon address in the children's meeting. One of the boys said, "Gee, a show! Is that why you come to church every Sunday?"

They maintained a very critical attitude throughout the meeting and on the way out one said: "All the fellows around here are Susies." When asked what kind of fellows these were he replied: "Oh, fellows that play and act like girls. We are real fellows. We fight and kill people."

They do have a terrible propensity to fight, and quickly resort to the fist to assert their power or vindicate their rights. In Chicago, just a block from the Center a gang of boys was organized under pain of death, to steal, plunder and debauch.

Imagine the struggle of these people for existence. They live close to actual want all the time and are continually haunted by the fear of unemployment through strikes, sickness or slack seasons.

Their system of markets and marketing is very interesting to Americans. Each merchantman or woman has a stall or push cart as his market place. Thereby, with the elimination of rents, light, delivery and clerks, they can sell on a closer margin and dispose of their fruits, vegetables and wares, which include everything from live poultry to full dress apparel, for about half the usual price. By such means merchandise is put within the reach of these people. I discovered that I could not buy buttermilk or sweet milk at many of the shops unless I had a bucket or bottle to carry it away in. The other day I learned the same regarding oysters.

Cigar boxes serve as cash drawers for these thrifty merchants with possibly a wrapper from an orange or a grapefruit as the only cover. Is there wonder that the temptation proves too great for the boys and girls whose only playground is in the street, and that many of them suffer the fate of Rosie? As the children said, "She was put away because she crooked things all the time." Rosie was just a little girl six years old, and in a correctional institution because of the temptation of the street.

The boy or girl who comes through safely and resists such temptation is certainly worth while. However, is it not better to try to give them some moral environment in such a place as the Disciples' Community House in New York's Lower East Side and implant a moral stamina that makes resistance easier? Why all the tragedy of so many being lost that might be saved? The growing, formative years must be safeguarded.

Many of us do not know the temptation that comes because the body is starved. Seventy-three per cent of the children in one of the public schools on our Lower East Side were found to be undernourished. When you see the pathetic gratitude of the children for a party—a cup of cocoa and a cookie, or a dish of ice cream—you wish that you might be a fairy godmother to give them parties and food until they wanted no more.

Yet they so willingly give their mite that they make us ashamed. They had been shown through the House on "Open House" night and had been served with tea, coffee or cocoa in the kitchen. They then enjoyed a fruit and nut bowl in the center of the dining room table. One widow, as she was leaving, gave a quarter that she said she wanted to go for the poor.

Correspondence Bible Study in Korea

No less than 1,200 have taken the Correspondence Bible Course in Korea during the past season. This work has centered in Pyengyang and has been under the able direction of W. L. Swallen. The students are residents of all parts of Korea. The missionaries itinerate through the remote districts and the Christians become eager for an intensive study of the Word. The Correspondence Course helps to meet their desires. The Men's Bible Institute of Pyengyang gave 99 bright young men six weeks of intensive Bible study during the winter.

The Ancient Samaritan Pentateuch Draped in Mourning

The Samaritan Pentateuch is one of the most ancient manuscripts in existence and is treasured above everything by the remnant of the Samaritan Colony at Shechem in Palestine. When the Samaritans learned of the death of their beloved and very helpful friend, Edward K. Warren of Three Oaks, Michigan, past president of the World's Sunday School Association, they draped their synagogue at Shechem in black and wore mourning for a month. Most impressive of all was the fact that the very ancient Samaritan Pentateuch was also draped in black for the same length of time. Mr. Warren had visited the Samaritans at the time when the World's Sunday School Convention was held in Jerusalem in 1904. Since then he had been their constant friend and had helped the "remnant" on many occasions. A Samaritan committee had been appointed by the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association and Mr. Warren was the chairman of that committee.

The Shanghai Women's Mission Conference

By ELSIE McCORMICK

Interchurch Correspondent with the Women's Deputation to the Far East

THE desire to do big things in a big way, to see beyond the boundaries of mission or denomination, marked the conference held here January 2 to 8 by prominent American and Chinese women under the auspices of the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions of North America. The spirit of enlightened service which inspired the calling of the meeting remained its guiding force and made its findings unique in the history of women's missions to the Far East.

"It is safe to say that from an educational standpoint the present conference is the most important meeting that has thus far been held in Shanghai," said a leading secular newspaper. The seven commissions, making up the Women's Deputation from the United States, were led by women of national distinction, while delegates from China included some of the most conspicuously successful women on the mission field.

At the head of the Collegiate Education Commission was President Ellen F. Pendleton of Wellesley College; leading the Secondary Education Commission was Miss Charlotte Conant, principal of Walnut Hill School, Natick, Massachusetts, an authority on educational questions, while Dr. Gertrude M. Walker, formerly of the faculty of Philadelphia Women's Medical College, was chairman of the Medical Commission.

Miss Amelia Josephine Burr, the poetess, headed the Christian Literature Commission; Miss Nellie Prescott, secretary of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, the Administration Commission; Miss Ernestine Friedman, social service expert for the American National Young Woman's Christian Association, the Social Service Commission; and Miss Helen Calder, secretary of the Congregational Woman's Board of Missions, the Commission of Religious Education and Evangelism.

Seven provinces and thirty-one boards and societies were represented by the missionaries present. Sitting with the social service commission was Mrs. Chauncey Goodrich, who has served with the American Board in Peking for forty years and who is now helping conduct the first scientific survey ever made of living conditions in that city. In the collegiate education group were Mrs. Murray Frame, president of the North China Union Women's College at Peking, and Miss Minnie Vautrin, acting president of Ginling College at Nanking, the only two women's institutions in all China offering a complete college course.

In the Christian Literature section one saw Miss L. M. Garland, a small, slight woman with a very big purpose—that of fighting Chinese illiteracy with the thirty-nine symbols of the new phonetic script. In the same section was Miss A. Mildred Cable, who has labored for twenty years in an isolated inland city where she and two or three associates were the only foreigners and where she has built up a normal school that is famed throughout China.

"Sir Michael Sadler, educational adviser to the British government, said to me last summer that the future civilization of the world depended in no small degree on the kind of education China developed in the next two or three decades," declared E. C. Lobenstine, secretary of the China Continuation Committee, in his opening address to the delegates. "You members of this conference can help shape that program to a very considerable extent."

Some of the leading features of the conference were as follows:

1. There were repeated requests for interdenominational secretaries with duties of national scope, such as a Christian Literature secretary, a home economics expert, an instructor in translation who could divide her time among the colleges and train Chinese girls for this work, and a specialist in religious education to give intensive training to missionaries already on the field.

2. A great tendency to link social service with evangelism and make every church member a worker for community welfare appeared in the reports of two commissions. "It is our great hope that philanthrophy and Christianity will not be divorced in China," said Miss Ernestine Friedman, chairman of the Social Service Commission. "That has been an unfortunate development in America. We recommend that every evangelist, whether foreign or Chinese, have at least the rudiments of social service training." "In all parts of the country Christian Chinese are being taught that they must 'work out' their Christianity," stated Miss Helen Calder of the Commission on Religious Education and Evangelism. "In many schools and churches members have pledged themselves to teach the phonetic script to at least ten illiterates a year. Others are teaching the blind a simplified Chinese Braille. This tendency to express faith by works should be given impetus throughout the Chinese church."

4. This Commission declared that the two union colleges for women should be fully supported by the boards at home in the matter of staff, buildings and other equipment. It decided it was inadvisable for Chinese girls to go abroad for undergraduate work, as it is an exceptional student who can remain away from home for five or six years and adapt herself readily to the conditions of Oriental life on her return.

5. The same commission was unanimous on the subject of the need for normal training. Training in the government normal schools is without the Christian background necessary for success in mission work.

6. That one union bilingual medical college for women be established to serve the needs of northern and central China, including Fukien, the site to be determined by the China Medical Missionary Association, was the recommendation that provided most discussion. Just what will be the fate of the Women's Union Medical College at Peking, supported by the women's boards of the Methodist Episcopal, Congregational and Presbyterian churches will not be known until the new site is fixed.

7. The conference recommended that a secretary with medical training be appointed by every women's foreign mission board, these secretaries combining to form a medical board to have general supervision of the staff and equipment of medical schools and hospitals in the foreign field.

8. Emphasis was put on the necessity for safeguarding the health of the missionary herself.

Feeling that women's missions deserve more recognition than has hitherto been given to them, the conference urged the appointment of women secretaries to national committees and organizations, such as the China Continuation Committee and the China Christian Literature Council. The appeal for funds necessary to sustain these secretaries will be directed to the Interchurch World Movement. Almost the last official act of the body was the acknowledgment of the "indispensable cooperation" of the Interchurch World Movement and a request for its further help in carrying out the conference plans.

For Conscience' Sake

IN southern Indiana lives a man who for the sake of conscience is doing a notable piece of work as a preacher. Because of his heroic and sacrificial spirit he receives the confidence of all the people.

Some twenty years ago he came to this community and helped to found a sect noted for its fanatical and emotional traits. Being an ardent lover of the truth his investigations in the Scripture led him to dissatisfaction with his position. He went West, was gone for fourteen years, during which he established himself thoroughly in the New Testament position. On moving to Ohio he came in touch with M. L. Buckley and was offered a place with Ohio churches.

He refused all offers and came back to his former home to try to lead his brethren of former days into fuller light. This they refused. He then proposed to the Christian church that he preach for them, they having been without a minister for months, proposing that they should have the morning offering and he would take as his part the evening collection. He began thus, at the same time preaching at many other points in the county with true missionary spirit. He now gives all his time to the church in town, but is entreated to preach in many other places. His salary is now below half what he could have received in Ohio. The rest of his living he makes as a painter. The respect with which he is held all over the county of Pike is shown by his election as County Chairman for the Interchurch World Movement. He proceeds at once to organize the county, putting on a conference in each community. He already has a hearty welcome among those who know him. He is unassuming. He speaks with deep tenderness of his love for the scripture and the brethren. He is altogether worthy of the affection of his newfound fellowship. I count it a privilege to have met him and know of his fine spirit and work. He is D. B. Moore of Winslow.

Mt. Rainier from Indian Henry's, Rainier National Park, Washington

The Great Northwest

By W. F. TURNER

THE Great Northwest, in this article, includes Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia. It is a land of far distances, of mountain ranges whose peaks are covered with eternal snow, of great rivers whose waters irrigate desert places, causing them to blossom as gardens, of seaports where ships from all nations ride at anchor, of wonder places like the Glacier and Yellowstone National Parks, of growing towns and populous cities—in short, a land of opportunity. Hence people are going there in a steady stream, where there is room to breathe health-giving air, room to think in new channels, room to build new homes and to help form and shape a great new section of America, gateway to Alaska and the Orient.

While the Great Northwest is in a formative condition, while hundreds of members from our churches in the middle west are going thither, while multitudes from other religious bodies are seeking readjustment in their new environment, and while many whole communities have no church or Bible school at all, it is the golden hour to present the New Testament basis for a united church in all that wonderful country. We have made a fine beginning, but it is little more than a beginning in most of the territory. With such opportunities before us, we would be negligent indeed if we failed to take advantage of them. The conditions are treated more fully in the following paragraphs.

Montana

It takes a fast express train twenty-four hours to cross Montana from east to west and for the past two years the state legislature has been carving out numbers of new counties by subdivision, trying to get them down to normal size. Montana is not only immense in area, but rich in minerals, timber, stock raising and wheat. The tallest smelter smokestack in the world is at Anaconda, where copper ore from Butte is treated.

Gallatin Valley wheat is world famous for yield and quality. When Montana went "dry" even the heavens withheld their rain and the snows failed to fall for a time. But while prohibition has come to stay, the earth in 1920 is receiving "the early and the latter rains," mountains are white with snow and Montana will be richer than ever. This year should see the realization of much of the progress which our churches in Montana desire.

In this great state we have twenty-seven churches. Eighteen of them have considerable strength. Fourteen have regular preaching. Bozeman, Butte and Missoula are among our best churches in the state.

There are yet twenty-four counties in Montana without a church of our people, and one without a church of any faith. A number of our churches are small and find it difficult to maintain their work without help. Walter M. Jordan, our only minister in Montana who was born in the state, is state secretary of missions, and his wife is secretary for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Both are held in high esteem. They ask for the modest sum of $3,600 this year from the American Christian Missionary Society and ought to have at least $5,000. Besides this, our church at Great Falls should be backed in its efforts to erect an adequate building.

Inland Empire

Inland Empire is comprised of East Washington and North Idaho, and is so combined because of mountain ranges and railroad facilities. Here again are mines, lumber, wheat and fine farms. One may drive by automobile a whole day through the Big Bend or Palouse regions and see nothing but vast stretches of wheat fields, brown as the soil is turned, green as the seed springs forth, or waving seas of gold as the harvest is ready. This section has been called the bread basket of the nation. Great irrigation systems from the lakes and the Columbia River are now being surveyed. This project will reclaim thousands of acres of tillable land from dry places.

Spokane is the metropolis and railroad center. Here is located the regional missionary headquarters for the Northwest, sending out Roy K. Roadruck to inspire and help our Bible schools, and Mrs. Louise Kelly to be an inspiration to our churches and particularly our women. A successor to the writer will also be chosen in due time.

We have seventy-six churches in the Inland Empire. State Secretary O. A. Ishmael is busy in the field, and by the generous gifts of the church at Waitsburg, Washington, R. E. Jope is also maintained as state evangelist. However, these men cannot answer all the calls. Many churches are small and without regular preaching, and four counties are unentered. The educational centers of Cheney and Pullman remain mission points and Moscow needs better equipment. Inland Empire asks but $2,000 and ought to have $5,000 this year.

West Washington

West Washington is rich in lumber, coal, fisheries and shipping and is the home of "Carnation Milk." As the tourist drives about Puget Sound or sails its waters he is charmed with the snow-capped Cascades to the east and the snow-crowned Olympics to the west, with Mt. Rainier towering in majesty above all. The metropolis of the Northwest, seat of the State University with 6,000 students, is Seattle, whose canal and locks bring ships into fresh water for cleaning and repairs, whose harbor is unsurpassed, and whose shipping sails all seas. Tacoma is a close second. Near one city is Bremerton one of Uncle Sam's greatest naval training stations, and near the other Camp Lewis, to be maintained permanently as a military training camp of superior advantages.

In Seattle is the largest Presbyterian Church in America and there the Methodist Episcopal church is planning an educational plant by the University to cost a quarter of a million. We also have a group of splendid churches, two of which will soon be housed in adequate buildings. Ben N. Mitchell, supported by a fine board, has the state work, involving fifty-three churches, in good order. But funds should be placed in their hands for a great advance. New fields like Bremerton await our coming, the weak must be made strong and six more counties evangelized. Ten thousand dollars is needed this year.

We may discount the prediction that Seattle is destined to excel New York as a metropolis, but we cannot but admire a land that casts such a spell over its people.

The Olympic Mountains, Viewed from Seattle, Washington

Oregon

From the heights in Portland can be seen Hood, Adams, St. Helens, and other snow-covered peaks. The famous drive up the Columbia rivals the scenery of Switzerland. Charming beaches on the Pacific are near. A trip to Coos Bay, up the valley of the Willamette, over the "top of the world" circling Shasta and up to Crater Lake will never be forgotten.

But beside scenery, Oregon is rich also in timber, farms, dairying and fruit, and is noted for its schools.

C. F. Swander and his board have a five-year program for the 121 churches, which aims to secure 10,000 tithers and reach five dollars per capita for missions. A city evangelist for Portland will be provided. A state office is maintained in Portland. Mrs. Clara G. Esson is state Sunday school secretary. There are seven counties to enter and hundreds of school districts where religious education must be provided. To neglect such opportunities would be utter folly.

The Falls at Spokane, Washington

South Idaho

South Idaho is being reclaimed by irrigation. The winding Snake furnishes electric power in its great falls and moisture through the canals for a growing and happy people.

Fields like Pocatello are a challenge we must meet with enlarging faith. A field secretary is needed to visit and encourage the twenty-one churches we already have and to enter the sixteen counties yet awaiting our coming.

British Columbia

In this Canadian Province with its metropolis of Vancouver, M. R. Ely serves our two churches, looking for that better day when with adequate housing and stronger forces we shall build a great, strong fellowship to greet our missionaries as they go to and from the lands to the West.

The American Christian Missionary Society has for many years given generous assistance in planting and maintaining churches in all this region and has contracts now in force with all the Northwest state boards. The society is giving special support to Vancouver, British Columbia, will help make possible a city missionary in Portland, Oregon, and by special arrangement with our great church at Anderson, Indiana, gives Living Link assistance to Pocatello, Idaho, and for two years has helped maintain a Northwest regional office and superintendent of missions. The Bible school department has kept a superintendent of that work in the Northwest for nearly seven years and the Board of Church Extension has been liberal in building loans. The American Christian Missionary Society is anxious to do far more for the regular work and to open up new fields.

New Opportunities

There are numerous Indian tribes in the Northwest. Our brotherhood does not have a single mission among the Indians in the United States. Our great church at Yakima, Washington, is on the border of the Yakima Indian Reservation. There are but two small and apparently inefficient missions among the Yakimas, conducted on the old lines and being gradually absorbed by the whites and deserted by the Indians.

High School Class, White and Indian, at White Swan, on the Yakima Indian Reservation

President F. W. Burnham, the writer, and a group of friends at Yakima visited this Reservation last summer. We learned that the Indians desire a school and home under Christian auspices. One wealthy Indian said he would furnish five children for such a home and pay their way. The society hopes to inaugurate such a work at the earliest date that arrangements can be made.

The lumberjacks offer another field that should challenge us to enter. Recent surveys indicate that they have been almost wholly neglected by Protestant churches, but assiduously cultivated by the I. W. W. evangelist with his gospel of "direct action." The society already has a man in mind for this work as soon as he finishes his college course.

Colporteurs are also needed to search out the neglected places in the rural sections, mountain regions and along the coast line to distribute Bibles and religious literature, and give at least an occasional gospel message. There are literally hundreds of these places overlooked and forgotten.

There are also open doors among the Orientals, many of whom are found in the rural sections as well as in the cities. They are expert in gardening and fruit raising. Illustrations of what can be done are the Chinese Mission of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in Portland and the union mission among the Chinese at Walla Walla, Washington, in which our great Central Church there cooperates.

The great Northwest is an enchanting land. It can and must be the land of our Christ.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

New Phases of Home Missions

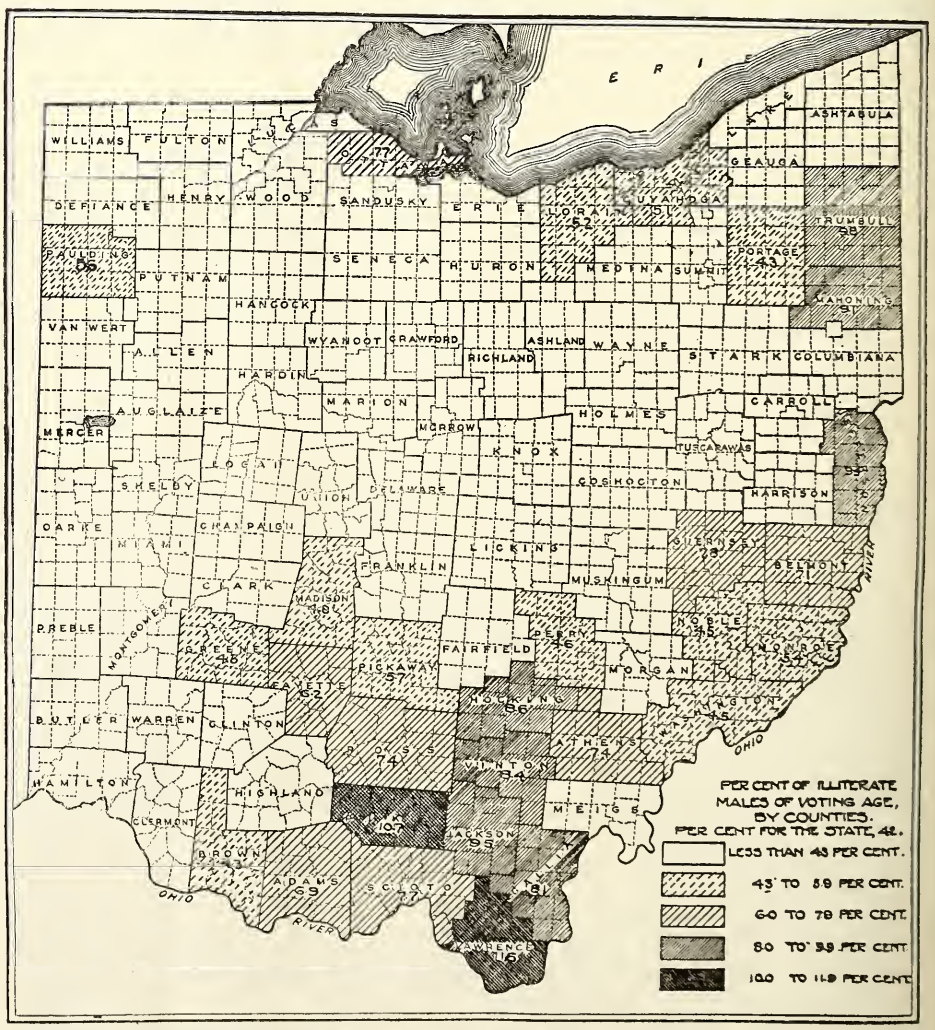
THE Home Missions Council of New York City, which is a cooperation of many of the Home Mission Boards of the Protestant churches of America, and a sort of clearing house for their plans and activities, has under consideration some new phases of work for the coming summer. The work proposed is to be done among the migrant or seasonal workers hitherto almost wholly neglected. The outline of the plan is as follows:

1, Harvest Service. June to September. Texas, north to Canada. Four or five tents each in charge of the Harvest Welfare Secretary. Each tent in four different regions during the season. Local cooperation of churches, commercial club, farm bureau. Assistance and advice from the Interchurch Office and the extension bureau of state colleges. Local churches to be especially enlisted. Expense of overhead organization and necessary equipment to be furnished by cooperating boards. Upkeep, depreciation, transportation and half workers' salaries to be borne by the local communities. Two organizers to be put in the field by May 1.

2, Fruit and Cannery Service. May to October in selected canneries in Delaware, New Jersey, New York, and California, ten or twelve women welfare workers. Two or three moves during season. Tent if necessary. Child hygiene, recreation, instruction for children, including the equivalent of vacation Bible schools, friendly advice to adults, etc. Cooperation of local church through women's committee and volunteer workers. Cooperation of employer to the extent of costs of renting tent and half the workers' salaries. One organizer to start in May and supervise the work during the season. California model enterprise. Santa Clara county. June to September. Cooperation with State Immigration and Housing Commission and other religious and philanthropic organizations.

3, Lumber Camps. Theological students and other religious workers to work for wages with the loggers during the summer months. Church boards to pay transportation.

The American Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions cooperate with the Home Missions Council, but so far have made no appropriation to the type of work above outlined. This article is given to show the practical service which the Home Missions Council is trying to render.



In the Worst of These Counties Protestantism Has Failed as Certainly as Romanism in Latin America for Here Illegitmacy and Overchurching Also Reach Their Highest for the State.

United Christian Missionary Society

THE Executive Committee of the United Chirstian Missionary Society, at its meeting in Cincinnati on Tuesday, March 23, 1920, by unanimous vote, selected St. Louis, Missouri, as the city for general headquarters for the United Christian Missionary Society. This decision was supported by the unanimous vote of the officers of the Society, including all the national secretaries present.

The question of the location of the general headquarters had been studied throughly by a sub-committee of the Committee on Unification during a period of more than two years. The investigations had included visits to each of the cities considered and many conferences with those interested. Carefully prepared typewritten statements had been submitted by local committees in each of the cities and these statements had been revised and brought down to December, 1919. They were accompanied by literature, charts and maps setting forth the advantages of each city.

A questionnaire had also been circulated regarding the items which should be taken into account in the selection of the headquarters city, from which questionnaire a schedule covering the chief points for consideration had been prepared.

All of this was submitted by the Committee on Unification to the Board of Managers of the United Society at its first meeting in St. Louis, December 30, 1919, at which time the Board of Managers voted to commit it to the Executive Committee, which it named, the constitution requiring that the Executive Committee should report its acts to the Board of Managers for confirmation.

The Executive Committee, at its meeting in January, had set Cincinnati, March 23, as the place and date for determining this issue. Judge Frederick A. Henry, Chairman of the General Board of Managers, had been selected as an attorney to direct the Executive Committee in the matter of the incorporation of the United Christian Missionary Society. Judge Henry had the matter under advisement for two months, with the findings of the attorneys previously consulted before him. A telegram was received from Judge Henry and presented to the Executive Committee on the above date, stating that the question of incorporation would undoubtedly turn on the location of headquarters, which question he could not decide. The Executive Committee, therefore, felt that it must proceed to determine the general headquarters city.

The Executive Committee carefully considered all the material submitted and also the personal statements which were made regarding the several cities.

Before balloting the Executive Committee determined that no ballot should constitute a vote of the Committee until one of the cities under consideration should have received, in a single ballot, two-thirds of all the votes cast, and that when such a ballot was reached the vote of the Committee would be made unanimous.

The secretaries present also agreed in advance that they would unanimously support any decision reached by the Executive Committee.

The fourth ballot stood as follows:

St. Louis, 12; Indianapolis, 3; New York, 0; Cleveland, 0; Chicago, 1; Cincinnati, 2.

The Committee then voted unanimously in favor of St. Louis, Missouri, as the headquarters city.

This action of the Executive Committee is subject to the approval of the Board of Managers and to the final approval of the Convention. The Cincinnati Convention previously directed the officers and Board of Managers to take the necessary steps, after competent legal advice, to incorporate the United Christian Missionary Society and to carry into effect the purposes of its organization, and the Board of Managers at St. Louis, as above cited, committed this matter to the Executive Committee.

It should be stated that the Committee reached it conclusion wholly upon consideration as to the best interest of our great brotherhood and without personal regard for themselves or for the officers of the constituent boards. No financial or material inducements were offered or considered from any source whatsoever.

F. W. BURNHAM, President.

Index to World Call for 1919

THE large amount and great variety of the material that appeared in WORLD CALL in 1919, made the preparation of a complete index a serious undertaking. It is now printed and ready for mailing, without charge, to subscribers who request it.

Others will do well to follow the example of the thoughtful ones who kept a file of the magazine. It will be found invaluable for reference, and the index makes every article and illustration readily accessible.

Opportunities in the South

By A. R. Moore

THERE has never been a time when there were greater opportunities for the Disciples of Christ in the "Old South" than the present. Our first opportunity came in the days of Mr. Campbell, when that great man visited this section of our nation and preached in most of the southern states, and when the Millennial Harbinger was taken and read far and near. But the war between the states broke up and scattered the churches then in existence and a new start had to be made.

In the period that followed the civil conflict a few disciples got together and tried to reorganize and recoup their losses. But in the South, particularly, our people inherited some of the principles of the Primitive Baptists, a people who did not believe in Sunday schools, or organized missions. For a period of twenty years or more very little was done in the way of cooperative effort and many opportunities for both churches and schools were lost.

When, under the leadership of the American Christian Missionary Society, an effort was made to organize for effective work, there was much opposition on the part of those, our own people, who did not believe in the use of societies, and this very naturally retarded our growth.

But the South is no longer tied to the past. It reveres and holds in sacred memory all the good of the past, but the South today stands with its face to the future. It has experienced a great commercial awakening, and it sees in no less degree its opportunities in religion.

The First Church in Atlanta, the First in Jacksonville, and the First in Birmingham, are among the great churches of our brotherhood; great in membership, great in missionary offerings and great in all lines of church activity. Then there is a larger group following close to these, such as Augusta, Savannah, Macon and Valdosta, in Georgia; Selma, Montgomery and Mobile, in Alabama; Tampa and Miami, in Florida; Columbia and Charleston, in South Carolina.

The seaport towns of this region deserve careful consideration. Already active, the ports of the Old South are starting into a period of vast development. In some of these we have no churches as yet. In all, we need to put in more money and do a bigger work. Mobile, Pensacola, Tampa, Miami, Jacksonville, Savannah, Charleston, are all growing cities, destined to be great cities in a few years, and need special effort of the wisest sort at this time. In great industrial centers like Atlanta and Birmingham, it is impossible for the churches to keep pace with the growth of population.

Then there are big, growing towns in all these states—towns of from five to twenty thousand population—where we have a nucleus of disciples, but no church organization. Such towns are Albany, Americus, Bainbridge, Brunswick, and Cordele, Georgia; Dothan, Enterprise and Huntsville, Alabama; Greenville and Greenwood, South Carolina, and many others of perhaps equal importance, towns which must be entered within the next two or three years.

We have our hands full with the missions now being conducted, like Rome, Columbus, Waycross, Mobile, Gadsden, Orangeburg, Sumter, and others; missions that are prospering and which will in a few years become self-sustaining churches. But if the other cities are to be entered now, and every day lost is more than so much time lost, we must have the help of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The South is a great and inviting missionary field. I have spoken only of the states in which I am at work, but the same can be said of other states of the South. Today is the day of opportunity in the South. The plea of the Disciples of Christ is needed in the South. The forward steps in cooperation, looking toward ultimate union, make it imperative that this plea for simple, New Testament Christianity be pushed now. It is equally imperative that we maintain our own unity. We are on the threshold of the greatest victory in all our history, and we must stand together now more than ever, in order that we may not be cheated of that victory. Loyalty to Christ, to the prayer for unity which He prayed and to the spirit of brotherhood, which He taught, will give us that victory. And that will not be our victory, the victory of a human organization, but the victory of the Kingdom of God.

Notes and News

Argentina is the melting pot of Latin America. In it are being wrought out the same social and economical problems the United States is wrestling with.

We have learned with regret that toward the close of 1919 little Rachel Bierna of Rath, India, was quite ill. The last letter we had reported her much better, and the parents were altogether hopeful.

If Latin American mothers hear and heed His counsel, the presses of the American Bible Society will have to run overtime. The Society is already supplying Scriptures to meet rapidly increasing demands from Latin American countries.

The idea of Bible Year, 1920, which is being promoted by the New York Bible Society, started in Great Britain. The purpose is to set forth the value of the Bible upon the individual and national life, and to increase interest in the Bible and Bible reading.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Dobson, formerly of Birkenhead, England, reached the Jamaican field March 16, 1920. We are looking for strong and efficient service from these people who have made a good record as leaders in churches in the United States and also in England.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Vannoy left the College of Missions March 11 for their new work in the boys' school at Buenos Aires, Argentina. Mr. Vannoy received his doctor's degree from the University of Iowa. Before coming to the College of Missions he was a member of the faculty of Culver-Stockton college.

Miss Hallie Lemon of the Mexican Christian Mission, San Antonio, writes that the workers are all very happy and just as busy as they can be. In preparation for an evangelistic meeting they were holding daily workers' conferences and prayer meetings, also planning for Bible studies in the Mexican homes.

Mr. Elmer R. Child of the Mexican Christian Institute, at San Antonio, Texas, reports that they had ten confessions during the days of their special effort, and were expecting to have baptisms Easter Sunday. He says the confessions do not measure the good done to the little congregation.

"Stable government rests on the character of its citizens. There can be no regeneration of society until there is a regeneration of the individuals who compose society. In the language of Herbert Spencer, 'There is no political alchemy by which you can get golden conduct out of leaden motives,' or, in the pithier phrase of Moody, 'If you want good water, it is not enough to paint the pump; you must clean out the well.'"

News of the death of Mrs. Christina Forsythe, the missionary W. P. Livingstone immortalized as "The Loneliest Woman in Africa," at her home in Rothsay, Scotland, last February was recently received by her friends in America. A few years before she had returned from one of the most glorious triumphs in missionary history. Broken in health, she was forced to undergo a surgical operation, the shock of which killed her.

Captain J. B. Frazier, head of the Chaplains Corps in the Navy says: "Just now the churches of our country have a great opportunity in the Navy. There are approximately sixty vacancies in the corps of Chaplains. We need men of culture and of established ability and character—men of high class who will not put the church to shame, not fail to measure up to the ideals and demands of the Navy. It is a hard place to fill—weaklings will not do."

The 1920 Summer School of Missions, under the auspices of the Interdenominational Committee of the Central West for Missions, will be held at Winona Lake, Indiana, June 17 to 24. Those who may attend are women and young women, presidents of missionary societies, Sunday school teachers, program leaders and those who wish to become leaders. Further information may be had from the publicity chairman, Mrs. W. P. Topping, 706 Douglas Avenue, Elgin, Illinois.

T. H. Lawson of Willows, North California, writes, "I am now in the midst of a ten days' evangelistic effort. I was disappointed in getting an evangelist so am doing the preaching myself, with our adughter, Mrs. Shirley R. Shaw of Stockton, singing for us. Influenza has tied things up somewhat, but we hope to at least increase the spiritual life a little. We have been having a full house Sunday nights for some time. We are using the lantern and have the town interested. We have sold the lots where the building now stands and will move to a new location in April and enlarge the present building. I am hoping the church can be induced to make it a modern workshop."

Emory C. Cameron is preaching for the churches at Fairfax and Kay City, Oklahoma. At Fairfax the church has been granted a loan which has not yet materialized on account of high prices. At Kaw City the Sunday school is growing so rapidly that they must add to their present building. They are now making provision for their increased Sunday school and must have $600 or $700 assistance from the Board of Church Extension.

At the March meeting of the Board of Church Extension the following loans were made at 4 per cent: Lonsdale Church, Knoxville, Tennessee, $1,300; Morgan Park Church, Chicago, Illinois, $7,200; First Church, Grafton, West Virginia, $8,000; First Church, Batesburg, South Carolina, $1,500; Central Church, Louisville, Kentucky, $6,000; First Church, Hugoton, Kansas, $1,750; the church at Maryville, Tennessee, $1,500; First Church, Bigheart, Oklahoma, $3,000.

Cullman, Alabama, is erecting a $27,000 modern church plant, including the furnishings, and is earnestly asking for $8,000 help from the Board of Church Extension. The building will be gray brick veneer, Gothic in style, with a basement under the whole building, hardwood floors, electric lights, modern Sunday school facilities. Cullman has a population of 4,000 and is growing rapidly. Has any individual or church $8,000 which could be better used than to put up a building like this?

Help from the Board of Church Extension will soon be needed for a new church at Great Falls, Montana. It is absolutely imperative that the church there shall have better equipment for its work. This is perhaps one of the greatest cities in Montana and a most strategic point. The pastor, E. E. Francis, is leading the church in a splendid way. W. F. Turner recently visited Great Falls and considers it a most promising and important field. He urges the Board of Church Extension to go the limit in extending help to that church.

Sterling, Colorado, has a population of 8,000 and is located on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and the Union Pacific railroads. They are building a brick church to cost, including the lot, $23,000, and want at least $8,000 help from the Board of Church Extension. They state they can be self-supporting in two years if they get this help. They will have Sunday school rooms, full basement, kitchen and restrooms, study and a furnace. They have 100 members there with a Sunday school of 117 and there is prospect of growth. This is another fine opportunity for the Disciples of Christ.

With sorrow we hear of the death of one of the most devoted members of the Board of the Cleveland Christian Orphanage—Mrs. M. P. Bucholz. She had long been a member of the Board and was ever active in the advancement of the children, giving one day in each week to teaching them in some useful branch of industry.

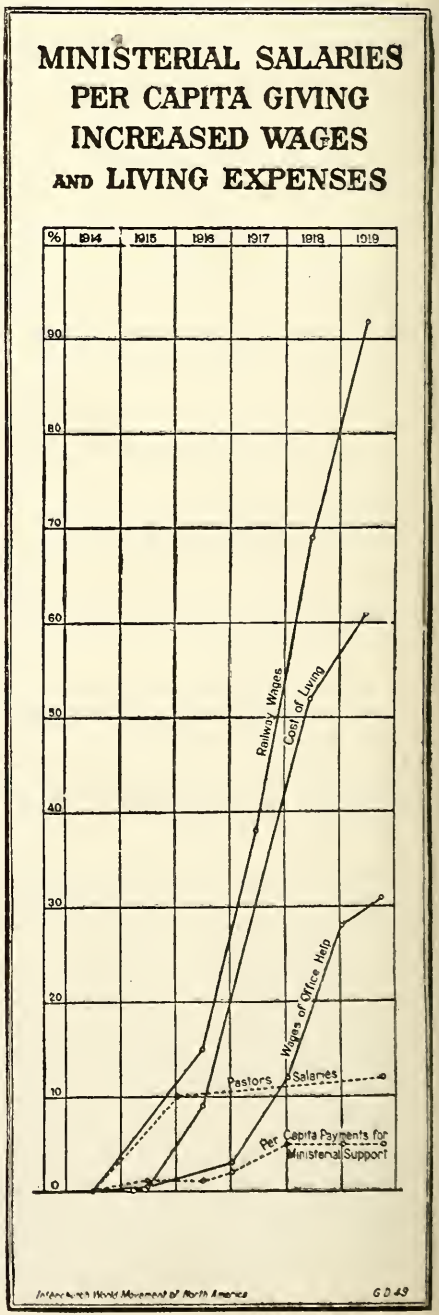
She was an accomplished woman, gifted in many ways. Many of her poems appeared in the columns of the Christian Philanthropist. She was an expert painter on china and found time for these things and her duties as Sunday school and Bible class teacher while she faithfully for many years nursed an invalid husband and reared her five children. She was a member of the Highland Avenue Church of Cleveland.

Lewis P. Kopp, Brownsville, Texas, writes: "During February the third Church Extension note of $500, together with the semi-annual interest was paid. It should be a very easy task for this congregation to pay the other two notes on or before maturity."

Mr. and Mrs. Earl N. Griggs completed nine months of work in the Fargo Church, North Dakota, early in March. In a personal letter Mr. Griggs says: "Nine months ago today we arrived, and tonight we doubled our membership in the church. We want to keep humble, but we can't help but be just a little glad that the Lord has seen fit to use us in a small way. We hope His name has been honored and men really helped." We understand the Sunday school has had as high as one hundred and seventy-five present. That is fine progress.

Miss Alice Hines, one of our faithful missionaries at Hazel Green, Kentucky, in writing recently about the baptismal services there when nine of the students and one of the teachers were baptized, speaks enthusiastically of the happy Easter season they had been having among the students. She adds, "I wish I might hand you for perusal two letters received from former Christian Endeavorers who were in our school here, and are now in other schools. They not only sent these messages of loving thought, but an offering for the work."

F. D. Butchart reports as follows regarding our Bohemian mission in Cleveland, Ohio: "Our Home Department of the Bible school is in a very prosperous condition. We have about one hundred mothers in the department who find it impossible to attend Sunday meeting. For them we are holding cottage district meetings, and once a month an afternoon meeting at the church. Our topics of study for the current months are as follows: Jesus and Our Church, Jesus and Our Friendships, Jesus and Our Homes, Jesus and Our Work, Jesus and Our Amusements, Jesus and Our Ideals and Purposes."



Central Church, Gary, Indiana, where O. E. Tomes ministers, reports thus on the every member canvass, "The pledges for missions from the every member canvass and a close follow-up have doubled the amount this year over last. We have introduced the duplex envelope into the Bible school as well as church. We have but two funds, current expense and missions. Every boy and girl as well as members of the church are given opportunity of supporting the church at home and abroad. Almost every Sunday school child is giving to both funds every Sunday. Bible school expenses are paid from the church treasury and all funds go into the treasurer's hands. We believe we are training the future church to get under the whole task, and incidentally we are getting more money for current expenses and missions than ever before."

Good, fresh milk is an exceedingly important item of food for the children whether in a private home or an orphanage. Our Cleveland home is quite fortunate in this regard. W. C. Bower for several years has furnished the home with five fine cows. When a cow gets too old he replaces it with a younger one. When a cow goes dry he immediately replaces it with a fresh one. He also furnishes the feed for the cows. He doubtless regards this as the finest investment he makes, for it must be a constant joy to him to think of the fact that the kiddies have all the good, rich milk they need.

Miss Alice Hines, of our Hazel Green School, reports that on March 15 fifteen of our students were baptized, and that seven of the number were boys from Mr. Ronsheim's Sunday school class. Mr. Ronsheim wrote recently, "God helping me, every boy in this dormitory, aye, every boy in my Bible school class will have entered into the church by Easter time. Beginning tomorrow night I will hold ten-minute services each evening here in the dormitory. Miss Hines will do the same work among the girls." The latest word from Hazel Green is that twenty-five of the students have been baptized.

Recently the Board of Church Extension has received an annuity of $500 from an old friend in Kansas, another annuity of $2,000 from a former giver in Kentucky; a gift of $4,000 from a friend in Missouri, who formerly gave $10,000, and $800 from a friend in Iowa, who has already given $13,800. Negotiations are now going on for the closing up of another $10,000 annuity gift, and one of $1,000. Do you know that annuity money given to the Board of Church Extension is used to erect church buildings? What a satisfaction it must be to know that your money is building and housing homeless Disciples of Christ while it is earning you an income.

Mrs. J. C. Gentry of Atlanta, Georgia, has left her beautiful home on St. Charles Street and moved over to the Southern Christian Home, bag and baggage—husband included in her belongings, but not as baggage—in order to supervise the home while some changes are being made and the whole place put in order. The grounds were in need of considerable attention to make them look trim and presentable.

In explaining her mission she says: "It is my purpose, at the wish of the Board, to handle the business end of the work here for awhile, in order to reach a conservative estimate of the cost of operation." Her compensation is revealed in her statement: "The children are very obedient and it is very pleasant being with them. One grows to love them from association." This service to the home is only one of the many expressions of devotion to this ministry that has characterized the attitude of both Mr. and Mrs. Gentry toward the orphan child.

The Central Christian Church, Louisville, Kentucky, over which Albert Nichols presides, has been made to rejoice heartily by the securing of a splendid church building on Second and Oak Streets, through the assistance of $6,000 from the Board of Church Extension. Mr. Nichols writes, "We had our opening day Sunday in our new church building and it was an auspicious day. The Sunday school was the largest in its history and the audience was more than we expected. We had one addition to the church. I feel sure that Central Church has the best prospect of growth of any of our congregations in the city. We are grateful to you for this loan and feel rather comfortable in knowing that such a fund has been ready to help us through this important and splendid deal."

Of the Scoville union evangelistic meeting in Deming, New Mexico, N. J. Reasoner writes, "We received nearly twenty-five per cent of the cards signed. Seventy-five of these were reconsecrations and 88 confessions. I have baptized one who did not sign a card and 40 others, and have received nine, while one backslider, whose name was still on the church roll, returned. The Presbyterians have twice used our baptistery and have immersed six. They have already received about a dozen and the Baptists, who have twice used our baptistery, have received about two dozen. The Methodist Episcopal Church has immersed none as yet, but their numbers had increased 137 before last Lord's day."

The first reports from our Superintendent of Missions in North West District of Oklahoma, J. G. Parsons, gives the following information: "Visited Tyrone Church. Organized Bible school. Arranged to visit this church two Sundays each month until work can be built up and minister located. Boise City has a group of unorganized disciples. No building. Also Garlington, in country near. Will try to unite these groups in one church at Boise City. Forgan has no organization or building, but quite a number of disciples. May hold meeting and organize later. Gray Church badly disorganized by removals. No Bible school at present. Will endeavor to organize both school and church. Nice little building here."

When Boyd Keith, the genial and persistent treasurer of the Christian Orphans' Home Board of Dallas, Texas, passed through St. Louis recently, he informed the National Benevolent Association that they were at work on the unfinished portion of the building and expected it to be ready for occupancy in about three months. This will furnish capacity for fifty more children, and will greatly relieve the situation in Texas. They have been turning away children by the score. Incidentally it might be remarked that Boyd Keith has such a grip on our churches of Texas that he keeps our two institutions at Dallas supplied with needed funds by correspondence. He is a busy business man and does the work without charge.

T. Newton Hill, Bina, India, writes of their enjoyment of the visit of Mr. Bert Wilson to Bina, and the pleasure of himself and Mrs. Hill in having Mr. Wilson in their home. He writes further: "We have appreciated his coming for this reason too, that we have not yet seen through the problems of our work, and his fresh impact and his vision, unclouded by any getting used to conditions, will help much. He is making a fair and thorough canvass of our work here and we shall always know that he has seen with us some of the conditions which we shall be facing through the years. It is at an opportune time. The mission out here has been unifying its work and organization and is in a better position to conserve the results of any forward movement. We are expecting to get out into camp soon, and hope to keep the men out most of the time until convention time. On the other trips we preached to about nine hundred men, while Mrs. Hill and one Bible woman talked to about six hundred women. After convention I shall have charge of all the work here except the zenana work. We shall not be able to get out so much then, but there are more in Bina than we can reach. We are getting a bit of a vision of a community house, especially for our Christian women. The girls' school building offers an opportunity."

At the last meeting of the Board of Ministerial Relief, action was taken placing twelve people on the honor roll of the brotherhood. Six men and six widows. Some of these had as high as 63 years spent in the ministry. One had reached the advanced age of 93 before circumstances brought her to the attention of this Board. The responsibility assumed, including the increases, at this one meeting amounts to $280 per month. Payments are now at the rate of $64.524 per year. There are now 246 homes in this family of faith to whom the churches owe generous recognition for their faithful labors in the past.

We rejoice in the splendid report from Alameda, California, as given by the minister, William Jones: "Every department of the church is forging ahead. Held a 'White gifts for the King' Christmas, and by this means we very ably assisted two families. Christmas dinners were provided and suitable garments were purchased for them. Church school is caring for a Belgium orphan as well as making preparations for the installation of a stained glass window in the church this year. The church is making arrangements to pay the minister at least $2,000, this being an increase of $700 over a year ago. Last year the Bible school averaged 4.8 per pupil each Sunday. Over seventy-five new pupils were added to the school last year. Our apportionment for the brotherhood activities will be realized with great joy."

A letter from Mr. E. T. Cornelius of Mexico, under date of March 30, gives the following good news: "There are special services in San Luis all this week, and our Mexican minister, Pilar Silva, went over to help. There will be about ten baptisms next Sunday. The work is doing nicely there. We have been having good attendance at our preaching services here at Aguasealientes, and have recently had several confessions. We plan for our third baptismal service April 11. The big pila or fountain in the large patio here makes a splendid outdoor baptistery. Dr. Fuller has made steps, and it is fine to have the services out there under the grapefruit, pomegranate, apricot and aguacate trees, and with the shade of our beautiful pepper trees over us. Our colporteur is out on his long trip over the states of Aguascalientes and Zacatecas, and I am expecting a very interesting report of his work. He is one of our own members, and is largely supported by the Bible Society. The service he has rendered has been invaluable."

A letter from Mrs. Lillian P. Johnston, of Monieka, Africa, has in it the following interesting note concerning the way they live:

"We are comfortably settled in one end of the hospital. Dr. Jaggard and his bride are in the other end. I suppose one family will move into the old house when the Hedges move into their new one. We have cement floors, cheesecloth for glass in windows, thatch roof, tin walls, and mud kitchen as far away as an ordinary barn at home. But it is necessarily so, on account of possible fire on the thatch roof, and because it will become a cook house for native patients later. We have two rooms and bath room, with porch all around. We shall probably use the back porch for a dining room, as it never gets the sun, and rarely the storms."

From Florence, Alabama, the following message comes, sent in to the home office by the pastor, E. C. Sechler: "A Christian Endeavor Society was organized about the first of September and has grown both in numbers and efficiency. There are now more than sixty members with an average attendance of more than fifty. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions is having its regular meetings with new members reported each month. It is seeking to enlist each woman of the church. The Sunday school is possibly the most prosperous organization within the church—prosperous in attendance and its very generous offerings to missions and local work. Fifty-six have united with the church by confession and letter during the last ten months. We are working hard and expecting much bigger things in the not far distant future."

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has given help to the church at Fargo, North Dakota, for several years. Mr. Earl N. Griggs is now the minister there. One of the members has recently written: "We are moving on very well. Mr. Griggs is a hard worker; preaches telling sermons, and results are being seen. A Brotherhood was organized in November. We have over thirty members and meet twice a month; have a 'feed' prepared by the men, and a program is given. A week ago Sunday evening there were four baptisms, all grown people. There was one confession last Sunday. Many have been added by statement and letter. We started in last June with forty-one members. Our goal is three hundred and forty-four in 1924. Mr. Griggs made an appeal at our annual meeting to establish an altar in each home. The majority of our members responded."

Miss Effie B. McCallum, Nanking, China: The schools of the city and the students all over China have been greatly disturbed over the recent events in Foochow and the killing of two Chinese in a riot by the Japanese. In many cities schools were closed for three days while the students marched through the streets preaching to the people and seizing Japanese goods, which they burned. In Nanking they were only out one day. They collected in a large parade ground in the afternoon with their booty heaped in the center of the crowds gathered there to see the excitement and the goods were burned. The whole affair resembled a big football rally in the States, and if it were not for the seriousness of the affair and the earnestness of the students one might mistake it all for a frolic. They do not cease to go out on the streets and into the tea-shops and teach the people. The boycott is being made more rigid every day. Every prayer meeting partakes of the nature of a patriotic meeting, and constantly prayers are going up in the churches for China.

Last week our school received special notice and mention in the city. The students' organization is seeking to get cooperation in all the schools of the city, and have outlined a course of lectures and special meetings for all students to encourage this feeling of unity. Last Sunday an oratorical contest was held, the orations being given on the subject, "How can the city of Nanking be improved?" One of our girls was chosen in the preliminary tryout for the contest. Our girls were especially pleased over this, because there were only two girls represented in the contest, the others being boys. The schools are both government and mission schools.

Miss F. W. Henry, the chairman of the admission committee of the Colorado Christian Home, wrote the National Benevolent Association recently that they were turning away from twenty to forty-five children a month. While all of these were not cases that would have been received into the home, the great majority of them were cases needing the protection of a Christian home. The pathetic thing about the situation is that other children's homes in Denver are as crowded as ours. We wonder what becomes of these children. Our home can care for only forty-five. Something must be done to relieve the situation. No wonder the board at Denver is getting nervous and restless when they are compelled to say "No" to so many pathetic appeals from needy children. It is sincerely hoped that the Interchurch drive in April will net the Colorado brethren a sufficient amount to enlarge the home at Denver.

Note the forward movement in the work at Lakeland, Florida, where Charles H. Trout ministers. "We are starting out on 1920 with the brightest prospects in the history of the church. We are having splendid audiences, and excellent interest and two and three additions every Sunday. On Wednesday evening I am giving a course of Bible lectures and Bible study, which is now gaining in interest and attendance. We have such poor advantages in the way of a building to take care of them. We want to secure what is recognized as the best site for a church in the city, but they want $10,000 for the lot. We must have that lot, as it means so much to us. We are trying to see if we can get a cut in the price. Our motto for 1920 is 100 additions, and in five years to have a property worth $45,000. Lakeland is growing and we must have a plant here."

Dr. and Mrs. George E. Mosher have reached the Congo in Central Africa. Dr. Mosher has gone out as a special dental missionary and Mrs. Mosher was formerly Miss Apperson, with one term of service at Monieka. Dr. Mosher writes very interestingly: "I gave Mr. Johnston a bit of relief and have extracted two molars for natives, taken charge of the carpenter gang at Bolenge, done a little gardening, killed a monkey and a pheasant, and shot a crocodile which got away into deep water. I call that some record for the first month's dentistry in Africa.

"Our stations need more workers everywhere, teachers, builders and evangelists. Dr. Frymire told me that he had fifteen major operations waiting because he could not get other work off his hands, and he is also trying to get a house ready to live in by the time the returning missionaries crowd him out of his temporary quarters. All the doctors are pitifully short of drugs at present.

"Here in Africa where the natives are anxious for every new thing we can teach them, the work rapidly assumes vast proportions and every missionary on the field is overworked. Some of our workers cannot hold out many years at the rate they are going. It will not be the climate that kills them so much as lack of time for recreation and proper care of their bodies."

He adds, "If there are fifty good, wholehearted Christian Americans who really want to do the most possible good in the world in the shortest space of time why not embrace the opportunity of this crying, beseeching work?"

Frank E. Harnar, Harda, India: The school work has started well. We had to dismiss two teachers, one other resigned, and two were transferred; so we have had to employ a number of new teachers; and we have also had to employ an additional teacher in one of the primary schools. This taking on new teachers is always an uncertain thing. One never knows how they will turn out; but I think that in most cases we have made no mistake in our choice. But the one thing about all Indian workers, with a few exceptions, is that they need oversight and guidance, and that is what takes so much energy and time in a big work like our school work here. We have four primary schools, middle and high school, and in all there are about forty-five teachers. But I am glad to say that a number of them are excellent workers and can be trusted to go ahead. Our total attendance is larger this year than last. In the boys' primary school, the attendance last year was one hundred and fifty-nine, and already it is two hundred and one this year and there will be still more a little later. The first English class in the Middle School has over forty boys in it. There is a larger number than we have had in that class ever before. I go to the High and Middle Schools every day, besides attending to the office work, having conferences with the teachers, etc. I plan to visit one or two classes each day to see how the teaching is being done. As often as I can find time, I visit the primary schools, but I can't spend much time there; the days are too short. Correspondence takes at least one hour a day, and many days much more. Every day some of the workers come to the bungalow to see me about something or other, either concerning their work or some personal matter. The hostel takes a good deal of my time also; giving time to that I consider one of the most important matters. We have seven Christian boys in the hostel this year. I would like to spend some time with them each day, not only in an official way, but as a friend. I would like to take part in some of their games and get into closer touch with them, for it means so much to them and it would mean so much to the Mission later on. But as long as there is only one school man here, it is impossible to do much along these lines.

Bible students and teachers will be interested in the report of the death of Francis N. Peloubet at his home in Auburndale, Massachusetts, age eighty-eight years. He had been a leader in Sunday school circles since 1875, when he issued the first volume of Peloubet's Select Notes on the International Sunday School Lessons. This annual commentary has grown in popularity from year to year. Since 1901, Dr. Amos R. Wells, editor of the Christian Endeavor World, has been associated with Dr. Peloubet in the production of the commentary and will naturally succeed him in that important work.

Our Cover Subjects

ON the front of this issue is reproduced a photograph of a Chinese Mandarin's daughter with bound feet. Through the influence of Christian missionaries and the introduction of Western customs and education the practice of footbinding is rapidly passing away. It is hard for one who has not seen the crushed, broken and deformed feet of Chinese girls and women to realize what excruciating suffering footbinding caused or what a handicap for life it put upon those who were so afflicted. Only a beginning has yet been made in changing the habit of mind that made such a custom possible, but the further these changes go the faster they advance.

On the opposite page we are glad to present an orphan girl of India, rescued from starvation by missionaries. Being brought up as a Christian she is saved from child marriage, from possible girl widowhood and from a thousand other woes which her millions of little sisters must continue to suffer until Christ is enthroned in the hearts of her people.

On the back cover is reproduced a wonderfully fine photograph of a Japanese girl hunting clams. It is truly typical of the grace and beauty of the marvelous island empire.

JUNE 1920

Let the Children Lead the Way

WE shall not enjoy Children's Day less, but more, if we look a little deeper into it and discover some of its serious and profound possibilities. It is well to warm our hands and hearts by its cheery glow, but if at the same time we can project its warmth with doubled power into the frigid souls of our neighbors, at home and abroad, why not?

We are too apt to make playthings of our children. The Savior was even more joyous with them than we are, but also far more serious. He uttered no sterner challenge than, "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Uncorrupted, unhardened and unspoiled, our children see so clearly the immediate necessity of giving the children of other lands a knowledge of Christ, that they empty their little banks on Children's Day. Have we anticipated their example by our giving in the World Movement of Disciples of Christ? If not, here is another chance. Match the children's dimes and dollars with hundreds and thousands.

Still more. Before the glory of the day has faded, sit down with such larger or smaller children as trust you, and tell them more of what it all means; that it is the ultimate war against war; that there is just one thing that makes it impossible that the children of Canada and the children of the United States shall ever go to war with each other after they grow up, and that is that they are Christians; that only so is it safe to leave the long line between the two countries, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and far up to the Arctic, unguarded by forts and soldiers, because the hearts of the people on either side are kept by Christ, from their youth up.

Now here is the most wonderful thing in the world today. We are at liberty to teach Christianity to the children of all lands! To neglect such an opportunity is sheer insanity.

Look again at the Chinese Mandarin's daughter on the front cover of this magazine. See the inarticulate pathos of her hand tenderly holding her tortured foot. Remember that, through the marvelous working of the gospel, that barbarous custom of foot-binding has all but passed away. Read the story of Chinese college girls and realize that Christ has begun to free the minds as well as the feet of China's womanhood. In another place you will find a less favored family of Chinese children, and then the children of Japan, India, Tibet, Africa, the Philippine Islands and Latin America—all born to be children of God as truly as the darlings of your own household.

It is only ten or fifteen years before these children will be men and women. If Christians, they will be our steadfast friends, and war with them impossible. If not Christians, they will be possible enemies, and war with them an easy probability. If Christians, fellowship with them will enrich our lives as certainly as their petroleum, rubber and sugar are already increasing our material wealth and physical comfort. If not Christians, the blight of their vices will fall upon our souls as surely as their yellow fever and cholera have heretofore devastated our cities. The world has become too intimate a neighborhood to endure on any other terms than Christian fellowship, with a thoroughgoing observance of the Golden Rule.

It is reported that the subcommittee of the United States Senate, appointed to investigate conditions in Mexico and along the border, will advise against armed intervention and in favor of using some of the money that it would cost as a loan of, say, a billion dollars, to help our neighbor republic to unify her people and develop her resources. That money, whether provided by the national treasury or by private enterprise, would eventually return. Armed intervention, on the other hand, would have been a sheer expense, would have carried with it the loss of countless lives and would have started an endless chain of future wars, with their incalculable moral and material losses.

Why not let dawning intelligence serve us further? Taxes and missionary contributions come from the same pockets. Soldiers and teachers must be supplied by the same homes. Mere material development of Mexico will not suffice; would eventually make matters worse. Education and Christianity are her primary and supreme necessities. Let us calculate what it would cost to fight Mexico, and then give as much to bring up her children—and ours—as Christians, and so make war forever unnecessary and impossible.

The same formula will apply to every other foreign nation. Our greatest statesmen are realizing that international peace depends upon the Church of Christ more than upon diplomatic skill or military strength.

With one accord the Protestant churches of America are learning at last what the Roman Catholics have known for centuries, that only by the thorough training of children in religion can the strength of a church be maintained. The plain strategy and duty of the hour is threefold: first, to gather the children of all unchurched Americans into schools and teach them the way of Christ; second, to extend a like opportunity to grow up in Christ to the children of other lands; third, to train the children of the church to carry forward the twofold task of making the whole world Christian.

At this great hour the world's wisdom bows to heaven's revelation and sets the child in the midst; builds the nation out of the school and the home; transforms the kindergarten circle into an international and interracial bond of brotherhood.

Magnify Children's Day in the church, for the children's era in the world has dawned.

Dr. Shelton's Captivity and Escape

(Related by Dr. E. I. Osgood of Chuchow, China)

Dr. A. L. Shelton, of Tibet, is now in America, having landed at Vancouver, British Columbia, from the steamship Empress of Asia on April 26. Dr. Elliott I. Osgood of the Christian Mission at Chuchow, China, who was with the rescue party, writes an intimate report of Dr. Shelton's harrowing experiences. The accompanying photographs were made by or for Dr. Shelton during his captivity.

DR. A. L. SHELTON of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society came to China in 1904 and, with his wife, was stationed at Batang on the Tibetan border. Their work has been almost entirely with the Tibetan people. All eastern Tibet for a thousand miles has been their field, and "big" Dr. Shelton has become almost as familiar to every town in the large district as one of their own people.

On November 18, 1919, Dr. Shelton, with his wife and two daughters, Doris and Dorothy, started by caravan south for Yunnanfu, where he expected to start them on their journey to America, he to return and make a trip to Lassa, the capital of Tibet.

January 3, 1920, when they were within three days of Yunnanfu, the party was attacked by robbers and Dr. Shelton taken into captivity. They had halted for dinner at a village and the doctor had sent in his card and passport to the local military official. Soldiers were standing about the street and Mrs. Shelton asked her husband if all of them were going to escort the party to the next town. Foreign parties or Chinese traders never travel through this region without military escort, furnished by the Chinese authorities. The doctor has so long traveled through wild country, amongst robbers and warring parties, and because of his skill in medicine and surgery, always found a welcome and freedom from molestation, that he had little fear of Chinese or Tibetans. So he answered his wife in his characteristic way, that the number who might be sent as their escort was the official's business and he was not worrying himself whether they should be many or few.

When they left the village only four men accompanied them, although more may have intended coming on with their caravan of luggage which had but just begun to move when the doctor and his family were attacked. Mrs. Shelton was riding in advance in a sedan chair and the two girls were following on mules. Dr. Shelton was a little distance behind on his mule and accompanied by one of his Tibetan servants.

Suddenly from the bluffs on the left of the road the band of robbers began firing upon the party. One of the bullets pierced the thermos bottle which Mrs. Shelton had in her chair, but no one about them was wounded. She rolled out of her chair and crouched behind it. The girls speedily dismounted and joined her. Upon hearing the firing Dr. Shelton grabbed his gun from its scabbard on his saddle and, with his servant, ran toward the chair in front. The soldiers, however, cried out, "Robbers, robbers," and ran for the village, where the rest of their company still were. The doctor saw that they were being deserted, so gave his gun to his servant, who put it back in its scabbard and the two of them, unarmed, hurried up to the rest of his family.

DR. SHELTON kept a journal during his captivity, and the first entry describes the capture. "Mrs. Shelton and the girls were crouching behind the chair and calling me to get down. Bullets were flying about. The robbers surrounded us and began taking our things. One drew a large pistol and another a sword, threatening me. The fellow with the pistol looked so grotesque that I laughed. They did not harm us.

"One man grabbed Andru's (his Tibetan servant) knife and chopsticks which he had in his belt. Andru looked appealingly at me, but I said, 'Don't resist. Give it to him. It is all you can do.' After we had been stripped of all that attracted their attention, one of the robbers came to me and told me to go with him to their leader. I started off. Mrs. Shelton called to me not to leave them alone, but I could do nothing but comply with their request."

Mrs. Shelton says the robbers also tried to hustle her up the side of the bluff, but she is a large woman and it was impossible for her to climb the hill. Then they put her into her chair and commanded the chairmen to carry her up, but they, too, said it was an impossible task to climb the steep mountain side with such a load. Supposing that they were merely trying to get her out of the way of the fighting, which had now become general, as the soldiers had rushed out of the village and attacked the robbers, she told the robbers that they would get down into some hollows where other non-combatants had found shelter. Without more ado she and the girls, with their Tibetan servants, made for the shelter. The firing was becoming so hot that the robbers gave them up as a bad job and fled for their own safety.

"WHEN I reached the leader," the doctor records, "he had my camera and field glasses. As we went along he wanted me to explain how the camera worked. As soon as we were out of danger I had to take his picture and then a number of his men until I had used up one roll of films. They wanted me at once to show them the pictures. I could not make them believe that the films must first be developed, but finally had to pull it out and show them the blank and spoil the roll before they would believe me.

"Many people were along the road and the robbers were opening their packs and taking whatever they wanted. They even made some of the people strip and give them such garments as they fancied. We finally arrived at a small pass. Grouped around the leader were some twenty men. He had my shotgun and immediately wanted me to show him how it worked. A shot came whizzing by, so he adjourned the meeting for a time and told his men to take me farther up the mountain and informed me that I would be held for ransom. I told him he could hold me for ransom as long as he pleased, but that I would never consent to be ransomed as it would endanger the life of every other foreigner whom they might take a notion to capture.

"My mule had now been brought up and I mounted and we started. It was with a heavy heart for I could clearly see Mrs. Shelton's chair in the road below. The battle was in full swing and shots were flying overhead. When we stopped to rest a tall, lean man asked me for my watch, which had been overlooked in the scramble. When it began getting dark we waited for the rest of the band. They came straggling in. I counted seventy-one of them at the resting place. Fires were built and supper cooked and eaten. Then for two hours they lay and smoked opium. I was to learn in the days to come that they depended, when under strain, far more on opium than on food."

Pere Bailly and Some of the Bandits

MEANWHILE Mrs. Shelton had gone back to her chair and, with guarding soldiers, had gone on to Lao-yao-kwan, where they were to stop for the night. There they waited, hoping for the speedy return of the doctor. At every footstep they heard during the night they thought he was coming. They waited there for two days. Then Pere Bailly, a French Catholic missionary, came to their relief. He had received a note from Yang Tien-fu, the bandit chief, saying that he had captured a German (!) and would the father see that the wife and girls were safely taken to Yunnanfu.

Pere Bailly has lived in Yunnan for thirty years. He is loved by the Chinese there even as Dr. Shelton is loved by the Tibetans. Some months before the capture, Yang Tien-fu, the bandit chief, had come to Pere Bailly and asked his good offices in negotiating with the Yunnan Governor for his pardon.

The morning light is breaking; The darkness disappears;

Dr. Shelton and Yang Tien-fu

Formerly the bandit had been a soldier, but owing to lack of five months' back pay, he and a number of others had walked out and started collecting their pay from the people and the caravans which go over that great road. He was now tired of being hunted like a wild beast and wanted restoration to citizenship. Father Bailly had brought the matter before the French consul, but without result. Then Yang Tien-fu resolved on this bold stroke of taking a foreigner and using him as a lever for obtaining pardon for himself and his men. Later he told Dr. Shelton that he had been kept informed as to the progress of his journey for some time as the bandit had decided that he was to be the man to be captured.

AS soon as Mrs. Shelton reached Yunnanfu she sent telegrams to the American Minister in Peking asking that immediate steps be taken to bring about the release of the doctor. The French Consul in Yunnanfu was asked to act for the American government. Since Father Bailly had had intimate relations with the bandit chief, he willingly consented to act as go-between and for a solid month worked to get the doctor released.

Dr. Shelton continues in his diary: "I was not allowed to take my clothes off for some days. The first day I sat in a straw shed and did something that Mrs. Shelton had often said I should do—started a diary. I had in my saddlebags three little books, which were a blessing, a little leather New Testament given me by Mr. McLean, president of the Foreign Society, in 1911; 'The Rhymes of a Red Cross Man,' sent me by F. W. Burnham in 1917, but which had just arrived in Batang shortly before we left; also Ian McLaren's 'Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush.' 'A Doctor of the Old School' is my ideal, after Jesus and Livingstone. In the latter volume I started my diary."

Mrs. Shelton says that the "Life of Livingstone" and the above volume by Ian McLaren are great favorites of the doctor. When he is discouraged she finds him reading "A Doctor of the Old School"; when he is thinking of doing some especially hard task, like taking one of his numerous journeys into Tibet, he reads the "Life of Livingstone."

JANUARY 4 he wrote, "I spent the morning estimating what the robbers had taken the previous day. Including the animals and my things, it amounted to about $1,800. The leader, Yang Tien-fu, told me the Yunnan Governor has his family in custody at the capital. He said he did not wish to harm me, but wanted to injure the standing of the Governor and compel him to restore his family to him."

January 5 he says further: "Started at noon and traveled until near night. At dark we went to a village and stopped with confederates. They were afraid of soldiers. Rested until midnight. Crossed the back road and telegraph line. Went on over the mountains until 3 a. m. Stayed until daylight with some Catholic converts. They said the church was very near and they would take me there, for which I was thankful. At daylight they started on again, but back to the mountains. I sat down and told them they could do as they pleased, I could go no farther. They took one of my cards and about 2 a. m. sent a man with it to see the priest. A card marked 'Claude Bailly,' with writing in French, which I could not read, came back. They said the priest had gone to take my family to Yannanfu."

Tuesday, 6. "About dark we went down the mountain to a large temple and stayed all night. I got my first sleep since my capture. It is now afternoon and we are still here with forty guards out in every direction. They have done nothing all day but gamble and worship. They smoke all the opium they want. Yang Tien-fu tells me they have a hundred horse-loads, half of which was taken from the Governor's caravans, who is the greatest opium dealer in the province. Then he makes a bluff of not allowing the people to plant poppy.

"They have all kinds of guns, but everywhere are short of cartridges. I have counted nineteen kinds of guns and eight kinds of pistols. They are all the way from the old firelocks up to modern rifles and Colt's automatic revolvers. They do not even go to sleep at night without their guns. If a man lays his gun down for a minute the captain gets after him. Their cartridge belts are never off.

The sons of earth are waking To penitential tears;

"They have been working to get me to permanently join their band. At first I thought they were just talking, but am now convinced they are in earnest. They want me to take charge of the money. They cannot trust each other. They offer me anything if I will consent. The band now numbers 104."

Northern Yunnan is a series of steep mountains and narrow valleys. The bandits rarely followed a road, but climbed straight up or down or followed a ridge without giving any attention to paths. The doctor had little rest. The band was ever on the move, for the soldiers were hunting them as they would hunt wild animals. They shifted from place to place, occasionally robbing a village. For a considerable time they had also held captive an old gentleman, from whom they were extracting money as ransom. The doctor, when taken, had only his horse blankets and they had to do for bedding. Cooties began to crawl, but he was given no time to wash his clothing.

YANG TIEN-FU was willing to negotiate with the government, so representatives accompanied Pere Bailly, who made their first approaches to the bandit chief on January 12. The arrival of these Chinese negotiators greatly increased Dr. Shelton's popularity with the bandits. "Many of them when they came near me wanted to show off and began singing, 'do, re, me,' 'Jesus Loves Me,' and other hymns they had heard me sing. The captain asked me to teach him the English alphabet. The best boy in the company won twenty dollars in gambling yesterday and the others stole it from him while he slept. They are a big bunch of thieves even among themselves."

Even while the negotiations were going forward the bandits kept on the move, for they did not like the way the soldiers were being shifted about. One large city sent in as a quieter some $5,000 to the bandit chief. They got a still larger sum out of one of the country gentry who had no walls or soldiers to protect his place. One day the bandit chief came to the doctor with an offer of a thousand dollars a month if he would stay with them in the capacity of a pastor. He offered to pay six months' salary down at once if he would do so. Needless to say the offer was refused. When they were passing through one little town the chief handed the doctor a few dollars and told him to spend it as he pleased. Shelton hunted for meal, for bread, for fruit. He was hungry for such. He had eaten rice until he was starved for a change. He found nothing. So he bought some sugar and fed it to his faithful mule. Without that mule he could not have stood the hardships over those mountain ridges.

ON the fourteenth there came letters from Mrs. Shelton and the French Consul. It looked as though negotiations were going through. The bandits were jubilant. They told the doctor that when the Governor restored Yang Tien-fu's family he would be set free. Things dragged on until the twenty-second, when bedding, camp bed and clothing from Mrs. Shelton came through to him. "I have had a bath," he wrote, "a new shirt from my mother, and though still a prisoner, am in good spirits."

On the following day Pere Bailly came to Yang Tien-fu and reported to him that his family was at the priest's home and asked that Dr. Shelton be also sent in there for exchange. The bandits, however, were suspicious and fearful of losing the whip hand. It was not until the fourth of February that they felt negotiations were at such a pass they could risk the doctor in the priest's home. There he remained for three days, once more enjoying a more civilized bed and food.

"I got my clothes back, had a good bath and sent my dirty clothes to be washed in a Christian manner. The priest says that at the most, three or four days will mark the end of the affair and I will see the end of the robbers. A score of them are guarding me, even here. Once more I have coffee to drink. His dogs come to see me before I am up and want to get into bed with me. I took the picture of the old gentleman this morning. I am at a perfect loss to know how to repay his kindness. He has given his entire time for a month to working for my release. If I were a young man, more than anything else, I would like to go with these bandits and be a pastor to them. It would be a great opportunity to do the Lord's work. Why wasn't I born twins or triplets? It is good to speak a word for the Lord Jesus when men's hearts are longing for the right."

At the very time the negotiations were going on, some hundreds of the government troops, for lack of pay, revolted and Dr. Shelton witnessed the taking in to the bandits' band of one entire company. Yang Tien-fu demanded from the government pardon for himself and men, place and rank in the army, the return of his own family and the payment of a sum of money. Papers for these were signed and sealed and his family turned over to him. Then late one night the bandit's spies came hurriedly in and reported that the government troops were secretly surrounding the place. Yang took both his family and Dr. Shelton and at midnight slipped through the circles of soldiers back into the mountains. "Left at midnight," wrote the doctor. "We are in the mountains again. They are just concentrated evil. The Lord only knows what the end will be." Pere Bailly was some miles away telephoning to the Governor when the break came.

Dr. Shelton in his journal during the following few days showed how desperate and almost hopeless he felt the situation. It was not humanly possible for him to escape. Four soldiers were always detailed to guard him. During a part of the time two of them had slept beside him.

February 10. "Since yesterday noon it has been a perfect nightmare. When we started we came upon four men kneeling. They were of the ex-soldiers who had been promised, when they joined, that they could leave any time. Of course they were refused now. I rode my mule into the midst of the crowd and before Yang Tien-fu, himself, spoke to the whole two hundred a seditious speech. I asked the captain to stand all of us who wanted to go back against a wall and shoot us. There are only two or three who are hindering everything. But sedition is working and unless they are careful these leaders will go the way of all officials who oppress their men. I know of at least least fifty who are ready for resistance. They are tired of lawlessness. I have dysentery and have had it for thirteen days. It is getting worse. If something doesn't come off soon, I'll fight Yang for the leadership of the band. I can command half of them now. I might be killed in the struggle, but I want to help those who want to do right. Yang himself would come if it were not for Wu, his secretary. He is the devil of the bunch. Yang lets him persuade him. 'Lead, Kindly Light, Amid the Encircling Gloom.'"

AFTER the negotiations through the French Consul and Pere Bailly had thus failed, Governor Tang ordered his troops to mercilessly pursue the bandits. A reward of $5,000 was out for Yang Tien-fu. The entire section through which the bandits were working is composed of high mountains and deep, narrow valleys. It was no trouble for them to outwit the soldiers. They cared little for roads, could scatter at will and could gather together again when least expected. The bandit chief has carefully scattered seeds of rebellion among the people and has a much larger following than those who are usually with him.

As noted in Dr. Shelton's journal there was discontent among the bandit chief's immediate followers just before the Chinese New Year. He shot one or two of the ringleaders. He rarely risked a fight with the troops, retreating at this time northward along the Yangtze River. Dr. Shelton, of course, was dragged along with the bandits. Had it not been for his faithful mule, he would have dropped by the wayside long before. Once he recorded, "I can see no hope ahead, but all things end sometime. If my body were weaker it would die quicker. I am tired to the death. All I can say in my desolation is, 'Make Thy grace sufficient for me, O God!'"

WITH the negotiations broken off Mrs. Shelton, waiting in Yunnanfu, was likewise nearly desperate. The foreigners there did all they could to encourage and help her. For nearly three weeks she had no word from her husband. Her cook, who had come with them on the long journey, volunteered to try to make his way through to the doctor. The French Consul willingly gave him a passport and the Governor sent two men to escort him. The Wu-ting-chow magistrate, who had been also trying to negotiate with the bandit chief for Shelton's release, sent a couple of his men to show the way through the lines.

The cook succeeded in getting through by boldly walking up to where he was told Yang Tien-fu was stopping and, when challenged, asking for their chief. Some of the bandits recognized the cook. The latter hardly knew his master when brought face to face with him. Dr. Shelton had not been able to shave since he was captured. His beard was covering his face. His clothes were ragged. Fortunately, when captured he had on some leather cowboy pantaloons. Nothing else would have stood those wanderings. As the doctor explained, "Many times I had to just sit down and slide down the mountain on those leather pants."

The doctor seized the occasion to send back his copy of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," in which he had written his diary. He also sent his precious camera, which had been returned to him and with which at different times he had been able to snap pictures of the bandit chief and various members of his band. These reached Mrs. Shelton's hands safely and the films have been developed and prints made. It was her first word for some weeks and it was not reassuring. The cook found the doctor lying down most of the time, yet able to get up when necessary. He had lost nearly forty pounds of flesh and looked very haggard in spite of his heavy beard. When the cook left, Yang Tien-fu himself gave him ten dollars for road expenses. He also sent back letters to Governor Tang. These he signed with the official seal the Governor had given him during the first negotiations, through Pere Bailly. His letter was a satire upon what the Governor had promised and then had failed to do.

Mrs. Shelton had also in her loneliness telegraphed the Foreign Christian Mission in East China for assistance. I was chosen to go to her aid, Mr. Sarvis volunteering to look after the Chuchow work in my absence. Frederick A. Smith, Far East correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, had been watching the case and when he heard of my going, asked to accompany me. He proved to be a most pleasant and valuable companion. Leaving Shanghai February 19, by the last steamer south before Chinese New Year, we were able to reach Yunnanfu in the quick time of eleven days.

Arriving there we found that the American Minister had sent Colonel W. S. Drysdale, military attache to the legation, to take charge of further negotiations. He had arrived a week before us and had spent the intervening time collecting data, coming to an understanding with the Chinese authorities and in organizing an expedition to go three days north to Wu-ting-chow, near which Dr. Shelton was supposed to be held. Conditions in Yunnanfu made him feel the necessity of remaining in the provincial capital and he had selected J. P. Thornton of the Standard Oil Company to head the expedition. The Governor arranged that they should have private telephone connections over the official's line.

COLONEL DRYSDALE kindly granted Mr. Smith and myself the privilege of being a part of the expedition. This gave great relief to Mrs. Shelton, who felt that we, being under the same missionary society, would hold a deeper personal interest in the work. We had arrived on the evening of March 1. On the morning of the third we started for Wu-ting-chow. Upon arrival there the party was met by the local magistrate and commander of the troops. They expressed hearty approval of the proposed plans and offered every help to carry them out. Mr. Thornton and his Chinese staff wasted no time, but worked all that night getting ready letters to forward to Yang Tien-fu and Dr. Shelton. Shen-si, the Shelton cook, who had previously been able to reach Dr. Shelton, was again the chosen messenger to the bandit. He left with the messages on March 6, but never reached the bandit. A battle between the bandits and troops held him up and on the eighth Dr. Shelton succeeded in escaping.

IT was during the last days of February that her cook succeeded in getting Mrs. Shelton's letters through to the doctor. The bandit chief had treated the cook very decently, but one of the two men sent with him by the Wu-ting magistrate seems to have aroused the suspicions of the bandit for he was taken and put under severe torture. Dr. Shelton vigorously protested against the man's being thus treated, declaring that Shen-si, his cook, would not have brought a spy with him into the camp. The man was finally released, but the bandit, with his usual caution, shifted camp.

More soldiers were being sent after the bandits and they found it hard to keep out of the way of so many. They gradually withdrew into the northern part of the province along the banks of the Yangtze River. Along the bluffs above its course they trekked for several days. Then the main body of the band one night slipped quietly down the southern side of this bluff and climbed the next ridge. A smaller body of the bandits were instructed to go on down the Yangtze for a half day, leaving a false trail and then in the night join the main band. Then the whole body retraced their steps to the southwest. As they went back they could see the soldiers on the opposite bluffs following up the trail they had left.

Soldiers multiplied and they had to constantly change their course to avoid them. They ceased to follow beaten tracks. They would start straight down some mountain side, through jungle or over cliffs, then start right up the opposite mountain. Shelton's mule had faithfully carried him thus far, but over such routes no animal could carry such a load. The doctor was compelled to slide and climb with the rest. One day of it finished his strength. When the morning came he told the bandits they could do what they pleased with him, but walk he could not.

They rigged up a rough sling or stretcher between two poles and for five days carried him. It nearly finished those who tried to carry him. One time for a part of a day, Yang Tien-fu himself put his shoulder to the doctor's carrying poles, as an example to his men. Even under these conditions Shelton's strength continued to ebb away and the bandits realized that his life would be the forfeit if they kept it up much longer.

Yang Tien-fu is a born leader. When his own interests are at stake he is stony-hearted with regard to others. He is taller and stronger than any of his men; seems to never tire. His powers of endurance are beyond them. He knows every inch of the country through which he has been operating. He preaches sedition in every town into which he enters. He knows how to play upon the prejudices and emotions of the people and is working to set them against the Governor of the province. Yunnan is almost a kingdom in itself and at present has little to do with the rest of China. He is working to oust the Governor and put himself in his place. He knows where the rich men live and how much he can safely squeeze out of them. He has his spies even in Yunnanfu and Dr. Shelton frequently saw him with copies of letters written by leading men in the Governor's employ. He has several lieutenants, but he usually sees to such details as the posting of his own sentries. He will not allow his men to mistreat women and he had Shelton carefully looked after. Such things would work to his credit should he ever see the Governor's chair. Any act of disobedience was punished with severity.

Hail to the brightness of Zion's glad morning,

We asked Shelton if he had ever tried to escape. "There was no opportunity when I had the strength," he said, "and when opportunity came I was too weak." He was unfamiliar with the country through which he was being dragged. Physically he is a powerful man and he weighed 230 pounds when he was captured. During his sixty-six days of captivity he lost forty pounds. After such mountain climbing his legs became too weak to carry him. For a long time he was troubled with dysentery. Later he suffered with severe pain in his neck and shoulder. When we reached him he still tottered as he walked.

WHEN the bandits came to realize that the doctor's strength was rapidly ebbing away, they placed him under the guard of one of their men and he was put into a straw loft over a stable. He had been carried in a litter for five days. Now he was left in a bed of straw for an equal length of time. He was not allowed to crawl into sight lest some passing stranger should see him and report it to the authorities. There he lay and strength came slowly back. He was given all he could eat and drink of their food, but he hungered for wheat or corn foods and for fruit. His keeper was under constant fear lest it should be noised abroad that he had the doctor in his place. As soon as he saw the doctor was improving a little he went to Yang Tien-fu to ask that he be taken away.

It is probable that the bandit chief thought it impossible to hold the doctor much longer as a hostage. He had become too weak to stand further hardships. Yet he had found that through having a foreigner in his hands he could compel the Governor to offer better terms. On March 4 the band made a circuit to avoid the soldiers, and then raided the China Inland Mission Station at Ta-ku, twenty-seven miles from Yien-mo-hsien. Mr. Metcalf and Mr. and Mrs. Gowman live at this place and work among the hill tribes. The bandits looted the church and the homes of the missionaries, then left, taking the two men and three of the Chinese Christians with them. Mrs. Gowman was untouched.

The bandits assured the two missionaries that they were merely taking them along as their guests and for the purpose of compelling the Governor to give them better terms. They had been hard pressed by the soldiers and had had little sleep for some days. When they made camp that night at a small village they placed the two men in an upper room and put a guard at their door. They had already discussed plans for escaping and had decided that should opportunity come to either, he should take it without waiting to inform the other.

DR. SHELTON had been placed in the straw loft on the third. The China Inland Mission Station was raided in the early morning of the fourth. At dark on the same day Mr. Gowman and Mr. Metcalf found their supper slow in coming. Mr. Gowman decided to brave the guard and find out why they were not being fed. "If we are their 'guests,'" he remarked to Mr. Metcalf, "they should at least feed us." Taking no precautions to conceal his movements he walked down the stairs. The guard was asleep on his post. Mr. Gowman walked past him around the corner of the house to where the bandits had built a fire and he found the men about the fire also sleeping. They had traveled so hard and long they were too tired to even cook supper.

He stood near the corner of the house wondering if his time for escaping had come. If he were to run he would need some sort of a stick to find his way through the brush. Unconsciously his foot rolled a bamboo at his feet. He picked it up and found it just what he needed. It looked providential, so he started by sliding down the steep bank in front of the place. Again he waited to see if the noise had aroused anyone. Still nobody stirred, so he started. During the night he worked his way over four ranges of mountains and in the morning found himself on the edge of the Yien-mo plain. He quickly made his way to that city. The news of his escape was telephoned to us at Wu-ting.

Joy to the lands that in darkness have lain!

On the evening of the sixth the bandits attempted to take possession of Ma-to-shan, a market town in the same plain as Yien-mo. They were defeated by local volunteers and soldiers combined and were scattered. Had it not been for this battle, doubtless the bandit chief would have had Dr. Shelton again brought into his camp. On the afternoon of the eighth, a runner who had been sent by the Wu-ting magistrate to investigate the looting at Ta-ku, was approaching Ta-la-wu, where Dr. Shelton was secreted. Some of the villagers cried that soldiers were coming and most of them fled to the hills. The doctor heard the news and crawled out in time to meet the runner. The latter was also frightened when he discovered what a find he had made single-handed, but the doctor prevailed upon him to aid him in escaping.

No chair or horse was to be had. Ropes were twisted out of wild grass and three men of the village were drafted to assist the doctor over the mountain to the next village. It proved to be a Christian village. As soon as the villagers here knew who was their guest they did everything possible to aid the doctor. Two small ponies were procured and they started with the doctor for Yien-mo, he alternately riding each pony, the men supporting him as he rode. From Ta-la-wu to Yien-mo is about forty miles. The doctor was from six o'clock in the evening until noon the next day making the distance. Now that he was escaping he dared not stop until he was within the protection of soldiers. Had it not been for the help of those humble Christians he never could have made the distance. Half carried by his attendants, the doctor tottered into the official's presence. Had he risen from the dead they would not have been more surprised. His beard had grown so that his own wife would not have known him had she been there.

THE news was immediately telephoned to Wu-ting, where we were patiently awaiting the return of our messages to the bandit chief. Those messages never came, but we forgot to look for them after that telephone message from Yien-mo. The good news was at once relayed on to Yunnanfu. It took some time to convince them that it was true.

After consulting together it was decided that the Wu-ting magistrate and myself (being a doctor) should go out with a strong guard to bring the doctor in. The Yien-mo commander was instructed by telephone to put Dr. Shelton in a chair and, also with strong guard, he started our way. We left the same evening (March 9) and traveled half the night. Our journey was through places where Dr. Shelton had at times been confined when held as prisoner by the bandits. We dined at one place where the soldiers, attempting to capture the bandits, had attacked them.

ON the eleventh on the mountain top at Shih-lao-tah our two parties met. At this point the road angles around a cliff. From the opposite side we saw break out to view the line of soldiers, accompanying Dr. Shelton. They swung around the angle and, following them on his pony, came Mr. Gowman, who with his wife, had decided for the time being to seek the shelter of the provincial capital. Then came the bearded doctor in his open chair. It was a picture show in real life to stand there and see that longed-for procession swing around that mountain side.

Dr. Shelton and Mrs. Gowman were at once transferred to better chairs and we started back for Wu-ting. That night we stopped as guests of the magistrate and soldiers at Lung-kiai in the very room where for some time Dr. Shelton had eaten and slept and treated many of the sick of the place, even while he was a prisoner in the hands of the bandit. It was at this place the bandits had been suddenly surprised and attacked by the soldiers. They had very narrowly escaped capture and had had to leave so suddenly that the doctor's saddlebags were left behind.

Now the people came crowding back to welcome the release of the doctor, to return his saddlebags, which they had kept, and to ask for his ministrations to more of their sick. Fortunately we could take this work off his hands for he was still too weak to look after the nearly two score who came or were brought to see him.

Here we learned for the first time why the negotiations through the French Consul and Pere Bailly had failed. The commander of the troops at Lung-kiai had been a party in those former negotiations.

"We almost caught Yang Tien-fu that time," he remarked to the doctor upon greeting him in Lung-kiai. "While we were closing the negotiations we nearly succeeded in surrounding the place with our troops. Yang's spies discovered our move just in time for him to slip through our lines with you and his family we had returned to him."

Just before the above-mentioned attack on the bandits at Lung-kiai, Yang Tien-fu had been negotiating with the Wu-ting magistrate for the release of Dr. Shelton and was actually waiting for the coming of that magistrate when he saw the soldiers creeping in sight on an opposite hill. He sent his men posthaste for Dr. Shelton and they got away with barely five minutes to spare. It was at this time the saddlebags were left behind.

Hushed be the accents of sorrow and mourning,

"You see how much trust we can put in the word of our officials," Yang bitterly remarked to Dr. Shelton.

We hold no brief for the bandit. Over and over again, Dr. Shelton says, he broke his own word. When both parties so dishonor their word there is little chance of reconciliation. It was for just such reasons Colonel Drysdale remained in Yunnanfu instead of heading up the expedition himself.

This time Lung-kiai was full of government troops and the robbers were far away. Probably their spies were there, but when our procession left the place we numbered 250 in the cavalcade and there was little danger of attack. That night at Wu-ting Dr. Shelton on the telephone once more talked with his wife, who had worked so hard and waited so long for his return to freedom. Two days more (March 14) received by a large party of friends from Yunnanfu we rode into the capital and Dr. Shelton was once more surrounded by his family and Tibetan servants.

Shen-si, the cook, had been unable the second time to get to the bandit chief. Messengers who went ahead with requests from him to see the chief, never returned. Eventually the news reached him of Dr. Shelton's escape and he returned to the capital. Still later the Wu-ting official informed Dr. Shelton that the bandit chief had written him, "I do not know where the doctor has gone," he wrote, "but I am sending his mule to you and trust you will see that it gets to him." The magistrate has promised to see to the mule and keep it well fed and cared for until the doctor calls for it again. Governor Tang has, as far as money can do it, tried to recompense the doctor for the losses he incurred and the suffering he had to endure. Men worked for the release of the doctor, but after all it was God who brought it to pass.

Interchurch World Movement

PLEDGES to the churches participating in the Interchurch World Movement reported up to May 6 amounted to over $150,000,000. Most local congregations are holding back their reports until their quotas are complete.

The success of the financial campaign among the churches is noteworthy, especially when account is taken of the persistent misunderstanding of the movement's character and purpose and the diligence with which misinformation has been propagated. The failure of the canvass outside the churches is equally striking, and is due chiefly to the absorption by the churches of the entire Protestant constituency.

The colossal task of making a complete house to house survey of every rural township and every city block in the United States has proceeded far enough to demonstrate its incalculable worth to all the forces of righteousness. It will, of course, take months to carry it through to completion, but as its value is being demonstrated active cooperation is being secured not only from the churches that have participated in the financial campaign, but in many cities and localities from churches that have had no part in other departments of the movement. One Hebrew congregation voluntarily contributed $1,000 toward the expense of a city survey.

The Interchurch World Movement neither claims nor contemplates any sort of authority over any church or group of churches. Both Baptist and Congregational churches are just as jealous of their independence and autonomy as are our own, and Methodists and Presbyterians will not tolerate any ecclesiasticism except that which they themselves have formed and hold in complete control.

Those who fear that the movement is designed to bolster up denominationalism should reflect upon the fact that the bitterest opposition to it has come from those churches that are most pronounced in their denominationalism.

Those who are frightened by reports of heavy expenses will find in the long run that there is true economy in the vast accomplishments of the movement at a low percentage of expense.

This movement is strictly a promotional undertaking. It is of temporary duration and lives only at the will of the participating boards. It attempts no administrative functions and does not try to influence the conduct of the boards or churches that profit by its service.

To refuse to contribute is only to injure orphans that should be fed, missionaries who should be supported, students who should be taught and aged ministers who deserve the fellowship of all their brethren.

If men and women in places of responsibility had failed to undertake some such effort to meet the world's supreme necessities they should have deserved censure far more severe than any they have yet received.

Zion in triumph begins her mild reign.

The Angel of the Church

By G. M. ANDERSON

This article was put into type for the issue of July, 1919, but was held over because we feared it would seem imaginary, whereas we knew it to be only a fraction of what might be related truly. But Mrs. Mary Frances (Oliver) Holbrook, of Whittier, California, and Onawa, Iowa, would not allow us to use her name. Now her sudden death April 15, 1920, leaves us free to lay the tribute openly where it belongs. She was largely instrumental in housing the Bible College of Drake University and, with her like-minded sister, Mrs. Margaret B. Evans, in enlisting the other members of the Oliver family in establishing the Henry W. and Margaret Oliver Named Fund of $18,000 in the Permanent Fund of the Board of Ministerial Relief.—[Editors of World Call.]

GETHSEMANE, then angels. Sweat of blood, then calmness of victory. "Let this cup pass." Oh! it is the broken cry of God's elect through all the ages.

Who that has dared greatly has not also cried up through the storm that was beating full on his upturned face, "Let this cup pass"?

Who, like Peter, hopefully venturing on billowy seas, has not had to cry in the crisis, "Lord, save, or I perish"?

Gethsemane, then angels! O, blessed angel of the church, sometimes man, sometimes woman, sometimes—O, Jesus, was it you standing there in the, "Lo, I am with you always"?—how you kissed away the pain, how you came to me when the hurt was more than I could bear, and your gracious words and deeds made me all over again, inside, outside, made me all over again; till songs began resinging themselves in my new-born soul, and the sun blazed out from clouded skies, all over again, all over again!

O, angel of the Church, blessed you, brightening the corner where you are; twice blessed the child of God that, sitting in the shadows, and catching the glow from your glow, glows and glows; thrice blessed the preacher that, lying wounded under stones of bruising blame, opens the eyes, "all wet with unshed tears," to find you standing there blasting it all away with broadsides of healing praises. Yes, and thrice three blessings on the church within whose precincts you abide to carry on your holy, healing, cheering, life-giving ministry!

Mrs. Mary F. Holbrook

The gates of glory shall lift to let thee in, the port will be massed with friends and lovers welcoming thee home—when thou goest home.

Dear soul, I see you now, standing amongst the Inasmuchers of Matthew 25, and it is your coronation day. Jesus Himself is there confessing you before His Father and the holy angels; and these are amongst the words I hear Him say to you:

"I was preaching the gospel of the kingdom and was in need, and when those to whom I ministered did not discern it, thou didst, and helped me, and shamed them till they saw it too. Thou didst not know it was I, for I was disguised as one of my ministering servants, but thou didst not fail, thou didst not fail.

"I was old and weary, and worked for my daily bread, and my old horse died, and with him died my living. One morning I found a new horse in the shed, and as I looked, thou wast by my side laughing, and I laughed back at thee and thanked thee and went on earning my bread as before. Oh! thou didst not know it was I that thanked thee that day.

"I was a poor widow with four little children, and I did not know what to do. To give them away—I could not. To feed and clothe and house them—how could I? And I cried for my little ones at night when I went to bed. Then thou didst come and smile at me and speak cheerful words, and somehow, after that, nobody came to collect the rent, and nobody came to turn us out; and work came to me, and people were kind, and new hope gave me new life. Ah; thou didst never suspect, thou didst never suspect.

"I was sick and the doctor came and said, 'Hospital,' 'Operation!' But it was impossible. I could not pay. Thou didst come to me and see the white, white face, and as thou didst talk sweetly to me an ambulance drove up and took me away, and I was laid on a white, white bed, and then, and then, oh, dear one, they made we well again; it was life from the dead! Ten times I appeared to thee in this form, and thou knewest me not, but did not fail.

"I was a humble worker in the kingdom and thou didst send me to the convention—'for my works' sake,' thou saidst. It was my first convention, and, oh, dear one, how I did drink it in, and how it helped me in the work of the kingdom! Times out of number thou hast helped me this way, and how I did appreciate! I told thee so, but thou didst not know who thanked.

"I was amongst the grasshoppers those days in Kansas, and the grasshoppers consumed our living; and it was published in the papers how the Lord's people were in need and His ministers were hungry. One day there came a box, and out of that box I clothed myself for many days. The big Melton cloth overcoat—oh, it was so warm! I wrapped myself in it and faced the frost and biting wind, and went on in the work of the kingdom. Hast thou yet the loving letter I sent thee under a nom de plume?

"As I was fitting myself to preach the gospel of the kingdom, and was working my way through college as best I could, a friend, fearing I might break down under the strain, placed a fund to my credit in the bank. Whenever I could not pay, they told me it was all right, that a good woman had thought of me and provided what I could not provide without injury to my health. I have not kept count of the times I appeared to thee in this form, and thou didst never fail.

"Once I was burned out. All my books were burned. It got into the papers. There came a box of books. Some of them bore thy name. They were such a help! Did I not tell thee on that day that I thanked thee?

"Misfortune kept me from paying college debts. While I was worrying about what I should do to save my honor, the debt disappeared, and I traced the coincidence to thee. What a load thou didst lift from my heart that day!

"I needed a church building to minister to my little ones, and while I was wondering how they could be cared for, I looked and, lo, a building! Somebody had fallen heir to money, and the money was put into this building. Thy name I found on the legal papers. Didst thou know thou wast giving that money to me? Thou knowest it now.

"My little ones were sick, and there was no place to go, and while I waited, lo, a hospital! It was somebody's home, and she reasoned that I needed it more than she; so she went out and we went in. Didst thou recognize me that day? No? Thou didst not.

"I was training leaders for my kingdom, and there were heavy burdens to bear. Thou didst see and understand and take pity. Thousands and thousands thou gavest me, and look! see those whom thy thousands have trained calling a wicked world back to God, and trying to get things done on earth as they are done in heaven!

"I sailed overseas to spread my kingdom there, and thou didst follow me, and give me tens of thousands with which I founded new empires in righteousness.

"Time would fail to tell of the countless times I came to thee in many forms, and thou didst never fail me—never."

And so, dear one, you passed in through the gates, and your guardian angel escorted you along the golden streets. Your friends and lovers, a great throng of them from every land, lined themselves on either side and gave you triumphant entry. The angel showed you your mansion in the midst of those you had blessed.

As I looked, behold, many great ones who had lived for themselves first and for the kingdom of heaven a poor second, lived in humble dwellings far removed from yours. They had thought you a fool. Now they know the fool was not you. And they wonder with a great wonder why they were so blind. If they had it to do over again, they would live like you did, dear soul; they know it now. And if they could warn their children yet on the earth, they would do so; but the angel only answers, "They have the Word of God; if they will not heed that, they could not heed if one went unto them from here."

Summer Slump or Vital Service

By F. D. BUTCHART

(Being the summary of six years' experience with the Daily Vacation Bible School at the Broadway Christian Church, Cleveland, Ohio, told with the purpose of interesting others in a worth while piece of service.)

THE Daily Vacation Bible School is the answer to a long-felt need in the church during the summer months. The usual summer slump is the pastor's regret while a vital forward-looking service is his ideal. Summer is a period of comparative idleness in the majority of churches, especially in the city. No forward movement is ordinarily put on as it is not thought possible. It is also the time of greatest moral danger for the boys and girls of the community, inasmuch as the back lot and the street gang become the chief formative force in the lives of the idle children. But just at this same time many experienced teachers and college trained young people are readily available for at least part-time altruistic service. It is also the time when our splendidly equipped church buildings are for the most part, six days of the week, closed and idle.

Why not bring these three factors together? The trained leadership in the idle church building to direct the play and study of the waiting boys and girls? If we do this we have an effective Daily Vacation Bible School and the church vitalizes itself in the lives of the children of the neighborhood at the time of the greatest need.

Six years' experience in working out the Daily Vacation Bible School idea at the Broadway Christian Church, Cleveland, has put it far beyond the experimental stage. It has become an established factor in the community and the religious educational program of the church. We count it in just as we do the weekly Bible school. It has a desirable advantage in that it has distinctly a community aspect, being open to all boys and girls and recognizing no barriers of race or religion.

We provide a group of trained teachers and open our building every forenoon of the week during an extended period of the summer months. Special emphasis is placed upon the Bible work during the opening hour of each session. A Bible story is told and a Bible drill and concert memorization of choice passages of the Bible conducted. Frequently the children themselves participate in the teaching by acting out in pantomime a parable, a Bible story, or some other story bearing upon good habits and good morals. Mission work is presented through hero stories and stereopticon views. A life story bearing on the habits of life is always an outstanding feature.

The second hour is given over to hand work, varied to suit the age and sex, and always coupled up with character development. The boys have hammock weaving, mat weaving, wood carving, and other such features. The girls have sewing, darning, basket weaving, crocheting, raffia weaving, and cooking. Attention is given to recreation and out-of-door life by means of picnics and directed sports and games.

Evidence of the interest in the work may be found in the fact that the average annual enrollment in the six-year period has been 380 boys and girls, comprising fourteen nationalities and nearly as many different religious affiliations. Many families are now in the regular work of the church that we first came to know through the open door of the Daily Vacation Bible School. The hearty appreciation of the boys and girls themselves is best expressed in the following letter, which was received by one of our teachers from one of her ten-year-old boys:

"I am glad I found that Daily Vacation Bible-school, and I am glad I found all of youse, and I'll think all the time about youse all, I wish youse a happy vacation. I hope I'll see youse next year again. Your scholar,

Every known way was used to learn the will of our people as to our boards sharing in this movement. Full publicity was given to every step. The secretaries submitted the matter to the boards and the boards laid it before the national convention at Cincinnati. There the large and representative Committee on Recommendations, chosen by the several states, advised participation in the movement. The convention heard the matter presented and instructed the boards to proceed.

No church or individual is being forced to countenance the Interchurch World Movement or to contribute to boards that do so. The sacred liberty of everyone is fully respected. But should not those who want to give be allowed the same liberty?

Hearing that only $4,000,000 of the $40,000,000 Citizens' Fund had been obtained, members of the Field and Survey staff of the General Committee of the Interchurch World Movement poured out their gifts at Cleveland on May 11, despite the fact that they already had pledged themselves to the utmost.

One worker gave a piece of timberland, the only possession he had in the world. Another gave half his salary. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., announced that he would double his previous gift of $250,000 to the movement itself, making the total contributions of the Rockefeller family to the movement and to the New World Movement of the Northern Baptist Convention about $6,500,000. "My gift is insignificant in comparison with these princely gifts we have been getting," said Mr. Rockefeller. "I give it in deep humility."

One after another of the two hundred persons present then walked up to the platform and made his pledge. The total amount pledged was $273,000.

The Field and Survey men scattered the next day for their posts in all parts of the country to start a new campaign, under the leadership of A. E. Cory, for funds which would rescue the imperiled cause to which they all had committed themselves and for which they had worked with their utmost strength for a year or more.

A Puzzle Story

Would you like to be a
And wear a kimono?
And have a bright new
All bunched up in a bow?

Would you like to scrape on wooden
Wherever you should go?
Would you like a paper
And carry it just so?

Would you like to be a
And sit up on the floor?
And have your food on little
When 's meal is o'er?

And have dear tied on your back
Thru every game and plan?

And would you to the temple go
With fierce at the door
And humbly make your three low bows
Tho' your with fear is sore?

O, no!

you'd rather be by far
A happy, carefree, helpful
The very kind you are

Mamma Ji of Bilaspur*

By BERT WILSON

ONE day, sixty-three years ago, out on the plains of Illinois, a little girl named Mary was born. It was out in the open country, where there is sunshine unobstructed by smokestacks, and where there is green grass, and flowers, and the open sky. From her earliest youth this free, clean environment stamped itself upon the disposition of Mary Kingsbury.

When she had graduated from feeding the ducks and geese, and milking the cows, and helping cook for the harvest hands, and finished the course at the village high school, she became a country schoolma'am. (I'm strong on country schoolma'ams. I believe it's the best training in the world for a girl who is going to do school work on the foreign field.)

Later she heard the call of India. Her young life answered it. She was twenty-five. Whether she had had any affairs of the heart before that time I do not know. She is not the kind of a woman that you can ask about a thing like that. At any rate, since that time her one consuming love has been India.

Mamma Ji says she has never done anything very great. She says about all she has done is to keep well, stay on the job, keep up her faith, and love the people. Note those four points. I count those points about the biggest things that anybody, anywhere, can do. To keep well, to stay on the job, to keep a firm grip on faith, and to actually love the people. Mamma Ji, your simple philosophy incorporates the greatest things in human existence!

On the same boat with "Rajah the First," she sailed out of New York harbor in September, 1882. The name of the boat was the Ethiopia. Along with three other young women she landed in India in November of that same year. She went to Harda, rented a small native house, hired a pundit, and went to work on the pundit, in the hope of getting out of him a working knowledge of the Hindi language. As far as Mary knew, there was not at that time a language school for new missionaries in all India. Being young, strong and energetic, she worked the pundit several hours a day. Thus the first year passed, and a second similar year in Jubbulpore.

SINCE Harda was well staffed, it was decided to open a new station in Bilaspur. There being no railroad to Bilaspur at that time, the trip was made overland from Jubbulpore. It was a distance of two hundred and twenty miles. Two families and two single women, Mary being one of them, made this long overland journey. How? Well, I have been out here in India long enough to know how. There is only one way. The goods must be taken in a two-wheeled cart called a tonga, drawn by a small animal called a horse, but which is only about one-quarter horsepower. If one does not like the horse, then the only alternative is to take a yoke of oxen. A cart drawn by two horses is not even thought of in the "best circles" in India.

So one morning in February, 1885, a caravan of eleven ox-carts started on its "long, long trail, a-winding" in and out through the paths of the jungle, and over the great rocky ranges of hills. They made about ten miles a day. They pitched their tents at night near some village where they could buy wood, milk, chickens and eggs from the villagers.

A part of the trail led through some very dense jungle. At night they could hear the call of the jackal and the hyena, and now and then the challenge of the leopard and the tiger. There is something awe-inspiring about the Indian jungle. There is a call, an appeal, a romance about it, that grips one's heart and soul. One day as Mary was walking along the road by a small stream she saw a huge tiger come out of the bushes to drink. She confesses that her heart stood still for a while. After that she did not walk out alone.

The trip took a full month. On the day of their arrival in Bilaspur a man named B. Jagganath came out to bid them welcome, and helped them to secure houses in which to live. Here at least was one friend to begin with. That was thirty-five years ago, and both he and she are still living in Bilaspur.
